Congress Study Warns of New Slump

Budget Lid Assailed as 'Disaster'

By James M. Shevis

A congressional staff study of the Ford Administration's budget and tax proposals warned that "in the absence of major economic changes, the recovery is likely to sputter out by 1977, leaving unemployment on a very high plateau, probably above 7.5 percent."

In a gloomy appraisal of the Administration's proposed "current services budget" for fiscal year 1977, the staff of the Joint Economic Committee pointed out that President Ford's plan to hold federal spending to $395 billion could cause "a severe setback" to economic recovery.

In releasing the congressional study, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the committee, said he could only conclude that President Ford's budget policy is "a disaster."

Even if Congress extends the present schedule of reduced income-tax withholding rates through 1977, the study observed, adoption of a $395 billion spending ceiling would result in the following adverse economic conditions in the 1977 calendar year:

- An increase in the unemployment rate to an average of 8.7 percent.
- A drop in the rate of real economic growth to below 2 percent.
- An inflation rate that would be somewhat higher than with a more expansive fiscal policy.

The congressional economists also said an extra stimulus may be needed to prevent economic stagnation through 1977. Their study drew up an alternative fiscal policy to the President's calling for higher outlays and a 10 percent personal tax cut starting next October to keep joblessness below 8 percent in 1977.

The 10 percent tax reduction would come on top of the six-month extension of the reduced federal income-tax withholding schedule that took effect last May.

Even with this more expansive fiscal policy, the staff study cautioned, the pace of recovery would be sluggish. The growth in real gross national product would hover around 4 percent in the second half of calendar year 1977 and the jobless rate would remain very close to 8 percent.

"Hence, even this fiscal policy falls short of meeting the objective of sustaining a recovery pace which achieves a continuing reduction in

Meany Hits Ford Cave-In On Site Picketing Pledge

SANTA CLAUS makes a stop at the Washington Post picket line to distribute gifts to children of striking newspaper craftsmen and other Post unionists honoring the strike, now in its fourth month. Santa's bag was filled with gifts purchased by the national headquarters staff of the Machinists.

Calls Veto Proof Of 'Weakness'

By David L. Perlman

President Ford caved in to right-wing political pressures and broke faith with labor and the American people when he vetoed the construction site picketing bill, AFL-CIO President George Meany charged.

"We in the labor movement believe a man's word is his bond," Meany said. "Now the President has shown what his word is worth."

Ford has admitted that he promised to sign the legislation and that it met the conditions he had insisted on. But he said he "most reluctantly" decided to veto the bill because it had generated such "vigorous controversy."

To Meany and other trade union leaders, Ford's veto revealed the President as a political weakling whose word can no longer be trusted. It was this facet that made labor's expression of outrage so personalized, in contrast to strong disagreements on principle over the merits of other presidential actions.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., expressed sadness and deep hurt, as well as indignation, that Ford had gone back on assurances given both "publicly and privately."

He said that Ford "has lost the confidence of the working people of this country because he has

Retail Prices Continue Rise At 8.4% Rate

Prices of retail goods and services continued to climb unrelentingly in November, with the Bureau of Labor Statistics reporting another increase of seven-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index.

The November rise, which translates into an 8.4 percent annual rate, put the CPI at 165.6 percent of its 1967 base. It also marked the second consecutive month in which consumer prices rose by seven-tenths of 1 percent.

Increases in mortgage interest rates, auto insurance premiums, property taxes, and prices for natural gas, clothing, new cars, dairy

Vague Language Added:

Face-Saving Device Preserves Tax Cut

Congress added some deliberately vague language to its tax cut bill, and President Ford said he was "very pleased" to sign into law the legislation he had vetoed just a few days earlier.

The "compromise" on taxes was widely regarded as a face-saving device to let House Republicans and those Democrats who had supported the President's veto climb out of the political hole the White House had dug for them.

By voting to sustain the veto, they had set the stage for a sharp rise in withholding taxes in January that would have drained more than $1 billion a month in purchasing power from a still ailing economy. The AFL-CIO and a broad spectrum of economists had warned that allowing the anti-recession tax cuts to expire on Dec. 31, 1975, would touch off a new economic downturn.

Ford had initially said he would not sign any tax cut that didn't set a spending ceiling for the 1977 fiscal year—which doesn't even start until next October. The dollar ceiling Ford proposed would, he claimed, represent a reduction of $1 in projected spending for every dollar of the tax reduction for the 1976 calendar year.

In an attempt to appease the President, Congress put a six-month limit on its tax extension bill. That would allow a more realistic look at the spending ceiling concept next spring, during the congressional review of the budget.

Ford nevertheless vetoed the tax cut. It seemed for a time that enough House Republicans would break ranks to provide the two-thirds majority needed to override the veto.

That didn't happen. Wavering Republicans — all but 19 — were held in line by assurance from House GOP leaders that there would still be an opportunity to pass a tax bill that would be coupled with a politically attractive

Machinists' Gains Solve Airline Strike

The Machinists ratified a new three-year contract with United Airlines that will provide wage increases averaging about 28 percent for some 17,000 workers over the life of the agreement.

Approval of the settlement ended a 16-day strike by mechanics, dispatchers and ramp, storage and food-service workers that completely shut down the nation's largest air carrier. Full service has since resumed.

The agreement was reached Dec. 19 after an all-night negotiating session attended by Federal Mediation Director W. J. Usery, Jr., who is special presidential assistant

House Set to Challenge President On Veto of Labor-HEW Fund Bill

President Ford signed a compromise energy policy bill, but vetoed appropriations for two government departments and announced his intention to veto a union-supported rail modernization bill.

The House set Jan. 27—eight days after the convening of the second session of the 94th Congress—to vote on overriding Ford's veto of appropriations for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Ford said the funding bill is $1 billion more than his budget proposal and he is "not impressed" by the fact that it is within the budget ceiling set by Congress. He said it would expand federal employment when "there are already too many employes."

Before adjourning, Congress voted final approval to a $6.5 billion program to upgrade railroad facilities and finance ConRail, the agency set up to take over the Penn Central system and other bankrupt railroads.

Although the final version was substantially less costly than the bill the Senate had passed, the White House said it would be vetoed, and Congress held up sending it to the President to avoid a between-sessions "pocket veto."

Thus, the anticipated veto will be followed by an attempt to muster a two-thirds majority in the House and Senate to override the veto after Congress reconvenes.

The energy policy bill, although somewhat pared down in negotia-

Joblessness, Inflation Top 1975 Issues

The year 1975 was a bleak repetition of 1974 for many of the nation's workers as unemployment rose substantially higher and take-home pay was further eroded by the continuing rise in prices.

The nation's jobless rate, advancing through much of '74, exploded to 9.2 percent in May—the highest level in 34 years. The grim government statistic refuted White House claims that economic recovery was well on its way.

Efforts by Congress to enact programs to pull the economy out of the deep recession were repeatedly smothered by presidential vetoes. In most cases, Congress failed to muster the needed two-thirds majority to override.

Despite the shaky economic conditions, corporations continued to pile up substantial profits through most of the year.

January

The AFL-CIO General Board, meeting in an emergency session, spelled out a major six-point program for Congress and President Ford to bolster the economy by putting the nation back to work. The year opened with most key economic indicators pointing down as the recession took a stronger grip on the country. Unemployment was on the rise, but so was inflation, with consumer prices 12.2 percent higher over the year. Workers' real spendable earnings adjusted for inflation—fell below the 1965 level even though union-negotiated wage increases averaged 9.8 percent. Organized labor pressed hard in Congress for an immediate tax cut to expand purchasing power to help spur the ailing economy.

People: William E. Fredenberger, president of the Firemen & Oilers since 1965, died. He was succeeded by Sec.-Treas. John J. McNamara and George J. Francisco was named secretary-treasurer. Other deaths included Emil Rieve, founding president of the Textile Workers Union of America; Sec.-Treas. Daniel J. Sullivan of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Sec. Robert M. Wilkins of the National Safety Council's Labor Conference. Harold Chadwick was elected secretary-treasurer of the Theatrical Stage Employes.

February

The nation's unemployment rate jumped from 7.1 percent to 8.2 percent—the highest level in 33 years—and was still climbing. At the same time, rising retail prices depressed workers' purchasing power to an 11-year low. President Ford acknowledged in the annual economic report to Congress that joblessness was high "and will rise higher." The AFL-CIO Executive Council called for immediate steps to aid the victims of recession by overhauling faulty economic policies. But the President's budget offered little relief for the poor, the unemployed or low-wage workers. However, Congress soundly rejected an attempt by the Administration to make the poor pay more for food stamps. Labor stepped up efforts in Congress to improve the unemployment insurance system, develop new sources of financing for social security and provide assistance to jobless workers in meeting their mortgage payments.

People: John T. Dunlop was nominated to succeed Peter J. Brennan as Secretary of Labor. The Musicians named J. Martin Emerson as secretary-treasurer to succeed Stanley Ballard on his retirement. D. A. Bobo succeeded the late Daniel Sullivan as secretary-treasurer of the Railway & Airline Clerks. Former President Paul L. Phillips of the Paperworkers died.

March

Organized labor threw its support behind a $5.9 billion emergency appropriations bill to create nearly 1 million jobs in 1975. AFL-CIO President George Meany, in accepting the brotherhood citation of the National Conference of Christians & Jews, warned that the nation's deepening recession could bring new social and racial tensions to threaten progress in human rights. The government's composite index of major economic indicators dropped for the sixth consecutive month. Despite the most severe economic contraction since the 1930s, the Commerce Dept. reported that U.S. business and industry posted record profits in 1974—up 17 percent from the year before. Real spendable earnings continued to drop as retail prices rose another six-tenths of 1 percent. Congress gave final approval to a $25 billion tax reduction, which Ford eventually signed with reservations.

People: The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers named Anthony C. Sabatine secretary-treasurer to succeed B. J. Schafer, who retired. John Serpico succeeded Milton Gordon as secretary-treasurer of the Doll & Toy Workers.

April

The government's official unemployment rate shot up from 8.2 to 8.7 percent as more than 8 million workers were unable to find jobs. With the jobless rate climbing to more than 18 percent in contract construction, 3,000 delegates from building trades unions came to Capitol Hill to seek congressional action on programs to reduce unemployment in their industry. Another 60,000 members from Industrial Union Dept. affiliates held a jobs rally in Washington to focus national attention on their plight as the factory unemployment rate rose for the 11th straight month, reaching 11.4 percent. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that living costs for the average American family increased 13.5 percent in one year. Meanwhile, Ford proposed that a pay increase due federal workers be held to 5 percent. The Supreme Court rejected an attempt by plastics manufacturers to further delay a federal standard reducing worker exposure to cancer-causing vinyl chloride gas.

People: The Marine & Shipbuilding Workers named Frank Derwin president and Arthur Batson, Jr., secretary-treasurer. Howard D. Collins succeeded Joseph P. McCurdy as president of the United Garment Workers.

Deaths: Arthur Rosenstock, former president of the Newspaper Guild; William Collins, a veteran AFL-CIO organizer, and Angela Bambace, a retired vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

May

The Executive Council warned that Congress and the President have placed the concern of budget deficits ahead of the vital need to restore full employment. Full employment would bring about the needed economic recovery and would end deficits, the council stressed. Labor put out the welcome mat for more than 100,000 Vietnamese refugees who fled the Communist takeover. As the jobless rate rose to 8.9 percent, Congress voted final approval to a $5.3 billion jobs-creation bill, which faced another presidential veto. Labor pressed for an increase in funds for a public service employment program. Revised government statistics showed that the gross national product fell at an annual rate of 11.3 percent in the first quarter.

People: Sol C. Chaikin, secretary-treasurer of the Ladies' Garment Workers, was named to succeed Louis Stulberg as president effective Sept. 1. Robert C. Mayer was appointed associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO and Laurence Gold as the federation's special counsel. Thomas E. Harris had resigned as associate counsel to join the Federal Election Commission. Betty S. Murphy became the first woman to head the National Labor Relations Board. John A. McCart was named executive director of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. John J. Murphy, retired president of the Bricklayers, died.

June

Despite an unemployment rate of 9.2 percent—the highest level in 34 years—and with 127 of the nation's 150 major job centers experiencing substantial joblessness, Ford vetoed the labor-backed jobs-financing legislation. The House failed to override, falling five votes short of the needed two-thirds majority, as most Republicans who had earlier backed the bill bowed to White House pressure. Ford also vetoed the housing and strip mining bills, which Congress failed to reverse. The U.S. worker delegation walked out of the International Labor Organization conference after the terrorist Palestine Liberation Organization was given observer status. California enacted a new collective bargaining law for agricultural workers. Organized labor launched campaigns for a stiff federal standard on occupational noise and site picketing rights for construction unions.

People: Frank D. Martino succeeded Thomas E. Boyle as president of the Chemical Workers and J. A. Thomas took over Martino's former post as secretary-treasurer. Charles E. Bradford was named executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute. Max Steinbock, president of the International Labor Press Association and editor of the RWDSU Record, died.

July

Soviet exile Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn warned that a blind policy of detente with the USSR by the United States and other western democracies is a threat to freedom. Solzhenitsyn was in the country as a guest of the AFL-CIO and addressed labor banquets in Washington and New York. Meany called on Congress to complete tax reform legislation, focusing on the need to close loopholes for the wealthy and big corporations. He also urged a cutoff of funds to United Nations organizations that have been turned into "instruments of political warfare" by Communist nations. The Longshoremen voted to initiate a boycott of grain shipments to Russia unless there were assurances the sale would not be detrimental to U.S. consumers. The Pottery Workers approved a plan to merge with the Seafarers.

People: The Aluminum Workers elected new top officers—President Vernon E. Kelley and Sec.-Treas. Max Webster—as President Henry S. Olsen and Sec.-Treas. Patrick J. Reilly retired.

Deaths: Peter M. McGavin, executive secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., and Arnold S. Zander, the first president of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

August

Massive hikes in retail prices sent the government's consumer price index up 1.2 percent, the steepest monthly increase in 10 months. The average worker's real take-home pay dropped further. The Labor Dept. also reported that an unemployment rate of 6 percent or higher engulfed 131 of the nation's 150 major job centers even though the overall jobless rate eased to 8.4 percent. The Executive Council warned that there was a serious threat of a deeper recession because of the Administration's faulty economic policies. A Library of Congress study found that Ford's vetoes of employment bills cost the nation 638,500 jobs. The President extended his string of vetoes during the month, rejecting health and education funding bills. Unions stepped up efforts to block a new round of tariff cuts on imported products, citing a severe impact on U.S. jobs.

People: W. Vernie Reed succeeded Terrance J. O'Sullivan as secretary-treasurer of the Laborers. Robert O. Aders was named Under Secretary of Labor. Jeanne de Thierens, secretary in the AFL-CIO European office, died.

September

Labor Day marked the opening of the bicentennial year for America's workers with picnics, parades, barbecues, musical salutes and other events across the country. Union officials stressed the need for the creation of more jobs in Labor Day addresses as the nation's unemployment rate remained high—8.4 percent and all but 17 of the 150 major job centers had a jobless rate of 6 percent or higher. Meany warned the Senate Budget Committee that the country would not pull out of its economic slump unless funds for jobs programs were provided. The Longshoremen lifted their embargo on Russian grain shipments with assurances from the White House that future grain deals would be on a government-to-government basis with full consideration of the interests of American consumers, farmers and the shipping industry. Congress failed to override the President's veto of domestic oil price controls, but easily rejected his veto of an education appropriations bill. The Farm Workers took an early lead over the Teamsters in representation elections held in California.

People: Dominick D'Ambrosio was elected president of the Allied Industrial Workers to succeed retiring Gilbert Jewell. Raymond R. Reinhold succeeded D'Ambrosio as secretary-treasurer. John A. Durkin won the New Hampshire rerun election for the Senate. Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO, died.

October

The 11th AFL-CIO convention spelled out programs and policies needed to recreate a viable nation. It zeroed in on domestic economic issues and international problems, stressing the need for full employment and vital social services, and efforts to protect basic freedoms in the world. Delegates elected four new vice presidents: Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Hal C. Davis of the Musicians, Edward T. Hanley of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Clyde M. Webber of the Government Employees. Workers' real earnings continued to suffer as the consumer price index rose six-tenths of 1 percent. Nine of every 10 major job centers were swamped by high unemployment, ranging from 6 to 21 percent. Of the nation's 150 key labor areas, 57 had a jobless rate of 10 percent or higher.

People: Earl D. McDavid became secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., succeeding Edward P. Murphy. Norman N. Pledger was elected president of the Colorado AFL-CIO. The Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers elected Ralph Cennamo secretary-treasurer.

Deaths: Duane Emme, an editor of Press Associates, Inc., the labor news service; John Beidler, legislative director of the Auto Workers.

November

The Senate broke a filibuster and passed the site picketing bill, the culmination of a 25-year struggle by building trades unions which had received assurances from President Ford that he would sign the legislation. After-tax corporation profits for the third quarter rose 17 percent from the previous quarter, the steepest upturn in 25 years. But the unemployment rate was also climbing again, rising from 8.3 to 8.6 percent. Consumer prices jumped seven-tenths of 1 percent and workers' real spendable earnings dipped once more. The Labor Dept. also reported that a total of 18.3 million persons had been unemployed at some time during 1974. Another government report showed that more than half the workers seeking trade adjustment assistance because imports had destroyed their jobs were denied benefits. The AFL-CIO endorsed the formal notice of the U.S. intention to withdraw from the International Labor Organization.

People: Angelo Fosco was elected president of the Laborers to succeed his father, Peter Fosco, who died Oct. 26. The elder Fosco was also an AFL-CIO vice president. Ruben Levin, editor and manager of Labor newspaper, received the Eugene V. Debs award. The Screen Actors elected Kathleen Nolan president, the first woman to head the Guild in its 42-year history.

December

The President vetoed a labor-backed bill extending the tax cut and the House fell short of the needed two-thirds majority to override. Meany assailed Ford's action as "political" and warned that the economy would be further endangered unless taxes are reduced. Congress quickly passed a six-month extension of the tax cut that Ford signed. Reneging on earlier pledges, Ford announced his intention to veto the site picketing bill. Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop warned that a veto would disrupt future labor-management relations in the construction industry. The AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee called on Congress to enact a full employment law early in the 1976 session, setting a national jobless rate target of 3 percent.

People: J. C. Turner was elected to succeed Hunter P. Wharton as President of the Operating Engineers. Robert J. Petersdorf was named secretary-treasurer of the Painters to replace the retiring Michael DiSilvestro.

Ford Signs Measure:

Energy Bill Includes Oil Price Rollback

tions designed to avoid a veto, gave Congress a rare policy victory over President Ford on a major economic issue.

The question was how best to hold down oil and gasoline consumption in view of the sharp rise in world petroleum prices and the risk of political blackmail from a renewed Arab oil boycott.

Ford's solution was to deregulate domestic oil prices rapidly, impose an added tariff on oil imports, and rely on sharply increasing prices to curtail the use of oil and gasoline.

Instead, Congress moved in the general direction of the AFL-CIO energy policy, although only after many false starts. The tortuous legislative course began last winter, soon after the 94th Congress convened. The final version was a composite of four Senate bills approved last spring and summer and a comprehensive House bill passed in September.

Under the new law, the average price of crude oil produced in the United States will be pushed back from the current $8.75 a barrel to $7.66. There will also be a drop in in imported oil prices resulting from Ford's agreement to cancel the $2-a-barrel import fee he imposed last winter.

After the initial rollback, the President is authorized to allow prices to rise up to 10 percent a year over the 40-month life of the bill.

Major provisions of the legislation include:

- Stronger powers for the Federal Energy Administration to order power plants to switch from oil or natural gas to coal, and a loan guarantee program to develop new underground coal mines.
- Presidential authority to allocate scarce energy supplies, to compel increased oil and gas production and to restrict energy exports.
- Creation of a national strategic petroleum reserve of 1 billion barrels, sufficient to replace three months of imports, to protect against another Arab oil boycott.
- Standby presidential powers, subject to congressional review, including gasoline rationing in an emergency.
- Fuel economy standards for all automobile model years after 1977, aiming for an average of at least 26 miles per gallon by the 1985 model year.
- A federal energy testing and labeling program for all major consumer products.
- Authority for federal audits of oil companies.

In contrast to his action on the construction site picketing bill, Ford accepted the advice of Federal Energy Administrator Frank G. Zarb, who helped shape the final version of the bill, and disappointed some of his oil company supporters.

If Ford had vetoed the bill, all controls on oil prices would have expired and producers would have been free to charge whatever they could get.

The Labor-HEW appropriations bill that Ford vetoed had been passed by the House, 321-91, and approved by voice vote in the Senate.

It provided $36 billion for the array of programs of the two departments and several independent agencies for the current fiscal year, and an additional $9 billion for the "transition quarter" resulting from the change in future fiscal years to an Oct. 1 start, instead of the traditional July 1.

Most of the money added by Congress went for health research programs—an area where Congress has traditionally been more generous than the Administration.

Ford did not mention in his veto message the chief controversy over the bill during its congressional course — a rider that more stringently than heretofore barred HEW from requiring busing to achieve school desegregation.

Anti-Zionism Termed Peril to Human Rights

New York—The threat to the survival of Israel stemming from the recent United Nations action equating Zionism with racism imperils freedom in all other parts of the world, the Jewish Labor Committee was told.

That point was stressed by President Albert Shanker of the Teachers and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland as Shanker received the JLC's Labor Human Rights Award.

Speaking at the JLC awards dinner, Shanker noted that the American labor movement and the JLC have long held the belief that freedom cannot be kept alive in some places, but not in others. "Threats in one place threaten us all," he declared.

Kirkland said the UN's anti-Zionism resolution carried a frightening aspect. Recalling the Nazi massacre of Jews, he said, "It's hard to shake the notion that it can happen again—one way or another."

"This country has done its level best for the past 30 years to keep lights burning, particularly through the creation of the UN," Kirkland said. "Now it seems lights are beginning to go out again all over the world, and the UN is the leading instrument for their extinction."

Kirkland praised Shanker as a man of courage and conviction, "who wouldn't know how to abstain on an issue of human rights if he had to."

AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a telegram read at the dinner that Shanker "represents the best of a new generation of trade union leaders who not only fight effectively for the interests of their members, but have a clear understanding of labor's role in society."

Shanker, Meany continued, "has provided sound and clear-sighted trade union leadership under some of the most difficult circumstances imaginable."

Jacob Sheinkman, president of the JLC and secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers, cited Shanker's effective role in organizing professionals and bringing them into the mainstream of the labor movement.

Retail Costs Continue Rise At 8.4% Rate

products and fresh vegetables accounted for a large part of the overall rise in the CPI, the government said.

Food prices jumped six-tenths of 1 percent while the costs of other commodities rose by three-tenths of 1 percent, and services increased by 1.1 percent—the highest one-month jump since a 1.2 percent rise in September 1974.

AFL-CIO President George Meany noted that the statistics "show up as false the claim that government spending was the cause of continued inflation.

"Rather it was the government's policies of higher interest rates and higher fuel bills for Americans that drove consumer prices higher," Meany said.

In a separate report, BLS said real spendable earnings — take-home pay adjusted for the effects of inflation—went up seven-tenths of 1 percent from October to November. Over the year, purchasing power was up 3.9 percent but almost all of the rise resulted from the reduction in federal income taxes that began last May.

Among the higher charges for services, costs for transportation and household services increased most, BLS noted. An 8.5 percent rise in auto insurance rates forced all transportation costs up 3 percent. Household service costs rose 1.3 percent, reflecting a 1.6 percent rise in mortgage interest rates.

"Increases of 2.1 percent for property taxes, 3.4 percent for natural gas, and 1.4 percent for telephone services were the largest monthly increases for these items this year (1975)," the report said.

Congress Urged to Bar Natural Gas Decontrol

Strong opposition to the deregulation of natural gas prices has been expressed in letters from unions to members of Congress, pointing out that the cost of fuel and almost every product consumers buy would increase substantially if price limitations are lifted.

Legislation to remove controls from gas producers was introduced in the House following predictions that the nation would face a severe gas shortage this winter. To date, the crisis has not materialized, according to congressional studies and state utility commissions.

Earlier, the White House had predicted that the curtailment of gas shipments would be so severe that 100,000 layoffs would result in several eastern states.

But with the improving outlook in gas supplies, the Steelworkers urged Congress to reject all efforts to remove or relax price controls "from this industry which is not bound by the constraints of competitiveness."

The Service Employees said an increase in gas prices is unnecessary since gas producers are already guaranteed a 15 percent return on investments. If prices were permitted to rise uncontrolled, SEIU President George Hardy warned that inflation would rebound to last year's intolerable 12 percent rate.

The Flint Glass Workers told the Energy Policy Task Force that while deregulation would cause gas prices to skyrocket, there was no guarantee that gas supplies would be increased.

"There is no free competitive market in the natural gas industry," Glass Workers President George M. Parker said. "Those few who control it will charge all that the market can bear."

AFL-CIO President George Meany in a letter sent to all House members said deregulation would be "unwise and unwarranted" and would abdicate the government's responsibility of assuring consumers just and reasonable gas prices.

Meanwhile, the Consumer Federation of America and the American Public Gas Association charged in a federal court suit that the Federal Energy Administration had illegally misused public funds in attempting to lobby Congress for gas price deregulation.

Machinists Ratify Pact To End Airline Strike

for labor-management negotiations, and David H. Stowe, chairman of the National Mediation Board. The marathon bargaining session was the first since the disputants broke off talks 10 days earlier.

Besides substantial wage increases, the union negotiated significantly improved fringe benefits plus greater job security.

Meanwhile, some 1,200 striking members of the Flight Attendants at National Airlines were scheduled to vote again Jan. 4 on a tentative contract settlement which they rejected last November.

The second ballot was ordered by a federal judge in Miami. The Flight Attendants, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots, began their strike last Sept. 1.

The United agreement provides all employes an immediate 5 percent wage increase, retroactive to Nov. 1, 1975. Other boosts are 4.7 percent on July 1, 1976; 2.8 percent on Jan. 1, 1977; 4.3 percent on July 1, 1977; 3.4 percent on Jan. 1, 1978, and 2.2 percent on July 1, 1978.

In addition, the contract includes a cost-of-living escalator clause providing for pay adjustments of up to 12 cents per hour on Nov. 1, 1976, and again on Nov. 1, 1977, based on increases in the national consumer price index. Under the old contract, the ceiling on such COL increases was 10 cents an hour per year.

The new agreement will raise the pay of most United mechanics from $7.84 to $10 an hour by July 1, 1978. Over the same period, base pay for ramp and storage employes will rise from $6.40 to $8.22 an hour. The rate for porters will go from $4.13 to $5.39.

The agreement also includes a new supplementary pension plan that calls for the company to increase its contributions so that workers retiring from the mechanics' classification will receive an additional $2 per month per year of service. The existing contributory plan provides monthly retirement benefits of $18.25 per year of service. Higher benefits also will go to workers in other job categories.

In addition, workers will be allowed to retire at 62 years of age instead of at 65 without any loss of benefits.

78,000 in UAW Ask Trade Act Aid

The Auto Workers petitioned the Labor Dept. for trade adjustments benefits for 78,000 workers who had been laid off because of foreign imports.

The two petitions cover UAW members who lost their jobs with the nation's three major automakers—General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp.

One petition is for about 30,000 workers whose layoffs were related to the cutbacks in the production of standard-size cars and the other is for 48,000 workers formerly building subcompacts.

The union won adjustment benefits last summer for 18,000 Chrysler workers who lost their jobs because of increased imports of intermediate-size cars.

Textile Workers Win Enka Election

Whitaker, N.C. — The Textile Workers Union of America won representation rights for nearly 1,000 workers employed by the American Enka Co. here.

Of 962 workers participating in the National Labor Relations Board election, the TWUA received 516 votes to 387 for no union.

TWUA President Sol C. Stetin hailed the victory as another step in the effort to bring union benefits to all textile workers in the South.

A Broken Promise

THE PRESIDENT has broken faith with both the labor movement and the American people.

He repeatedly gave his word, publicly and privately, that, if precise conditions were met, he would sign the situs picketing bill.

The Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents (Volume II, Nos. 35 and 38), issued by the White House, is concrete evidence of this fact.

The President's conditions were accepted in good faith by the building trades unions and incorporated in the bill by the Congress. The result was a good bill that would have benefited the cause of industrial peace.

That measure would have simply granted building trades workers equal treatment with industrial workers. Far from creating greater conflict in the industry, as the President falsely contended, it would have provided a sensible and stabilizing mechanism for collective bargaining, as the Secretary of Labor and the Director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service have both pointed out.

Despite this fact, the President succumbed to a slanderous attack on the labor movement by ultra-conservatives. He proved himself too weak to stand up to right-wing political pressure. Undoubtedly this decision of the President will help his political financial situation.

No President that we recall ever publicly promised to sign a bill and then ran out in the manner of Gerald Ford.

However, we in the labor movement believe a man's word is his bond. Now the President has shown what his word is worth.

—AFL-CIO President George Meany.

THE PRESIDENT of the United States has vetoed an Administration bill, endorsed by every President since Harry Truman, Republican and Democrat alike.

The veto of the situs picketing bill is a national tragedy.

It denies four million of our citizens equal treatment under law.

It eliminates the possibility of bringing stability to the construction industry under the terms of the Collective Bargaining Act.

More important than any other consideration, it reveals that the President of the United States is not a man of his word. Publicly and privately, Mr. Ford assured us that if the Building & Construction Trades would agree to certain stipulations—which in good faith we did, although some were hard to swallow—he would approve the equal treatment legislation.

It is one thing to change your mind on account of reasonable argument and discussion. It is quite different when you surrender to pressure and such blackmail threats as the warning that a number of Republican state and finance chairmen would resign if Mr. Ford signed the bill.

I am saddened by his decision, not alone as President of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. but as an American citizen. I am deeply hurt because President Ford caved in to a powerful, selfish, anti-union minority.

The person in the office of the presidency of the United States now has lost the confidence of the working people of this country because he has knuckled under and broken his pledge.

—From a statement by Robert A. Georgine, president, AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

A Word Edgewise:

'Conservative Liberals' Offer No Answer to Nation's Needs

By Bayard Rustin

IF POLITICS MAKES for strange bedfellows, it sometimes produces even stranger offspring. In recent years there has developed a strange new breed of political animal — conservative liberals who say they are for social progress but against big government, who are sensitive to the plight of the poor, but propose cutbacks in social programs.

We saw a similar animal in the past, the "liberal conservative," who said he was liberal on civil rights but conservative on social spending. But whereas the liberal conservative was trying to protect himself politically from the charge that he was for injustice, the conservative liberals have adopted almost completely the conservative attack on liberal reforms.

There is an undeniably faddish character about the conservative liberals, but as usual fads and fashions are the result of deeper phenomena. It has been a characteristic of liberals in the United States that they are almost addicted to anything that has the word "new" in it. There is nothing more difficult for some liberals than the recognition that the liberal answers of the past might still be essentially valid.

The conservative liberal tendency has dangerous implications for black Americans. The conservative liberals have even gone beyond the conservative slogan that throwing money at problems doesn't solve them; the conservative liberal response is that not throwing money at problems will solve them, which is nonsense. They talk about the need to go beyond the New Deal, but they are actually abandoning those goals by proposing that they be indefinitely postponed. Their bird-call is "liberalism has failed."

Blacks quite simply cannot afford the postponement of solutions; we have waited long enough. We have endured too much and struggled too long to be told that the problems of poverty, unemployment and discrimination are intractable.

The only periods of black advancement have been during periods of strong presidential leadership and active federal programs designed to do something for the poor and working people. The civil rights gains of the 1960s in employment and income have been wiped out by the Nixon-Ford Administration, which in its own way promised less—and delivered it.

I do not want to suggest that Roosevelt's New Deal, Truman's Fair Deal or the Great Society were perfect. Yet they did do much to equalize social conditions, lift millions from poverty and improve the lives of a majority of Americans. If these attempts at social reconstruction had a fault it was not that they tried to do too much; rather it was that too little was spent and too little done to accomplish their laudable goals. Despite shortcomings these programs are the foundation on which social justice must be constructed.

THE PROBLEMS of black Americans will not be solved by less government. The unpardonable unemployment rate of 14 percent among blacks will not be eased by those who say that we must lower our expectations. If anything our expectations have been too low. As a nation we have tolerated too much unemployment. We have permitted too much poverty. By our inaction, we have given approval to too much injustice.

In the final analysis the new-breed liberals offer blacks, the poor and working people little more than a warmed-over version of conservatism. We should no more accept this newer rationale for doing nothing than we accepted the original version.

We must insist now, as we have in the past, that politicians face up to the issues of injustice, inequality and unemployment. In reply to critics of some past programs we say, to paraphrase G. K. Chesterton, that, "Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing badly." Let's learn from our mistakes, and next time do it right.

AFL-CIO Policies Developed By Intense Convention Activity

The following article on the resolution-making process at AFL-CIO conventions is reprinted from the December 1975 Monthly Labor Review published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Dept. of Labor. It was written by Leon E. Lunden of BLS who covered the convention for the magazine.

ON ITS SURFACE, the AFL-CIO convention exhibits an almost mechanical policymaking process. It is, after all, the highest governing body of the federation, yet resolutions of the greatest importance are passed by voice vote, usually with no discussion, and only rarely with any dissent. The result is a false impression of boredom on the part of delegates schooled in the art of "Aye."

To understand the real policymaking process, it is necessary to recognize the intense activity away from the convention floor. It is at these sessions that fatigue, and eventually exhaustion, of delegates and staff mark the true development of AFL-CIO policy. It is here that the debate that makes convention floor fights rare events goes on.

Resolutions are submitted by affiliated international unions and state and local bodies. Others come from the Executive Council, where they have been passed at the August council meeting for introduction at the convention. Resolutions from the Executive Council are usually broad in scope, dealing with general policies and issues. All resolutions must be received at AFL-CIO headquarters 30 days before the convention, except for those from organizations that meet less than 30 days before. The resolutions are reviewed in Washington by the particular departments affected. These departments attach comments and pass the resolutions on to the staff members assigned to the committees that will handle the resolutions. The staff members gather background materials that will be useful to the committees in their deliberations. At a later stage, the staff members redraft resolutions or amend them in accordance with the instructions of their committees or subcommittees.

Resolutions are parceled among several committees, where the hard work begins. Only a handful are assigned to those on the constitution, education, labels, and state and local bodies. These few, however, can be of great importance—as, for instance, was the resolution increasing per capita taxes from 10 to 13 cents, which was assigned to the Constitution Committee.

The bulk go to the Resolutions Committee. This is the largest committee, with 42 members divided among four subcommittees: international affairs and general matters, economic affairs, public employes and governmental affairs, and social security and community affairs. Resolutions are reviewed beginning the Monday before the convention (which always opens on Thursday), and meetings continue into evenings and the intervening weekend, as needed.

When a resolution comes before the subcommittee to which it is assigned, committee members ask questions and staff members try to answer them. Delegates may appear before the committee to discuss the resolution. Some items cause considerable debate and may be held over one or two days as subcommittee members attempt to negotiate a compromise acceptable to all parties. Ironing out differences is sometimes a difficult task when those participating are all international union presidents or other high officers in their organizations. In any event, this is the stage where arguments and emotions may erupt, where collective bargaining techniques may be applied internally to resolve disputes.

If several resolutions cover the same subject, the best resolution (in substance as well as style) will be chosen for presentation, but be amended to cover major points of discarded resolutions. Staff members write the necessary amendments under subcommittee directions.

The subcommittee then presents its recommendations to the full Resolutions Committee. Again debate occurs, and those who lost before the subcommittee can bring up their arguments once more in hopes of modifying the resolution. A vote is taken, and the resolution moves to the convention floor with the committee's recommendation to adopt, amend, take no action, refer to the Executive Council, or defeat.

IF STILL DISSATISFIED with subcommittee and committee action, a delegate may bring the issue to the floor, as President Jerry Wurf of the American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees did on the question of the right to strike for police and firefighters.

The result of this activity on all resolutions is that AFL-CIO conventions generally ratify actions taken by the Executive Council since the previous convention, reaffirm policies carried over from the previous convention, and, occasionally, establish new policies.

At times, the delegates refer a resolution to the Executive Council for study, rather than adopt a policy rashly or set firm policy on inconsequential matters. In some cases, a resolution is referred to the Executive Council because it was impossible to compromise differences between opposing parties. In this way, floor fights are avoided and behind-the-scenes mediation may resolve the issue before the next convention.

At the 11th biennial convention, 266 resolutions were considered. About 50 percent were adopted or adopted as amended; 33 percent were covered by other resolutions and therefore no action was taken; 15 percent were referred to the Executive Council for their action or further study; and 2 percent were defeated.

Unions Withhold Judgment:

Job Safety 'Emphasis' Program Leaves Questions Unanswered

ORGANIZED LABOR will measure the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's latest plan to zero in on industries where accidents and illnesses run high by the results it produces, not the public relations impact that earlier special drives aimed for, AFL-CIO job safety expert George Taylor said.

Stressing that limited funding and a shortage of inspection and enforcement manpower have forced OSHA to go first for the more hazardous industries, Taylor said that kind of drive, to succeed, must be carefully planned and carried out for a sustained period. He said that the National Emphasis Program concentrating on foundries and metal stamping will have to be a lot better than two other special OSHA target programs, "which are aimed at public relations and accomplish little."

Taylor said that key questions—such as whether the National Emphasis Program is going to peter out at the end of one year and if the state programs to be used in the effort have been validly assessed—are unanswered, and until they are, the unions will withhold judgment.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Taylor said that although the breakthrough federal job safety and health law has been on the books for more than four years, the program that is supposed to roll back the annual toll of 2 million job-related injuries and deaths still isn't on track.

"Unfortunately, the Ford Administration and a good many people in management look at on-the-job health and safety as a pure dollar cost, taking into consideration nothing about the dollar benefits or human costs to the people who have not been protected and the costs in terms of lost time, deaths, illnesses," he said.

Taylor said that the most serious weakness of OSHA is a lack of determination and commitment in the Administration "to make the act work," but that shortcoming can't be corrected by statute, rule or table of organization.

Taylor was questioned by David Mallino of the Government Research Corp. and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc.

EVERYONE WHO HAS WORKED for social and economic progress knows it takes years of struggle, public education, compromise between adversaries, enough votes, enlightened and courageous leadership, and timing.

So it was that Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop saw the situs picketing/collective bargaining bill as the greatest opportunity in a quarter-century to bring some semblance of stability to the nation's chaotic construction industry.

The proposal was clearly in the national interest. Yet business conservatives and anti-union pressure groups mounted a multi-million dollar campaign of distortions and propaganda in an effort to torpedo the legislation.

The construction reform effort grew out of a need to deal with practical problems.

Back in 1949, a commercial building was being constructed in Denver by a general contractor. All the subcontractors were under union contracts except for the electrical contractor, who was paying 42.5 cents an hour below the union scale in the area. Denver unions in peaceful picketing publicized the job as "unfair."

The National Labor Relations Board found the picketing unlawful. A court of appeals reversed that ruling, but the Supreme Court upheld the NLRB's finding that the picketing was an illegal secondary boycott.

For 25 years, organized labor has sought to have the law amended to permit common situs picketing. President Truman and four Presidents since him, with their Secretaries of Labor, supported legislation to permit situs picketing.

Sec. Dunlop, relying on 35 years of experience as a mediator and expert on the industry, firmly believes that "mixing labor policy on any single job is not conducive to sound labor relations, to cooperation on a job nor to increased productivity."

SO DUNLOP, building on the work of his predecessors, painstakingly developed legislation with the cooperation of organized labor and industry representatives. President Ford gave his approval with the addition of such safeguards as providing for a 10-day notice period before picketing and written authorization to picket from the international union.

A companion bill to the situs legislation proposed a Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Committee to bring order and stability to the dispute-ridden industry.

The $80 billion industry has about 500,000 contractors, many of them in associations and many independent. Most of the workers are organized, with nearly three million in 17 unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and other construction workers in the Teamsters.

The common situs and bargaining legislation was carefully designed to serve several purposes. Permitting unions to picket an entire site to protest "unfair" conditions was expected to lead to either an all-union or all non-union project, thus improving chances of industrial peace on a jobsite. The bargaining provision aimed to restructure and stabilize the industry by involving national unions and employer groups, thus reducing the "whipsawing" and "leapfrogging" of local pacts.

Instead of supporting reforms in the national interest, newspapers and opponents of the legislation shifted the debate to issues of "individual freedom" and "coercive" unionsim.

The National Right to Work Committee—referred to by some as the "Right-to-Work-for-Less Committee"—mailed out four million pieces of propaganda to generate citizen pressure on Congress.

The Associated General Contractors—financed by dues from union contractors but dominated in policy by non-union operators from the South and Southwest—was aided by manufacturers and business groups in fighting the legislation. Dunlop called the AGC "schizoid" after it reneged on commitments by its leaders to support bargaining reforms.

SAFE WORKPLACES, not public relations impact will be the real measure of success or failure of OSHA's latest plan to zero in on industries where injuries and illnesses run high, said George Taylor, center, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by David Mallino, left, of the Government Research Corp. and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcall on Overriding Tax Bill Veto

The House on Dec. 18 failed to override President Ford's tax bill veto. The 265-157 vote was 17 short of the needed two-thirds majority.

Just before the vote, House members had been assured that this was the last opportunity to protect America's workers against a tax increase. A vote to sustain the veto was, therefore, a reckless gamble with the nation's economic recovery. Right votes (R) for overriding were cast by 246 Democrats and 19 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 125 Republicans and 32 Democrats.

New Downturn Threatened:

Ford Budget Policy Scored as 'Disaster'

unemployment," the study observed.

The analysis is part of the new congressional procedure for controlling the federal budget.

The report also noted that the economy probably will continue on its present path of moderate recovery and gradual diminuation of unemployment only through the first half of calendar year 1976.

"After mid-year, there is reason to expect that, in the absence of new policy steps, output growth will slow to a rate barely adequate to prevent a renewed rise in unemployment," the report said.

If there is to be growth in the economy after next June, the report continued, it must come either from personal consumption spending and business fixed investment or from an expansive fiscal policy.

"Some observers expect a strong pickup in personal consumption and business investment in 1976," the analysis noted. "However, there is as yet no clear statistical evidence that such a strengthening is occurring.

"Surveys of consumer sentiment and business investment plans suggest weakness in both these sectors."

Discussing alternative spending programs to the Administration's 1977 current services budget, the congressional committee staff noted that even the most expansive of the three policies which it examined would not produce strong recovery and rapid reduction in unemployment.

"Congress may wish to consider both the adoption of a fiscal policy more expansive than any considered here and the supplementation of that policy with a direct job-creation program," it suggested.

"The recession of 1975 has left behind it a legacy of extremely high unemployment rates," the staff study noted. "Even with a vigorous and sustained economic recovery, several years will be required to reabsorb this recession-induced unemployment through the normal workings of the labor market."

An immediate policy issue confronting Congress in its consideration of the 1977 budget will be the question of how best to deal with this excess unemployment, the analysis pointed out.

It said that besides a monetary and fiscal policy supporting steady and broadly based output growth, it may be necessary for Congress "to increase temporary employment opportunities either through expansion of existing public service and public works programs or through adoption of a new emergency jobs program."

Labor Press Photographer Sam Reiss Dies

New York—Sam Reiss, photographer for the labor press in New York for more than a quarter of a century, died here Dec. 27 after a long illness. He was 65 years old.

Reiss had served union publications, including the AFL-CIO News, continuously since 1948 until he became too ill six months ago to continue working.

He is survived by his wife, Helen, who is on the staff of the Service & Allied Industries Joint Board of the Clothing Workers; two daughters, Harriet Sanders and Jessie Reiss; and a sister, Rose Wasserman.

A native New Yorker, Reiss began his career as a photographer relatively late in life at the age of 38 after working as a shipping clerk in the clothing factories.

An exhibit of his work, titled, "An Eyewitness to Labor History, 1948-1975," opened a month ago at the gallery of District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees here. Sponsored by the Labor Press Council of Metropolitan New York with AFL-CIO President George Meany as honorary chairman, the exhibit will run through Feb. 6 and will then be made available for display at other union headquarters in the city.

Community Colleges, Labor Focus On Education Needs of Workers

More effective cooperation between organized labor and community and junior colleges to develop education programs responsive to the needs of union members was urged at a Washington conference.

The meeting, sponsored by the American Association of Community & Junior Colleges, the Auto Workers and the AFL-CIO, brought together community college representatives, government officials and union educators to discuss labor's growing concern over the educational needs of union members.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis opened the conference by tracing the history of the federation's support for the development of two year post-secondary institutions.

Davis noted that in the beginning AFL-CIO policy was related to the interest of union members in higher education for their children.

"Today, trade unionists themselves are returning to the classroom, therefore labor's concern about the curriculum for adults has sharpened our interest," he said.

In their recommendations the conference participants suggested that:

- Orientation seminars be provided for union and community college leaders to develop further cooperation.
- Local unions and community colleges seek ways to cooperate in such areas as the interchange of credit, labor studies programs, preretirement programs, job training and retraining, apprenticeship programs, and general education for members and their families.
- Labor education programs be given the same priority as the more traditional education programs that prepare people for management positions in business and industry.
- Programs being offered to labor constituencies be developed with the guidance of advisory committees composed of local labor representatives.
- The AACJC, with the assistance of the AFL-CIO and the UAW, act as a resource center to pool the information necessary for more effective cooperation.

Assessing the need for such cooperation, Dr. Lois S. Gray, assistant dean for extension and public service at Cornell University, told conference participants that low-paid white collar and blue collar workers, "traditionally left out of the mainstream of higher education," are enrolling in college in greater numbers because of economic, social, and institutional factors.

She pointed out that the needs and goals of the low-paid white collar and blue collar worker differ significantly from those of the middle class youths and adults who constitute the usual student body.

Yet community colleges are not equipped to provide the "relevant job-related instruction" they are seeking and that unions can provide, she said.

Herbert Levine, director of labor studies at Rutgers University, cited the efforts of unions to help their members become better educated through negotiated contract provisions. These may include educational leave plans, apprenticeship training programs, tuition refund plans, in-plant training, and union negotiated educational trust funds.

UAW Education Director Carroll Hutton suggested that the secondary education of union members should be the responsibility of both colleges and the labor movement. However, there is no structure to provide such service in an organized fashion, he observed.

Hutton said such a structure could provide competent instructional staff who relate to labor studies subjects; counseling in the area of labor studies; teaching materials, course outlines, and audio-visual aids; and the recruitment of participants for the programs.

Edmund J. Gleazer, president of AACJC, reported that community college programs and institutions are changing "in order to handle the enormous influx of students." He noted that the average age of a community college student is 28 years, "and still going up."

To meet the needs of these people, an "educational cooperative—a community resource center is needed," he said. Gleazer suggested that such a resource center could pool information on course materials, sources of funding for programs, and sources for instructional staff and students, and could coordinate the efforts of unions and community colleges to achieve the conference's objectives.

Labor Studies Center January Schedule

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center begins the second half of its academic year at Silver Spring, Md., with a busy January schedule. It will offer seven institutes, two of them off campus, during the month. In addition, the 54 students enrolled in the center's college degree program are scheduled for their semi-annual week-in-residence to prepare them for their next six months of study.

Here's the campus calendar for January:

Teachers—A training seminar for local and national AFT staff will cover such topics as grievance handling, arbitration and negotiations, and a COPE workshop. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 4, to Friday, Jan. 9.

Railroaders—A seminar for UTU vice presidents and directors will examine the UTU today, the current economy, working with general chairmen, working with the arbitrator, the economics of transportation, a neutral's view of public law boards, and legislative issues. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 11, to Friday, Jan. 16.

Leadership Skills—A multi-union institute will include workshops on how to speak in public, how to read efficiently, how to write effectively, how to deal with the media, and how to conduct a meeting. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 18, to Friday, Jan. 23.

Organizing—An institute for union organizers in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services will focus on the mechanics of an organizing campaign, problems of the organizer in dealing with prospective members, developing leadership and making in-plant committees work, the law of organizing, and the strategy and tactics of anti-union employers. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 18, to Friday, Jan. 23.

Flight Attendants—A training program for local officers of the Association of Flight Attendants. Topics will include the labor movement, collective bargaining in the airline industry, grievance procedure and grievance handling, and local council administration. From Monday, Jan. 26, to Friday, Jan. 30.

The off-campus institutes offered in January are:

Building Trades—An institute presented in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. for business agents. Topics include picketing activities, collective bargaining, administration and procedure under the Davis-Bacon Act, pensions and other funds under ERISA, and leadership psychology. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 11, to Friday, Jan. 16, at the University of Illinois, Champaign.

Arbitration—An institute on the preparation and presentation of arbitration cases involving grievances. Topics include arbitrability, arbitration law and the selection of arbitrators. Participants will prepare and present cases before a professional arbitrator. Each case will be videotaped for replay and analysis by the arbitrator. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 18, to Friday, Jan. 23, at the University of California, Berkeley.

Participants in the College Degree Program will be in residence at the campus from Jan. 25 to 31. Classes will include four labor studies survey courses: the labor movement, past and present; labor and the American political system; labor law and legislation, and collective bargaining. Other topics include political economy, writing and labor statistics. A non-credit workshop on study skills is also scheduled. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 25, to Saturday, Jan. 31.

Further information on these or other labor studies institutes can be obtained from Frederick Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Calls Veto Proof of 'Weakness':

knuckled under and broken his pledge."

In vetoing the bill, Georgine noted, Ford had chosen to disregard the advice of Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop, "the one man in his Administration who knows the construction industry both academically and practically."

The vetoed bill would have remedied a long-standing inequity in labor law that every President since Harry Truman has agreed should be corrected, Georgine said.

Included in the measure vetoed by the President was the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining legislation shaped largely by Dunlop to the goal of achieving greater stability in labor-management relations.

Some of the concessions the building trades made at White House insistence were "hard to swallow," Georgine said, but the unions accepted them "in good faith."

Dunlop, in a brief statement, said he knew the President had been under "substantial" pressures to veto the bill, adding:

"I am naturally disappointed, for I maintain my conviction that on its merit, the enactment of this legislation could have done much to stabilize the nation's construction industry."

Earlier, Dunlop had predicted "unmitigated hell" in construction industry labor-management relations if Ford vetoed the bill.

Dunlop indicated he will soon make a decision on whether to remain in the Cabinet.

Meany said the vetoed bill would have furthered industrial peace and acted as a "stabilizing mechanism for collective bargaining."

But Ford "proved himself too weak to stand up to right-wing political pressure," Meany charged. He couldn't recall any other president who "publicly promised to sign a bill and then ran out in the manner of Gerald Ford."

One of the early reactions to the Ford veto came in an editorial by Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough for the union's publication. Ford vetoed the bill "with one eye on Ronald Reagan," Carlough said. And the nation discovered that "the word of Gerald Ford is no good."

In addition to numerous private promises and public assurances given by authorized White House spokesmen, Ford on at least two documented occasions made a public commitment to approve the legislation in the form in which it eventually reached his desk.

In a televised Labor Day interview with reporters from three Milwaukee newspapers, Ford termed the legislative package "an acceptable solution to this long-standing conflict." And in a Sept. 12 question-and-answer session with participants in a St. Louis conference on economic affairs, Ford told an employer spokesman that he was aware of arguments against the site picketing bill. But nevertheless if the amendments he requested were approved—as they were—then "I will support it."

The battle over the legislation demonstrated the power that a coalition of anti-union employer groups and ideological rightists has within the Republican Party.

The pressure was first applied in Congress, where House Republicans voted 118-23 against a bill that supposedly had Administration support. And even among the more moderate Senate Republicans, the breakdown was 24-11 against the bill. Democrats supported passage by a 206-71 margin in the House and 41-19 in the Senate.

After a Senate fiilibuster was broken and it became evident that the legislation would reach the President, the right-wing pressure focused on the White House, adding to Ford's political jitters.

Ford's campaign manager, Howard Callaway, said in a Dec. 7 television interview that he had told Ford that "the best thing for him to do would be to veto that bill" if he wanted to get the Republican nomination. White House spokesmen said more than 625,000 communications had been received calling for Ford to veto the bill, although conceding that the great majority of them were form letters and cards.

When Ford caved in, anti-union groups were quick to pat him on the back.

He was praised by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for having made "the best choice" and the open-shop Associated Builders & Contractors hailed the President for resisting "inordinate pressure from the building trades unions."

As Dunlop and others knowledgeable in construction industry labor-management relations sought to convey, the vetoed bill would not have set loose a wave of building trades pickets and to the contrary would have done much to lessen the number of strikes.

Under certain conditions, it would have allowed a union with a legitimate dispute with a subcontractor to picket the common construction site used by the contractor and his subcontractors. Under a controversial 1951 Supreme Court decision, such picketing had been prohibited as an illegal secondary boycott.

But the bill would have required 10 days notice and approval of the parent union before such picketing could take place, and most residential construction would be exempt. Furthermore, the building trades had agreed to additional voluntary actions to limit common site picketing.

The veto also killed the Dunlop-drafted Construction Industry Collective Bargaining bill that would have brought parent unions and national contractor associations into the bargaining picture to minimize work stoppages over contract terms.

These provisions had "great merit," Ford said in his veto statement.

'Happy Birthday!'

'Compromise' Tax Bill Prevents Higher Rates

stand against "spending." The 265-157 tally was 17 short of the two-thirds needed to overturn the veto, even though Democratic leaders warned that there would be no second chance on the issue.

In the end, Republicans were able to deliver on their promise of another opportunity to vote for a tax cut—but only at the price of accepting such watered down language that it required semantic hair-splitting to read it as a commitment to balance off a tax cut against future spending limitations.

The language adopted did not include any dollar limitations on spending and said that if the tax cut were extended for the full year, "and if economic conditions warrant doing so," Congress will reduce fiscal 1977 spending "below what would otherwise occur" by the amount of the tax cut.

But there would be nothing to preclude Congress from setting either a higher or lower budget figure "if the Congress concludes that this is warranted by economic conditions or unforeseen circumstances."

Apart from that deliberately vague language, the tax bill was identical to the vetoed measure.

Assuming that the new tax bill is continued for the full year, most persons would end up paying a little less in taxes than they will for the current year. However, the amounts are close enough so that the present withholding tax tables will be continued.

The new legislation increases both the minimum standard deduction that can be claimed by anyone not itemizing tax deductions and the maximum deduction permitted under this formula. The low-income allowance—the minimum deduction—was set at $1,700 for single taxpayers and $2,100 for couples. Otherwise, taxpayers who do not itemize can deduct 16 percent of income up to $2,400 for single persons and $2,800 for joint returns.

A revised tax credit provision will allow each taxpayer to deduct whichever is higher of these two formulas:

- A $35 tax credit for each taxpayer and dependent—up from the $30 in the expiring law—or,
- A 2 percent tax credit on the first $9,000 of income (a $180 maximum), which would benefit single persons or those with small families.

A tax credit means the money can be subtracted from the amount of tax owed. All taxpayers and dependents would continue to receive the regular $750 personal exemption, which is subtracted from the amount of income that is subject to tax.

The tax changes do not apply to returns on 1975 income, which must be submitted by Apr. 15, 1976. They will apply to the tax on 1976 income, which will be computed on returns filed in early 1977.

Minimum Pay Rise Brings Gains To 4 Million Low-Paid Workers

The new year brings more pay in the checks of over 4 million of the country's lowest-paid workers as the federal minimum wage for most employes increased to $2.30 an hour. Many higher paid employes, however, will pay more social security taxes over the year due to an increase in the taxable wage base.

Under 1974 congressional amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, the minimum wage for workers whose jobs were covered by the FLSA prior to 1966 went from $2.10 an hour to $2.30 on New Year's Day. The Labor Dept. estimates that about 1.2 million workers in this group will benefit from the higher wage floor.

Also beginning on Jan. 1, the minimum wage of nonfarm workers brought under the FLSA since 1966 rose 20 cents an hour to $2.20. Their hourly wage will rise to $2.30 on Jan. 1, 1977. About 2.6 million workers in this category are immediately affected.

Another 86,000 workers, those employed on large farms, were due for an increase on New Year's Day from $1.80 an hour to $2. Their hourly wage will rise to the basic $2.30 in 1978.

Coverage was extended to a substantial group of retail service employes, also on Jan. 1, the Labor Dept. noted. Under 1974 amendments to the FLSA, employes of retail or service establishments that are parts of chains grossing $200,000 or more in sales are now covered by the minimum wage law.

This is a reduction from the $225,000 volume-of-sales test that went into effect on Jan. 1, 1975. The volume-of-sales test is slated to be eliminated completely on Jan. 1, 1977. At that time, more than 650,000 additional workers will have been brought under the wage-hour law.

While the social security tax rate remains the same—5.85 percent of covered earnings for workers and their employers and 7.9 percent for self-employed persons—the wage base on which social security taxes are computed was raised with the start of the new year.

An escalator provision in the social security law, tied to changes in average wage rates, automatically increased the taxable wage base from $14,100 a year to $15,300 as of Jan. 1. The new maximum will affect some 18 million workers with annual earnings of more than $14,100.

Also this year, the maximum amount that a beneficiary can earn and still receive social security checks increases to $2,760 in a year. The 1975 figure was $2,520.

3rd Quarter Profit Jump Exceeds Early Estimate

Corporate profits in the third quarter of 1975 rose even more than initially reported, the Commerce Dept. announced.

Revised government figures show after-tax earnings in the July to September period increased to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $82.6 billion—up 17.5 percent from the $70.3 billion rate of the previous quarter, the sharpest jump since 1950.

Earlier government estimates had put earnings in the September quarter at an $82.2 billion adjusted annual rate, or 17 percent over the second-quarter level.

About 75 percent of the profits rise in the July-September period was accounted for by manufacturing industries, especially durable producers such as automakers, the Commerce Dept. reported. Utilities, railroads, communications and trade concerns also posted large gains.

Stockholders' equity in manufacturing concerns increased in the third quarter to 12.4 percent from 11.8 percent in the second quarter, the government said.

Crafts Quit Committee Over Veto

Construction union leaders broke off a decade of top-level union, management and government consultation in the aftermath of President Ford's veto of the construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill.

All nine labor members of the Collective Bargaining Committee in Construction resigned, protesting what they considered a "double-cross" by management members as well as the President.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., said employer members who had helped shape the legislation and praised it in private backed off under pressure from right-wing anti-union groups.

Their cave-in gave Ford the excuse he used to break his word and veto the bill—that it no longer had support from "all the parties" in the construction industry.

Georgine, speaking for all the labor members, said it would be "a meaningless exercise" to continue the regular pattern of meetings that have continued under various organization names under the past three administrations.

The unions are still willing to take part in "meaningful and sincere" attempts to resolve construction industry problems, he said.

"But we have neither the disposition nor the time to play charades with a management which has indicated it is merely a proxy for the most virulent anti-union forces in the United States and a President overwhelmed by that group.

"It is sheer futility to meet with organizations which oppose the concept of collective bargaining," Georgine declared.

The labor members who resigned from the presidentially-appointed committee were, in addition to Georgine, Presidents Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers, John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, William Sidell of the Carpenters, Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; President-Emeritus Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, and Teamsters President Frank E. Fitzsimmons. The late president of the Laborers, Peter Fosco, had been a member and the vacancy had not yet been filled.

At a news conference, Georgine and the building trades union presidents said they saw "no way" President Ford would get any sig-

Labor Rallies Local Units For New Congress Drive

BUILDING TRADES leaders tell a news conference that President Ford and employer representatives broke faith with labor on the construction site picketing and bargaining bill. Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., announced the resignation of all labor members of the Collective Bargaining Committee in Construction.

Central Bodies' Role Cited on Key Issues

The return of Congress on Jan. 19 will touch off some bruising legislative battles, and the AFL-CIO looked to its state and local organizations to help make labor's voice heard before then.

Natural gas price deregulation and an attempt to override President Ford's appropriations bill veto will be at the top of the agenda for the second session of the 94th Congress.

The AFL-CIO opposes natural gas deregulation and supports the veto override attempt, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote officers of the federation's central bodies.

He urged the local and state leaders to get in touch with their congressmen and senators during the congressional recess because such home-town communication is "indispensable" to the AFL-CIO's legislative efforts in Washington.

Biemiller's letter cited AFL-CIO support for other pending legislation, including:

- A bill to establish a national postcard registration system for federal elections that is awaiting House action after having received committee approval. It will "encourage voter participation," Biemiller said, but is opposed by conservatives and Republicans "because of its potential impact on low income and minority voters."

- The Illegal Alien bill, also awaiting House action, that would impose penalties on employers who repeatedly and knowingly employ illegal aliens. The legislation, which is aimed at stemming the tide of illegal border-crossers who are often employed at sub-standard conditions, also includes an amnesty provision for persons with long residence and family ties in the United States.

131 Areas Suffer High Joblessness

Severe unemployment continued to grip 131 of the nation's 150 major labor areas classified by the Labor Dept. as having "substantial" joblessness in December.

As defined by the Labor Dept., substantial unemployment means the jobless rate in an area is 6 percent or more and is expected to stay at that level or higher for at least two months.

A year ago, only 55 major labor markets were classified as areas of substantial unemployment. A record was set last September when 135 of the 150 job areas were in the substantial joblessness category. The December total was one lower than in November. The government removed Kenosha, Wis., from the list as a result of an unemployment decline attributed to increased hiring in the non-manufacturing sector there.

Twenty-six smaller labor centers were added to the substantial unemployment list in December, lifting the total of such areas to 1,144. Of these, 290 were considered areas

In California Votes:

Farm Workers Add To Election Margin

Keene, Calif.—The Farm Workers are widening their lead over the Teamsters in representation elections conducted by the state Agricultural Labor Relations Board.

The UFW pulled away with a better than 2-to-1 margin during the past month. As of Jan. 2, the UFW reported it had won representation rights for 27,294 agricultural workers, compared with 12,344 for the Teamsters.

Since the state farm labor law went into effect a little over four months ago, the ALRB has held 355 elections. The UFW has won 191 against 102 for the Teamsters and 20 for "no union." There are 42 elections undecided because of various kinds of challenges.

Of the 54,644 agricultural workers involved in the 355 elections, the UFW won exclusive bargaining rights for 50 percent; the IBT 22.6 percent; no union 4.2 percent, and 23.2 percent are in units where the results are still undecided.

An early lead the Teamsters had taken over the UFW in head-to-head election contests is being dissolved by recent UFW victories—many coming in the Imperial Valley. The IBT edge at the beginning of 1976 was 69 victories for 10,706 workers to the UFW's 64 for 9,949 workers. But the Teamsters have not won a major election since mid-October, the UFW pointed out.

The Farm Workers are pulling farther ahead of the IBT with the victories in the Imperial Valley where most of the election activity is now centered.

Of the 14 elections conducted in the valley, the UFW won nine involving 1,189 workers and the Teamsters three for 330 workers. Two elections covering 860 workers are undecided.

Nine of the 14 valley ranches were under Teamsters contracts. The IBT managed to retain only two, while workers at five ranches voted to switch to the UFW and two others are undecided.

Illegal Aliens Costing Economy $13 Billion

An estimated 8 million aliens who are illegally living in the United States are costing America's taxpayers about $13 billion a year, according to studies commissioned by the Immigration & Naturalization Service.

A cost analysis prepared by an independent consulting firm for the Immigration Service made these major points:

- When illegal aliens take jobs that otherwise would be held by U.S. citizens or legal residents, there is both a loss in earnings to persons legally in the United States and welfare-related costs to taxpayers resulting from unemployment. The INS earlier had estimated that improved enforcement of immigration laws could free one million jobs for legal residents.

- To the extent that illegal aliens increase the demand for public services for which they do not pay their full share, the tax burden on citizens and legal residents is further increased. The report cited a New York Times estimate that in 1973 the education and welfare costs for illegal aliens totaled $180 million in New York City alone.

The analysis rejected the contention that illegal aliens help the economy by taking menial jobs that otherwise would go unfilled and

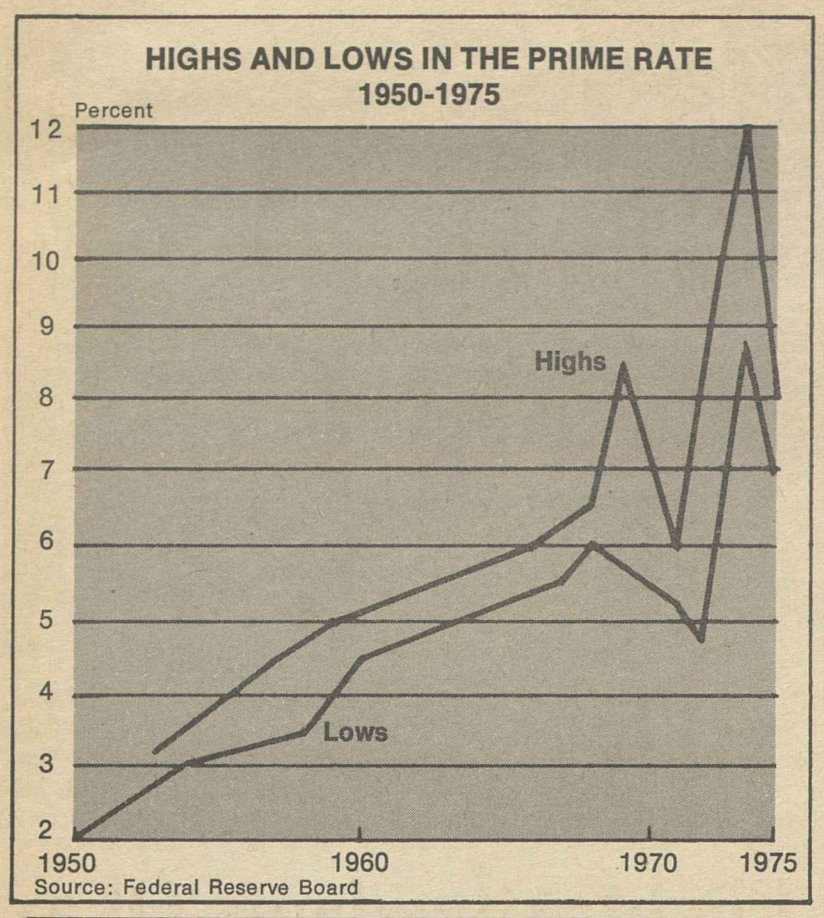
Washington Post Spurns Strike Settlement Plea

The Washington Post management flatly rejected an independent effort to bring about fair settlement of a three-month strike through mediated negotiations with the newspaper's striking craft unions.

The appeal from an ad hoc committee of about 100 religious, professional, union and political leaders—including 33 members of Congress—was printed as an open letter advertisement in the Washington Star.

The unions quickly accepted the proposal in a response issued by AFL-CIO President George Meany.



"All of the unions involved have authorized me to express their acceptance to this proposal without reservation," Meany said.

"They stand ready and willing to engage in continuous negotiations; to submit the dispute to fact-finding and, ultimately, to binding arbitration if collective bargaining is not successful."

Msgr. George G. Higgins, chairman of the Committee for a Fair Settlement, stressed in a press briefing that the group was not taking sides in the dispute, only seeking to bring the parties together for meaningful discussions in hopes of ending the dispute which began Oct. 1.

Pressmen of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union walked out initially. They were later joined by the stereotypers—a part of the same international—photo-engravers of the Graphic Arts Union, and mailers of the Typographical Union.

Washington Post Spurns Strike Settlement Plea

The Post broke off formal talks with the striking pressmen in December after declaring negotiations had reached an impasse and announced that the company would hire "non-union replacements."

Post Unions United, a coalition of the striking unions and members of other unions honoring picket lines, charged that the Post management ferried in by helicopter more than 60 strikebreakers before making the announcement.

Citing the adverse economic and psychological impact on Post employes, their families and the community, the committee outlined a four-step course of action to help resolve the dispute. It urged that:

- The parties engage in intensive, round-the-clock bargaining mediated by Director W. J. Usery, Jr., of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.
- If such efforts fail, they agree to fact-finding with recommendations for settlement.
- As a last resort, the parties should consider mutually acceptable procedures for arbitration.
- All questions of criminal guilt and civil damages be left to the courts to decide.

The last step is in reference to damage to the Post presses occurring before the walkout, which the Post management has been using in its public relations campaign against the unions. But outside estimates of the damages are far below what the Post had claimed they were.

Meany urged Post publisher Katharine Graham personally to consider the plea of the committee. He said, "I appeal to her to do what the unions have pledged to do—accept this proposal as the mechanism for settlement."

The Post response to the appeal was issued by Mark Meagher, a vice president of the publishing company, who said the proposal "would only raise unjustified, false hopes of a settlement" by reopening "sterile debate" with the ousted pressmen.

Meagher also contended that if the Post where to accept the proposal, it would "result in an even longer strike."

The union coalition noted that earlier efforts by the pressmen to bring in fact-finders and arbitrators also had been turned down.

Among the prominent leaders who signed the appeal were Senators Hubert H. Humphrey, James Abourezk and George S. McGovern; Representatives Yvonne B. Burke, Shirley Chisholm, Dominick V. Daniels and Frank Thompson, Jr.; Episcopal Bishop John T. Walker, Bishop Smallwood Williams, Rabbi Stanley Rabinowitz, and economist Leon H. Keyserling.

The list of union leaders included AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Francis S. Filbey, George Hardy and Jerry Wurf. Others included President Charles A. Perlik of the Newspaper Guild, President Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept., Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing Workers and Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

In other developments, U.S. District Court Judge Charles S. Richey issued a temporary restraining order directing the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild local to delay disciplinary trials of 337 Post unit members who have continued to cross picket lines during the strike against the directives of the local.

INDEPENDENT EFFORT to resolve the Washington Post strike, now in its fourth month, is announced by Msgr. George G. Higgins, chairman of the ad hoc Committee for a Fair Settlement. Unions involved in the dispute immediately accepted the proposal, but the Post management rejected it. Among committee members present for the press briefing were Francis B. Francois, left, and Leon H. Keyserling, former presidential economic adviser.

Entire Economy Set Back:

High Interest Rates Viewed As Big Factor in Recession

Interest rates, still close to the record peaks that helped plunge the economy into its deepest recession since the 1930s, enter into every price and push up the cost of everything that goes into the ordinary family's budget.

Anne Draper, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, notes in the AFL-CIO's monthly publication, the Federationist, that "the sharp rise of interest rates in 1973 and 1974 was a substantial factor in the general price inflation of those two years."

Examining the widespread impact of ever higher interest rates, the author points out that total interest charges paid by all sectors of the economy in 1973 came to $203.2 billion—up from $165.7 billion in 1972, according to latest estimates of the Commerce Dept.

In 1974, she says, total interest charges may have soared to the neighborhood of $240 billion.

"One of the most discouraging aspects of the interest-rate situation," Draper observes, "is that the rates never really come back down. Over the past 20-25 years the trend has been distinctly upward."

With an exception only in 1971, each new peak reached in successive interest rate cycles—usually corresponding to business cycles—has been higher than the last one.

"Fallbacks from these peaks have similarly tended to reach 'lows' at successively higher peaks," Draper adds.

This can be seen by tracing the highs and lows of the prime rate—the rate major banks charge their most creditworthy corporate customers—since January 1950.

After successive lows of 2, 3 and 3.5 percent in the 1950s, the prime rate had its next low of 4.5 percent in 1960—and has never been that low again.

The most recent low was 7 percent in June 1975. Similarly, 5 percent was the highest point reached by the prime rate before 1960, but it went to 6 percent in 1966, and then took off — to records of 8.5 percent in June 1969, 10 percent in September 1973 and 12 percent in July 1974, Draper notes.

Most interest charges are hidden, she observes. Yet in some industries interest charges are a major part of the price.

"The consumer foots the ultimate bill in the price of food, clothing, housing, transport and everything consumers buy—and interest rates also affect the amount paid in taxes," the author points out.

Besides the hidden charges in product prices, consumers pay direct interest charges when they borrow to pay for a house, an automobile, furniture, or to meet personal emergencies. They pay interest, too, when they use department store or credit revolving charge accounts for making other purchases.

Nowhere does the high price of borrowed money hit the average customer harder than in the mortgage interest rate on a home, the author notes. And over the past 20 years, those rates have doubled.

In 1952, the Federal Housing Administration's loan rate ceiling was 4.25 percent and the Veterans Administration's ceiling was 4 percent. By 1960, both had moved over 5 percent.

After more increases in the 1960s, the ceilings went to a record 8.5 percent in January 1970, dropping back to 7 percent in February 1971. But a new peak of 9.5 percent was hit in August 1974. The rate dropped back to 8 percent in March 1975, but returned to 8.5 percent in April, and moved up to 9 percent early in September.

High interest rates play an especially crucial role when money is in short supply, Draper notes. If money becomes very "tight" and very expensive, borrowing is discouraged and economic activity slows down. Production is cut back, sales drop, and a recession may be brought on.

Money scarcity and high interest rates generally hit housing first and hardest, the author observes. Next come state and local governments. The last affected are the large corporations which can bypass the banks for short-term money by borrowing from each other through the sales of "commercial paper" handled by professional dealers, Draper notes.

Consumers suffer the worst of both possible worlds where interest rates are concerned. As borrowers, they usually are charged the highest interest rates while, as savers, they tend to receive minimum interest.

"With mounting debt have come even larger outlays for interest charges, because of skyrocketing increases in interest rates," Draper points out. "For the year 1973, Commerce figures on total money interest payments show a staggering $203.2 billion paid out, up 23 percent over the payout in 1972, and up 119 percent over 1967."

When the government's report is put together for the year 1974, she observes, it is bound to show another very large outlay for interest payments.

Job Death Rate Highest Among Fire Fighters

Fire fighting continues to be the most dangerous occupation in the United States, with 84 fire fighters per 100,000 losing their lives on the job during 1974, according to the latest survey of the Fire Fighters' union.

The fire fighting on-the-job death rate compares with 71 per 100,000 for mining, the next highest category, and 51 per 100,000 for police. The 1974 figure for fire fighters is 23 percent higher than the 1973 rate, the survey reported.

The latest IAFF survey is based on deaths and injuries suffered during 1974 and reported by about three-quarters of the nation's public fire services. The survey also uses government and National Safety Council statistics. Among other findings:

- Fire fighters had 47.3 job injuries per 100 workers during the year—nearly a 50 percent chance of being injured. While the vast majority of injuries was suffered fighting fires, 215 were sustained going to or returning from false alarms, and another 185 were the result of individual violence. A total of 523 job-related injuries forced men into retirement.
- Occupational disease forced 604 fire fighters to change occupations or retire during the year. Of these, 371 had heart disease and 110 had lung disease.
- Occupational diseases claimed the lives of 111 fire fighters during the year, 79 percent of them from heart disease.

The union said that over the past 10 years, fire fighters have suffered an average of 86 deaths on the job per 100,000 each year, compared to 55 per 100,000 for police.

IAFF President William H. McClennan, announcing the results of the survey today, said:

"Somehow, we must turn down this awful death rate. What can we do to persuade public officials that, in the dangerous fire service, a cut in manpower is an invitation to death — that economy in dollars very often means extravagance in the waste of human life?"

Task Force Probing NLRB Procedures

A task force organized to streamline rules and speed up the case-processing of the National Labor Relations Board held its first meeting after being sworn in by NLRB Chairman Betty Murphy.

The 27-member panel, named last month, is made up of representatives of labor, management, the academic community and NLRB officials. The AFL-CIO is represented by Associate General Counsel Robert C. Mayer and Special Counsel Laurence Gold. All members are labor-law attorneys.

During the swearing-in ceremony, Murphy described the challenge facing the task force as the most important in the history of the 40-year-old federal agency.

The NLRB now is burdened with a caseload "which soon will tower over this agency and threaten its effectiveness," she said, noting that the number of cases filed is running at a rate of 50,000 a year and probably will reach 70,000 by 1980.

The task force, engaged in a two-year study, will carry out its principal work through three different committees. Gold was assigned to the committee covering representation proceedings while Mayer was named to the committee dealing with unfair labor practices from filing of charge through the hearing.

The third committee will study unfair labor practice proceedings from the close of trial through decision by the five-member NLRB, then enforcement, compliance and close of case.

The panel, which will publish a report on its recommendations by the end of 1976, will meet quarterly in Washington. Its next meeting is scheduled Apr. 5-6.

Murphy announced that the public has been invited to submit written suggestions, comments and criticisms of present NLRB procedures for the task force's consideration.

NLRB General Counsel John S. Irving, at the panel's first session, observed that "this is not a hopelessly case-clogged agency."

Ninety percent of the unfair labor practice charges now filed with the NLRB are investigated and disposed of informally and, in most cases, in less than 50 days, he noted. Yet, in those cases requiring full board attention, the average is 334 days.

"The collective wisdom of the members of this task force has an unlimited potential," Irving said. "All of you know us and know the agency. We now ask that you look us over carefully and tell us where you think we can improve."

Murphy said that "both the board and the general counsel want to do a better job, an even more efficient job—without any lessening of due process or quality."

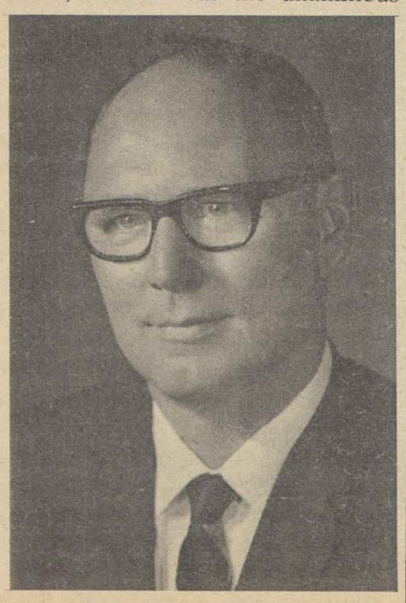
"We are looking to you to find solutions to our pernicious problems of delays in case-handling," she told the task-force members.

TASK FORCE on the National Labor Relations Board is sworn in at the federal agency's headquarters in Washington by NLRB Chairman Betty Southard Murphy. Members of the panel, all labor law experts, include AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Robert C. Mayer and Special Counsel Laurence Gold. Its job over the next two years is to study NLRB procedures with an eye toward speeding up the processing of cases, now running at the rate of 50,000 a year.

'Welfare' Tag Rejected For Benefit Plans

A government union leader accused the Ford Administration of trying to stick a misleading label on social insurance programs in order to sway public opinion and hold down benefits.

President Clyde M. Webber of the American Federation of Government Employees attacked the attempt to get people to think of such programs as social security, Medicare, unemployment compensation and civil service retirement as forms of welfare.



All are based on an insurance concept and are largely financed by payroll levies, Webber noted in an editorial in the AFGE's newspaper. Yet, he said, the Ford Administration tries to make these social insurance payments appear to be a form of handout.

Engineers Elect Conlon Secretary-Treasurer

Russell T. Conlon has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Operating Engineers, to complete the term of J. C. Turner who moved up to the presidency on Jan. 1.

Conlon has been resident vice president at the union's Washington, D.C., headquarters, working under Hunter P. Wharton who is now the union's president-emeritus, following his resignation.

A former president of the Western Conference of Operating Engineers, Conlon was the unanimous choice of the union's executive council to fill the secretary-treasurer vacancy. He is 58.

RUSSELL T. CONLON

Conlon's home local, which he served in many offices including business manager, is the Seattle-based Local 302. He has been a vice president of the Washington State AFL-CIO, president of the Joint Crafts Council of 21 Seattle-based unions, and co-chairman of the Columbia Pacific Joint Labor-Management Council.

The union's executive board also named Daniel F. Gagliardi, president of the New York State Conference of Operating Engineers, as a general vice president, filling the vacancy left by the elevation of Conlon.

The terms to which Conlon and Gagliardi were elected run until the union's convention in April.

The board also filled two trustee vacancies, electing Herman B. Jones of St. Louis and David E. B. Miller of Pittsburgh.

Pamphlet Combats Food Stamp Attacks

The Meat Cutters have opened a drive to defend the food stamp program against Ford Administration and right-wing attacks. The union has a new four-page pamphlet, for its locals and other interested groups, which answers the "half-truths and outright lies" used against the food stamp program.

It asks readers to write their congressmen and senators to "support this urgently needed program," and urges: "Let's prevent hunger. Let's not create more of it."

Copies of the "Freedom from Hunger" pamphlet may be obtained without charge from the Washington office of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen, 100 Indiana Ave. NW, Washington, D.C. 20001.

IBEW Gains First Contract At Burroughs

New York—A two-year agreement providing for wage increases totaling 29 percent ended a 65-week strike against the Burroughs Corp. by 180 members of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

It is the local's first contract with a major computer firm. The agreement covers 180 service and repair technicians who formed the bargaining unit two months before the strike began in August 1974.

The contract, retroactive to last Oct. 31, provides for a 14 percent wage increase to all employes hired prior to Aug. 24, 1974. Three additional wage boosts of 5 percent each will go into effect next Apr. 30, Oct. 30 and Apr. 30, 1977, for a total of 29 percent.

The agreement also specifies union recognition and security provisions, dues check-off and grievance procedures, arbitration and seniority rules.

Other benefits include stand-by and bereavement pay, paid insurance and retirement funding and double-time pay for overtime work.

One issue blocking an earlier settlement was the company's insistence on reprisals against some of the strikers. The firm at first refused to reinstate four strikers, but later agreed to rehire two of the four.

Flight Attendants Okay National Airlines Pact

The Flight Attendants ended their long strike against National Airlines Jan. 4 after ratifying a new 46-month agreement by a vote ratio of more than 3 to 1.

Meanwhile, in other airline industry bargaining, the Machinists approved a 33-month pact covering mechanics and other ground personnel at Northwest Orient Airlines.

Settlement of the National dispute will bring substantial benefits, including wage increases totaling about 30 percent over the life of the agreement, to the 1,200 members of the Flight Attendants involved.

Under the pact, which is retroactive to Feb. 1, 1974, the annual salary of a flight attendant with 10 years of experience will increase to $13,860 as of May 1, 1977, compared to $10,740 under the old pay scale.

The settlement also calls for improvements in vacations, health and life insurance coverage, sick leave and expense allowances, a new dental insurance plan and a new pension plan.

To be eligible under the new pension plan, flight attendants under 25 years of age must have two years of service with National and those 25 years or older must have one year of service.

The normal retirement benefit will be $10 per month per year of service for service prior to Jan. 1, 1976, and $12 per month per year of service for service after Jan. 1. Employe contributions to the plan will be 4 percent of earnings above $500 a month. One hundred percent vesting is achieved after 10 years of service.

The National strike began last Sept. 1. The new contract was tentatively agreed to last October but rejected in a mail ballot the following month. A federal judge in Miami last month ordered the stewards and stewardesses to reconsider the pact.

During the strike, National received an estimated $52.5 million under the airline industry's so-called mutual aid pact. The plan provides a struck airline with part of its normal operating expenses from unaffected carriers who are members of the pact.

The new Northwest contract calls for pay increases totaling more than 24 percent over the life of the agreement. It covers about 3,200 mechanics and related employes, flight kitchen workers and plant protection personnel.

The pact includes an escalator clause providing cost-of-living increases effective Sept. 1, 1976, and Sept. 1, 1977. Insurance coverage and pension benefits also are improved.

Detroit Central Body Mourns J. H. Gourlay

Trenton, Mich.—John H. Gourlay, secretary-treasurer of the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO, died at his home here at the age of 48. He had served in the central body post since 1969, and since late 1974 also held the post of Wayne County auditor.

Gourlay, who leaves his wife, Patricia, four daughters and three sons, also had served for 15 years as the chief financial officer of Gas Workers Local 80 of the Service Employees.

AFGE Wins Back Pay for Navy Guards

Dahlgren, Va.—A union's persistence brought a $103,673 Christmas season bonus to 80 civilian guards at the Naval Surface Weapons Center here.

It was a byproduct of a landmark ruling by the General Accounting Office upholding the claim of the American Federation of Government Employees that uniformed guards must be paid for dress-up time and other work that previously was not compensated.

While the 1974 ruling involved guards employed by the General Services Administration, which is the federal government's housekeeping agency, the AFGE successfully contended that the same principle applied to guards employed directly by the Dept. of Defense.

At the Dahlgren installation, the Navy first balked at paying any retroactive overtime and then sought to "economize" by shaving five minutes from the 20 minutes of daily extra work performed by the guards.

The AFGE had to obtain a supplementary ruling from the General Accounting Office admonishing the Navy to pay the full claim. In one case, the added five minutes a day—stretching back for up to 12 years of retroactivity—was worth $520. The highest single payment received through the union's intervention amounted to $5,145.

A Backward Glance

AS WE ENTER the bicentennial year, we might take heed and solace in a backward glance at the centennial—one hundred years ago.

It was a bad moment for America. In the presidential election of that year, nobody won. The State of Florida turned up with two sets of electors—one pledged to the Democrat Samuel Tilden and the other to the Republican Rutherford Hayes.

A special commission of 15 was appointed from House, Senate and Supreme Court to decide the outcome. By a fluke, the body was made up of eight Republicans and seven Democrats who, after an objective examination of all the facts, proceeded to vote according to party line.

Behind the commission action, however, larger forces were moving. The Democrats, especially from the South, assented to the Hayes election in exchange for a promise that the new Republican President would withdraw federal troops from the occupied South.

Behind this Compromise of 1876 was an even more profound understanding: the propertied gentlemen of both North and South agreed that they had more in common with one another than with the former chattel slaves of Dixieland or the "wage slaves" of Yankeeland.

Out of this gentlemen's agreement grew a conservative coalition of northern Republicans and Southern Democrats that dominated the Congress of the United States almost uninterruptedly for the ensuing century.

The next year—1877—a severe depression hit the country. In the absence of unemployment insurance or federal work projects or a federal employment service, jobless men wandered loosely over the country in search of work. They were called hoboes. And wherever they collected in great numbers, they were tinder for ignition.

The spark came from a strike against the railroads when the companies tried to cut wages. The walkout became a nationwide riot, the most widespread in American history, that edged on open rebellion. Because Hayes had demobilized the federal troops, there were not enough regulars to put down the uprising.

The militia sympathized with and joined the strikers. The hoboes crashed the party to vent free-floating anger, to set fire to whatever was burnable, and to loot whatever was portable.

The only reason that 1877 was not the year of the Second American Revolution was that there was nobody around to organize the revolution. The strikers didn't want it. The hoboes were too intoxicated with looted liquor. And the only professional revolutionaries around were cooped up in scattered sects debating Anarchism versus Marxism in German.

Judging by the opening acts of the drama—the years 1876 and 1877—the second century of American freedom was bound to be an ugly tragedy. And yet—in that century, the standard of living rose; unions were recognized; voting rights were extended to women, blacks and the young; riots were contained; America became a great world power; and with all its faults, its way of life became the envy of millions on this pained planet.

A Word Edgewise:

Nazareth's Election of Arab Proves 'Racism' Line Hollow

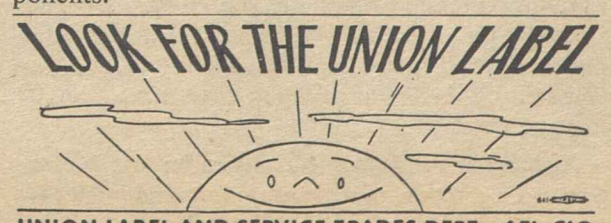
By John P. Roche

IT WAS ONE OF THOSE strange coincidences. Over the holidays, with their joyous distractions, the pile of newspapers and magazines "to be read" almost reached the arm of my chair. So, on a dreadful day with a nor'easter hurling sleet on my study windows, I got down to work, first turning on the FM to what my daughter calls a "schmaltz" station where you get 50 minutes of decent music an hour. I was about five hours into the pile when the music stopped for one of those two-and-a-half-minute spot interviews. Whose somber voice should materialize? The Rev. Daniel Berrigan, S.J. The gist of his message was that the colleges were "black holes of despair" where the faculty no longer accepted leadership responsibilities.

Berrigan's view of college life interests me minimally, reflecting—I suspect—the fact that he no longer enjoys prophetic status among a quite sophisticated generation of students.

But hearing this voice from the past did remind me that he was the first non-Arab spokesman for the "Zionism is racism" line, or, perhaps to put it more accurately, the first "radical" Christian to provide this position with respectability. This was particularly true as a consequence of his close association with eminent Jewish rabbis in the anti-Vietnam movement.

At the time I blew open the story of Berrigan's comparing Israel with Nazi Germany, I suggested he had a real future as a chaplain to the Palestine Liberation Organization. But apparently he is still wandering around the country in search of the revolutionary parish that vanished about five years ago. He can still call spirits from the vasty deep, but they no longer reply.



Enough of Berrigan; he is hardly worth a column. What was singular about his brief intervention into my reading was that the next item I turned to reported that an Arab Israeli Communist, Toufik Zayad, had been elected mayor of Nazareth (he is also a member of the Knesset, Israel's parliament). The mayor came on sounding like a trainee of Tammany: His first pledge was to keep politics out of city hall. (As any realistic analyst knows, when a mayor makes this announcement, you put a grand jury on standby.)

But our concern here is not with future patronage in Nazareth; it is the incredible symbolism of the event, particularly in the light of the recent gang-rape of Israel by the United Nations and its various sub-agencies, on the Berrigan concept that "Zionism is racism." Note that Zayad is both an Arab and a Communist, but the Israeli authorities have not declared martial law in Nazareth even though the Arab and Communist powers are their dedicated enemies. Nobody has hit the panic button. Prime Minister Itzak Rabin was probably not overjoyed, but in a free society that's the way the cookie crumbles. Indeed, if one thought they had the wit, time and talent, he would suspect the Israeli government of rigging Zayad's election. (Knowing something about how governments operate, however, convinces me no one thought of it.)

TO MAKE THE POINT more starkly, can you imagine a headline: "Syrian Jew Elected Mayor of Damascus?" Of course not: The few Jews remaining in Syria who have not been lynched are imprisoned in ghettos and generally treated like dogs by Arab racists. If they held elections in this enlightened state, Jews would be disfranchised.

Yet down the block in Israel one of those poor persecuted Palestinians, and a Communist to boot, is not only elected to the Knesset, but mayor of Nazareth by the free franchise of his constituents—a majority of whom are poor, persecuted Palestinians. Similarly, more Arabs vote in Israeli local elections in the formerly Jordanian-held sector of Jerusalem than ever voted in the history of the Kingdom of Jordan.

Fundamentally there are two schools of thought in this world about legitimate government. The first says, "When in doubt, shoot the opposition;" the second, "When in doubt, count the votes." Not only does Zayad's election put the lie to the accusation that Israel is "racist," but it also indicates that the Jerusalem government is among the embattled few states (Pat Moynihan's figure was 28-30) that count votes rather than shoot opponents.

Romantic Myths:

Neo-Marxists Ignore History In Homage to 'Socialist' Giants

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

FATHER ROBERT BOSC, S.J., a well-known French social scientist has posed a series of "Questions for the American People" in a bicentennial article published in a recent issue of the Jesuit weekly, America, of which he is a corresponding editor reporting from Paris. His first question is addressed to the American working class: "Why is the Marxist line . . . so weak in the American labor movement? Does it mean that the American worker, while fighting for better pay within the capitalist system, is really on the side of the wealthy in the worldwide class struggle?" Father Bosc gracefully concedes that this question not only may be but is, in fact, naive because "it ignores so much of history." It does, indeed.

The fact that American scholars who, over the years, have addressed themselves to Bosc's familiar question have yet to reach anything like a consensus. Their widely divergent answers are summarized in a recent 750-page symposium entitled "Failure Of A Dream? Essays in the History of American Socialism," edited by John H. M. Laslett and Seymour Martin Lipset.

Father Bosc says that, while his question may be naive, "it is going to be on the lips of most visitors who will be coming from overseas next year and who cannot help but think in terms of class structure." That's a broad generalization—almost as sweeping as Father Bosc's rather dyspeptic criticism of American news coverage which, he says, "is about as useful as the minimal and biased information doled out by the Soviet media." My own limited exposure to French journalism and to government-controlled French television makes me wonder, parenthetically, why a sophisticated Parisian would want to make such a patronizing statement—but that's another matter.

In any event, if it be true (which I question) that "most" visitors coming to the U.S. for the Bicentennial will be asking, with Father Bosc, why "the Marxist line . . . is so weak in the American labor movement," I would recommend that they read the Laslett-Lipset symposium before jumping to any conclusions.

I would also recommend the Laslett-Lipset tome (and a number of related studies in labor history) to those American Catholics who have suddenly discovered that Marxism is our only hope (or, as some would have it, the only "Christian" option) and are asking, with Father Bosc, why the American labor movement has yet to get the message. I fully agree with them, of course, when they say that we ought to take Marxism seriously, but I have the uneasy impression that that's precisely what some of them are not doing. I also have the impression that their neo-Marxist criticism of the American labor movement tends, by and large, to be rather superficial because it "ignores so much of history."

Among American neo-Marxists it is standard procedure, for example, to contrast the alleged ultra-conservatism of the present leadership of the American labor movement with the alleged radicalism of the "socialist" giants of an earlier period in American labor history: Terence Powderly of the Knights of Labor; Eugene Debs, the beloved Mother Jones of Mine Worker fame, and Big Bill Haywood of the IWW, to cite but a few examples. These were significant figures, of course, in American labor history, each in his or her own way, and are rightly honored in the pantheon of American social reform. More often than not, however, their present-day admirers tend to romanticize their contribution to the cause of social reform and to exaggerate their commitment to socialism.

The Knights of Labor, for example, despite its radical-sounding rhetoric, was basically a conservative movement. As one of the contributors to the Laslett-Lipset volume puts it: "The Knights of Labor were . . . against the system of wage slavery. But what they meant was a return to self-employment or, where that was no longer possible, to producer co-ops: to the old idea of do-it-yourself, singly or collectively."

Similarly, Mother Jones' commitment to socialism (which was never more than skin deep) has been demythologized by recent scholars. Her latest biographer makes it abundantly clear that, while she believed in the collective ownership of certain basic industries (not a very radical program), socialism was not "the keystone of her thought—economic betterment by whatever means (and chiefly by traditional trade unionism) was.

Again, the IWW, according to another contributor to the Laslett-Lipset symposium, was despite its fiery rhetoric, "much more the left wing of the American labor movement than of the socialist movement." And Eugene Debs, with all due respect to his personal integrity and charismatic style, proved in the end to be an ineffectual messianic prophet, the victim of "a shallow dogmatism" which gave him "the illusion of an inflexible morality."

Not everyone will agree with these negative judgments, but, at the very least, it would be well for some of our latter-day American neo-Marxists to take such judgments into account before jumping to the conclusion that the contemporary labor movement has sold out to "capitalism" and can only be redeemed by going back in sackcloth and ashes to the kind of radical "socialism" supposedly represented by Terence Powderly, Mother Jones, Eugene Debs, Big Bill Haywood, et al.

The present-day labor movement has its share of weaknesses and limitations, but it deserves better than to be contrasted uncritically with earlier movements which, for a variety of reasons, proved to be ineffectual and, besides, were never quite as committed to "socialism," however one defines that very fluid concept, as some of their contemporary admirers seem to think they were.

Ford Veto of Site Picketing Bill Tied to '76 Campaign Tactics

PRESIDENT FORD's inability to withstand political pressure from right-wing conservative Republicans and keep his pledge to sign the situs picketing bill is sure to be a major issue in the 1976 elections, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. declared.

The "emotion and hysteria" that built up around the measure were largely the products of a vicious campaign waged by the National Right to Work Committee, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable, and were not a valid expression of public sentiment, Georgine stressed. He said that nearly all of the anti-situs picketing mail that went to the White House was "created by the Right-to-Work Committee—mail-in postcards."

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Georgine cited a report that "contractors and businessmen pressing for a veto had used the tactic of sending to Ford headquarters unsigned checks for up to $1,000" along with promises to sign those checks if Ford would go back on his word to the labor movement and veto the measure.

"Now, if that isn't buying and paying for a veto, I don't know what is," Georgine declared. He added that the public at-large, not just union members, should understand, during the 1976 presidential campaign, "there is a lack of trustworthiness in the current presidency."

Georgine pointed out that site picketing was only one feature of the bill, and that Ford's veto also killed a number of steps that would have brought a good measure of stability to collective bargaining in the construction industry. He said those collective bargaining provisions were what Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop had in mind when he said "there will be unmitigated hell" as thousands of construction industry contracts come up for renewal in 1976.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE NATION ended 1975 with joblessness still around 8 million, the unemployment rate still above 8 percent, and little or no indication that either the White House or Congress really intends to do much about it.

A Joint Economic Committee staff report argues that President Ford's plan to hold down federal spending will slow down the economy so much that joblessness will start rising again.

Even an expansionary policy of federal budget increases and further tax cuts—which Ford would oppose—will not reduce unemployment much below 8 percent, the congressional economists figure. The study is more pessimistic than the forecasts of many private economists.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Joint Economic Committee chairman, has already said that Ford's budget policy "is a disaster."

Organized labor agrees. It will be working hard for the expenditure of more federal funds to get the jobless problem solved and to get the economy moving again in a meaningful way.

Unless things change radically in Washington, the nation can expect continuing high unemployment and continuing inflation next year. The Joint Economic Committee study predicts a 6.6 percent rate of economic growth, compared with 1975's estimated 3.2 percent decline in output due to the recession. Consumer price inflation will run at a rate of 7.1 percent in 1976, down from 1975's 9.2 percent, according to the committee report.

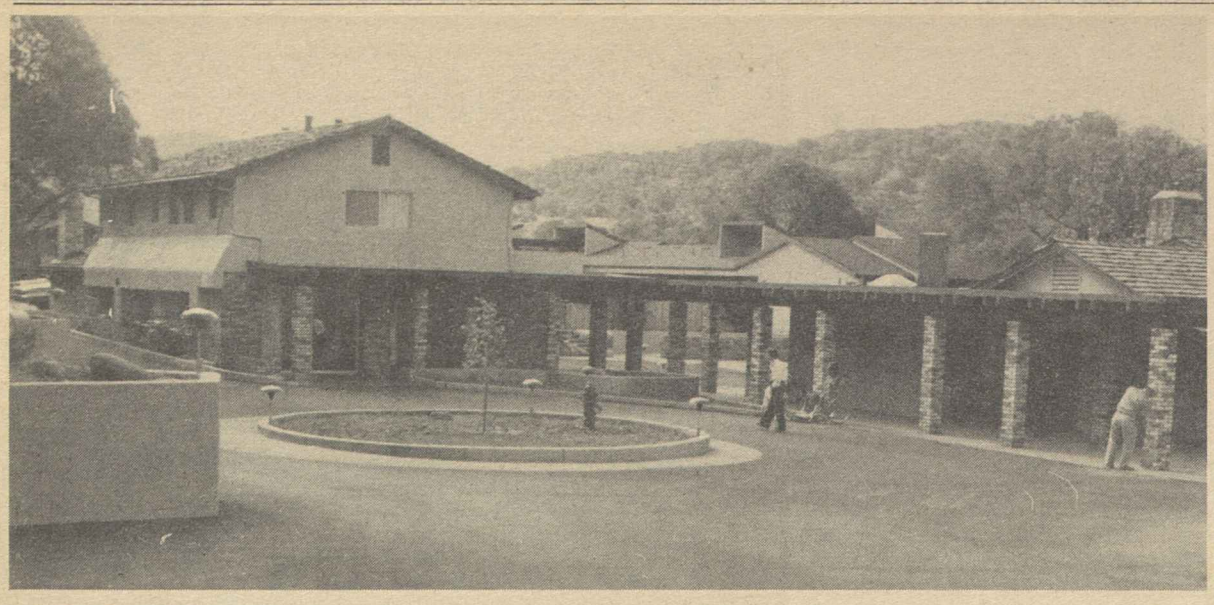
Unemployment in 1976 will average 7.9 percent, compared with an 8.5 percent average in 1975, the committee staff figures. What that means in "people" is that there will continue to be about 8 million unemployed Americans looking for work and probably another 2 million working only part time because they cannot find full-time jobs, or sitting at home discouraged to the point where they have given up the job search.

BUT THEN, the committee study predicts the economy will lose momentum in late 1976 and remain sluggish in 1977. The study forecasts economic growth of only 3.8 percent in 1977, too little to absorb any of the 7.9 percent unemployment rate. Consumer price inflation for 1977 is predicted at 6.9 percent.

What the committee report is arguing, in effect, is that neither private business nor consumer spending will rebound strongly enough in 1976 to keep any recovery rolling. Labor has been saying this ever since the AFL-CIO General Board meeting of January 1975.

The state of the U.S. economy could be changed by new directions in federal fiscal policy, the joint committee staff report says.

Ford, for example, has promised to submit in January a fiscal 1977 budget that limits federal spending to $395 billion, about $28 billion less than what he figures expenditures would be without any effort to restrain them. The new budget will apply to the fiscal year starting next Oct. 1.



The joint committee report thinks the $395 billion spending ceiling "could cause a severe setback of economic recovery." It forecasts that under such a budget economic growth would decline to 1.9 percent in 1977 with joblessness rising to 9 percent by the last quarter and inflation continuing at 6.5 percent.

One of the report's suggestions is for the government to plan a $428 billion budget for the new fiscal year, with a further 10 percent income tax cut starting next Oct. 1. Even this would produce only a 4.6 percent economic growth in calendar 1977, leaving joblessness at a 7.9 percent rate and inflation near 6 percent.

What this all adds up to is that Congress, if it is really going to do anything about the continuing massive unemployment, is going to have to consider policies that are much more expansionary than any of those reviewed in the committee report.

UNABLE TO STAND UP to pressures from the National Right to Work Committee, right-wing Republicans and others, President Ford broke his word to the labor movement when he vetoed the construction site picketing bill, President Robert A. Georgine, center, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. charged. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

HOUSING PROJECT for handicapped persons financed by a $2.3 million construction loan from the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust nears completion at Carmel Valley, Calif. The facility has eight one- and two-story buildings with 130 rental units.

Labor's Mortgage Investment Trust Spurs Housing Goals, Builds Jobs

Union funds funneled through the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust are currently financing the construction of 2,000 low- and moderate-income housing units while helping create needed jobs for underemployed building trades craftsmen.

In projects under way throughout the country, the trust has commitments exceeding $42 million, which would provide 2.8 million manhours of work. About 75 percent of the commitments are for housing of low-income families.

The trust, established in 1964, has shown substantial growth in recent years as union investments have increased from $10.4 million in July 1970 to more than $61 million in mid-1975.

In recent years, the trust has financed the construction of more than 5,900 housing units costing more than $105 million and involving about 9.7 million manhours of work.

Most of the MIT projects involve multi-family dwelling units, and loans are limited to federally insured and guaranteed mortgages. Current MIT-financed projects are in California, Connecticut, Ohio, Michigan, Nevada, Kansas and Wisconsin.

In Carmel Valley, Calif., the trust has $2.3 million committed in the RSVP at Rippling River project, now nearing completion, involving 130 rental units for handicapped persons. The project incorporates a community room, a central dining facility, and ramps for wheel chairs.

In Kansas City, Kan., the Crosslines Retirement Center of 120 units is being financed by a $2.9 million MIT loan. Accessory features include a lounge, crafts shop, and recreation and treatment rooms.

Other facilities for the elderly under construction with MIT financing include the Clark Towers in Las Vegas, Nev., with a $2.3 million loan for 134 units and in Napa, Calif., for 50 units at Rohlff's Manor under a $973,500 loan.

Other construction for low- and moderate-income families include investments of $5.7 million in Willoughby Hills, Ohio, $6.6 million in Willowick, Ohio, and $4.3 million in the Salvation Army Apartments at Santa Rosa, Calif.

One non-housing project the MIT financed recently was the construction of a $2.5 million community health center in Chicago. The Mile Square Health Center was designed to serve about 25,000 persons, largely from minority groups, on the city's near west side.

William Tutt, acting finance manager of the trust, noted that organized labor has long been in the forefront of efforts to provide decent homes and decent jobs for all Americans, and the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust is a major instrument in furthering those goals.

Participation in the co-mingled trust fund is open to all AFL-CIO affiliates and to any qualified labor-management welfare, pension or retirement plan, Tutt pointed out.

He stressed that the MIT programs not only spur the construction of needed housing and the expansion of job opportunities, but they also provide an attractive investment vehicle for union funds. The average return to all MIT investors for the past two years has been about 8 percent, he reported.

Despite Court Order:

Pittsburgh Teachers Hold Firm in Strike

Pittsburgh — Some 4,400 school teachers and teacher aides, members of the American Federation of Teachers, Local 400, pressed their strike for better wages and working conditions despite a court order to return to work.

As the walkout neared the end of its sixth full week, union members continued to picket city schools in the face of an order from Common Pleas Court Judge Donald E. Ziegler to end the walkout and return to their classrooms. A huge rally was held to protest the school board's failure to bargain reasonably.

Ziegler held the union in contempt of court for failing to obey his back-to-work order, and fined it $25,000 on Jan. 8. He noted that the fine would not be enforced if the teachers reported back to their classrooms Jan. 12.

However, Ziegler noted, if the striking teachers did not return by that date, he would impose an additional $35,000 fine, plus a $10,000 penalty for each day they failed to comply.

The teachers' strike got under way last Dec. 1.

Local 400 President Albert Fondy charged that the school board's most recent salary offer was "nothing less than immoral" because of the inadequacy of the amounts proposed. The wage proposals also failed to include cost-of-living provisions which the AFT seeks.

Other major issues in the dispute include job security and unemployment compensation coverage, school discipline, class size maintenance and guarantees, teaching schedules and fringe benefit improvements.

Fondy said "there has not as yet been agreement on even one item of any real significance."

On class size, Fondy observed, the school board wants to enlarge the average class size to between 33 and 38 pupils. In addition, he said, the board wants to be able to lay off more than 33 mainstream teachers.

"This would be an unprecedented, unconscionable, totally educationally unsound and indefensible setback to students, not just to teachers," Fondy charged.

The local's old contract expired last Nov. 30. The union struck for seven days in 1968 and for five days in 1971. Teachers in Pittsburgh now make between $8,700 and $16,700 a year.

Teachers in Madison, Wis., also were on strike after more than seven months of talks on a new contract. Members of Madison Teachers Inc., an affiliate of the National Education Association, sought to replace a contract that expired last Dec. 31.

of "persistent" joblessness. An area of persistent joblessness is one whose jobless rate has been 6 percent or more during the most recent calendar year and has exceeded the national average by either 50 percent in three of the last four calendar years, 75 percent in two of the last three calendar years or 100 percent in one of the last two calendar years.

Firms located in areas of substantial unemployment may be eligible for preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts if they agree that 25 percent of new hires each month will come from the area's disadvantaged residents.

Marshall Ganz, a UFW executive board member who is directing the Imperial Valley campaign, attributed the surge in victories to improved enforcement and administration of the farm labor law through the efforts of a special task force appointed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown.

The UFW and the AFL-CIO had charged earlier that because of poor enforcement, the UFW was not receiving a fair opportunity to participate in the elections, and many field workers were being intimidated.

"Farm workers no longer fear the election process," Ganz reported.

At 165 ranches throughout the state that had been under Teamster contracts, 55 ranches employing 7,652 workers switched to the UFW. The IBT won elections at 89 of the ranches, but the number of workers it had represented was cut by the UFW victories from 27,000 to 12,000.

Meanwhile, the ALRB has set aside an election won by the Teamsters at a small Delano grape vineyard on the ground that the UFW was denied a fair opportunity to appear on the ballot. Of the 18 hands employed by the V. V. Zaninovich vineyard, 16 cast ballots in favor of the Teamsters and one for no union.

In a split decision, the ALRB majority ruled that the board's election representatives were "overly hasty" in scheduling the election, held less than 72 hours after the Teamsters filed a petition for certification.

The decision noted that the board's agents have only seven days to hold an election after the petition is filed. But it said that the speed was "misplaced," since the UFW had enough signed authorization cards to qualify for the ballot, and that "speeding up the electoral process so as to prevent such a choice defeats the purpose" of the farm labor law.

The Farm Workers have challenged a number of other elections, charging in some cases that UFW representatives were denied access to workers in the fields because of unfair labor practices by the growers and the Teamsters.

Unions winning the elections are not guaranteed contracts with the growers, only exclusive bargaining rights for one year. There has been little contract bargaining conducted during the past four months, the UFW reported, because of peak harvests and because certification of elections has been delayed by challenges.

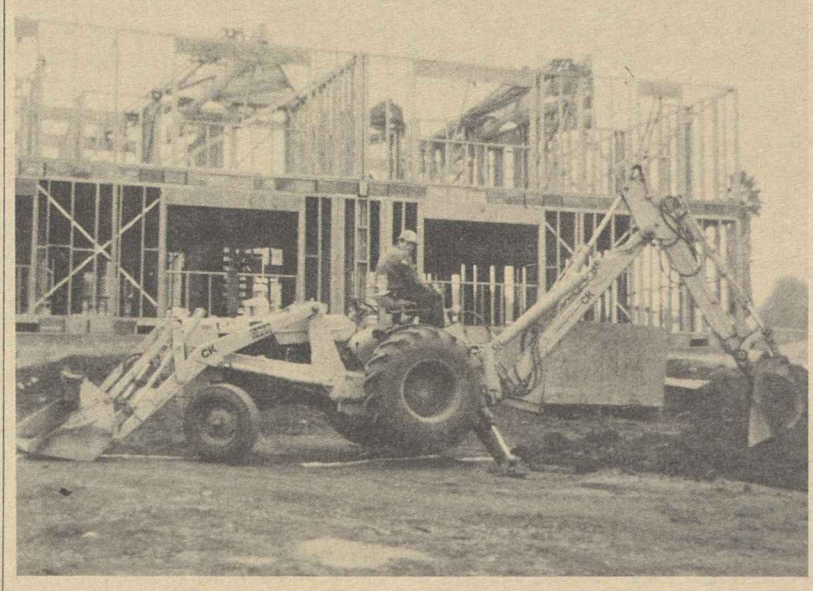
Plumbers Name Adam As Safety Director

The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters named Joe A. Adam director of the union's new safety and health department which went into operation Jan. 1.

Adam, a member of Local 519 in Miami, has been on staff of the union's Joint Plumbing Apprentice & Journeyman Training Committee since 1972.

Usery Hits Punishment For School Walkouts

Miami—Stiff penalties against teachers who participate in strikes can represent an "extreme danger," Director W. J. Usery, Jr., of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service cautioned in a speech before a group of school management personnel here.



"Pragmatically, fines and jail sentences often do far more to hinder the chances of settlement than to enhance them," Usery noted. "It adds another major and emotional issue. And there can be no doubt that future relationships are severely ruptured by such harsh reaction."

Usery, who also serves as President Ford's special assistant for labor-management relations, noted that some 500 teachers in numerous communities in New York, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts and elsewhere had been jailed since the school year opened because they refused to obey court orders to return to work.

"I find it difficult to justify the jailing of employes whose actions —that of withholding their labor and forfeiting their paychecks—are legal in the entire private sector of the economy," he observed.

There are alternatives to penalties, Usery noted, such as the one involving FMCS in last fall's Boston teachers' strike. A federal judge ordered the parties to negotiate a minimum of 12 hours a day under the chairmanship of an FMCS mediator, with the result that a contract agreement was reached a week later.

"I would suggest that we extend our search for alternatives, while at the same time mastering the skills of collective bargaining so that reasonable, responsible agreements can be reached in a climate of peace," Usery concluded.

Open-Shop States Still Trail In Personal Income Growth

By J. Gary DiNunno

So-called right-to-work laws continue to retard the growth of personal income in states where the open shop is mandatory, recent government figures demonstrate.

Analysis of a Commerce Dept. survey for 1974 shows that 16 of the 19 "right-to-work" states rank below the national average in per capita income. Per capita income for 1974 ranged from a high of $7,062 in Alaska to a low of $3,803 in Mississippi. The national average was $5,448.

In addition, Labor Dept. figures for 1974 show that R-T-W states—which prohibit unions and management from negotiating union-shop clauses in their contracts—tend to rank below the national average in hourly and weekly wages paid to factory production workers.

Weekly earnings for production workers averaged $176 nationwide during 1974, with an average hourly rate of $4.23. In the 19 right-to-work states, the average weekly wage was $156.58 with a $3.91 hourly rate. The 31 non R-T-W states and the District of Columbia averaged $182.37 per week with an hourly rate of $4.57.

Two-thirds of the states below the national average hourly rate for production workers were "right-to-work" states, while 83 percent of those above the national average were states where no legal barriers prevent free bargaining between employers and employes.

Here is a state-by-state breakdown of the per capita income trend in compulsory open-shop states:

Alabama was $680 below the national average in 1953 when its R-T-W law was passed. By 1974, per capita income was $1,233 below the national average, a relative loss of $553.

Arizona was $156 below the national average in 1948, one year after a R-T-W law was passed. By 1974, it was $321 below.

Arkansas was $555 below the national average a year after its right-to-work law was passed in 1947. In 1974, Arkansas was $1,248 below the average.

Florida enacted a R-T-W law in 1944. Although Florida's relative position has improved, it is still $32 below the national average.

Georgia was $462 below the national average in 1948, and in 1974 was $697 below—a relative loss of $235.

Iowa in 1948 was $160 above the national average per capita income. In 1974, it was $169 below.

Kansas passed its R-T-W law in 1958 when its per capita income was $6 above the national average. In 1974 per capita income for the state was $52 above the average. But this was only the second year since the R-T-W law was enacted that income topped the national average, and this is attributed largely to the sharp rise in the prices of agriculture products.

Mississippi was $877 below the the national average in 1954 when its law was passed. In 1974 per capita income was $1,645 below—a relative drop of $768.

Nebraska in 1948 was $79 above the national average for per capita income. Last year it was $170 below.

Nevada, because of the highly unionized entertainment industry, is the only R-T-W state whose per capita income has consistantly remained above the national average. It passed the "work" law in 1951 and was $597 above at that time. But in 1974, it was only $568 above the average.

North Carolina passed its R-T-W law in 1947 and a year later was $457 below the national average for per capita income. In 1974 its standing had dropped to $783 below the average.

North Dakota in 1948 was $29 below the national average. In 1974 sharp price rises for agricultural commodities helped send its per capita income to a point $135 above the national average.

URW Strikers Win Gains In BIC Pen Pact

Milford, Conn.—The 965 members of Rubber Workers Local 134 returned to their jobs at the BIC Pen Corp. plant here, following unanimous approval of a new three-year contract with the French-based concern.

The settlement, which provides substantial wage increases and improved fringe benefits, ended a strike that began last Dec. 1.

The pact provides hourly pay hikes of 40 cents in the first year of the contract, 43 cents in the second, and 43 cents in the third. The agreement also provides for an improved vacation schedule and for improvements in sickness, accident, group life and major medical insurance. Pension benefits also were improved.

BIC is a subsidiary of Societe BIC SA., a French concern. The Milford plant produces cigaret lighters, pens and other writing instruments and packages the firm's line of panty hose.

Building Trades Quit Committee Over Veto

nificant support from union members after breaking his word on the site picketing bill.

Georgine said the unions are "grateful" to the members of Congress who supported the legislation.

While Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop "hasn't lost credibility with the labor movement, because he kept faith with us," Georgine said Dunlop's effectiveness in the Ford Administration "has been impaired" by the President's rejection of the legislation he was instrumental in drafting.

The building trades leaders made it clear that they felt management and the Administration have viewed joint labor-management endeavors as a one-way street.

"For nearly 10 years," Georgine said, "through various committees, commissions and boards involving the joint participation of management and labor," construction unions "have carried far more than their fair share of the load in collective bargaining procedures."

Thus, he noted, "it was the building and construction tradesmen who donned the financial straight-jacket tailored by the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee when, during a period of soaring inflation and sizable unemployment, no workers of the nation except us were under any wage restraints."

But "after all these months and years of meetings," when the crunch came, the contractor representatives "abdicated their responsibility to determine policy in the construction industry to the National Right to Work Committee, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Round Table and the United States Chamber of Commerce."

As for President Ford, "he caved in under pernicious political pressure and, even worse, went back on his word."

Dr. Quinn Mills, a Harvard professor who served as chairman of the joint committee by designation of Dunlop, expressed concern that abandonment of a national labor-management forum would result in a return to "chaotic" conditions in the construction industry.

He noted that the committee "helped develop and unanimously endorsed" the collective bargaining legislation that became part of the site picketing bill vetoed by the President.

Environmental Policy Statement Notes Economic Impact Concern

A national public-interest group whose members represent the main segments of American society recommends changes in the nation's environmental policy that would give new emphasis to the social and economic effects of environmental management.

"We should strive for a gradual program of environmental management which would protect jobs and the social as well as the physical environment," the National Planning Association declared in a policy statement.

While it is clearly necessary to reduce as much as possible the harmful environmental effects of man's activities, the NPA statement notes, every effort should be made to minimize potential dislocations to the economy.

"National planning for environmental management must be based on the best available information, not only on the environmental problems themselves but on the relative importance of the problem as compared to the consequences of solving it," the non-profit, non-political organization observed.

"Even when the environmental disturbance is severe, adequate provision should be made for protecting the individuals whose livelihood depends on the offending operation."

The policy statement, "The Environment and Man," was signed by 106 members of the NPA board of trustees and standing committees, including a score of labor and consumer leaders. Others signing were leaders from business, agriculture, the professions and international affairs.

Adopting a middle-ground position, NPA asserts that "in efforts to change for the better what is now being done, one should avoid the extreme immediate solution of 'ban it or shut it down,' except when there exists a serious threat to human health. The extreme position on the other side, 'Which do you want, a job or a pure environment,' is equally deplorable."

In a summary of the present state of the environment, the NPA concludes that the magnitude of changes in the environment due to man has now reached a level at which there is the possibility that if some of these changes are not controlled, "serious damage will be done to the physical and biological aspects of the earth."

The policy statement notes that much of the current thought about environmental management looks to taxation or restrictive legislation as the means for achieving minimum degradation of the environment. But, it observes, "taxation or judicial levy of penalties can too easily be interpreted as license to pollute or degrade the environment."

Instead, the association urges that more consideration be given to land-use regulation as an essential element of environmental management.

In a footnote, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough observes that building trades unions have long been active in support of a safe and healthy environment and do not oppose land-use regulation.

"However, some current legislative proposals fail to require that employment and economic factors be taken into account," Carlough notes. "It should be emphasized that any final land-use legislation should contain requirements that these vital issues be considered."

Cash Register Service Strike Wins New Pact

Chicago—A two-year agreement providing wage increases totaling $33.50 a week for about 500 National Cash Register Co. service technicians ended a three-month strike in seven cities where NCR operates service centers.

The contract, negotiated by the Allied Services Division of the Railway & Airline Clerks, also brings a 20 percent improvement in pension benefits and other gains for several hundred BRAC members. The contract is retroactive to last July 1.

The strike affected NCR service operations in St. Louis, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Hempstead, N.Y., New Brunswick, N.J., and Detroit.

Illegal Aliens Cost Nation $13 Billion

contribute to price stability by working for relatively low wages.

The wage-depressing effect "is not a net benefit to the economy," the study maintained. And it noted that there is increasing employment of illegals in non-farm occupations where "there is already a considerable pool of unemployed persons, even in non-recessionary periods."

Not included in the $13 billion annual cost estimate is the balance of payments drain resulting from money sent out of the United States by illegal aliens. Estimates of that amount have ranged from $3 billion to $10 billion a year.

Also, the report noted, "to the extent that illegal aliens evade U.S. income taxes on their earnings, the tax burden borne by taxpayers is further increased." It cited one congressional report estimating an annual tax loss of $115 million from such evasions.

The report estimates that the number of illegal aliens in the United States is rising by 250,000 a year, adding to the tax burden and job loss.

Local Labor Rallied For Congress Drive

• A House-passed Hatch Act reform bill, now awaiting Senate action. It would allow federal and postal employes to take an active part in the political process, while protecting them against political coercion.

On the natural gas bill, Biemiller noted that earlier industry predictions of severe shortages this winter have not materialized and that a bill originally intended to help out industries facing shutdown because of natural gas shortages was distorted when the Senate added a deregulation amendment. A similar attempt will be made in the House when Congress reconvenes, Biemiller warned.

He stressed that "the AFL-CIO strongly opposes this legislation and all deregulation amendments."

On the attempt to override the veto of the appropriations for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, Biemiller stressed that the bill contains funds for additional job safety and health inspectors and for important federal health programs.

He noted also that two Senate-passed amendments "crippling" enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act were deleted in the final version of the bill.

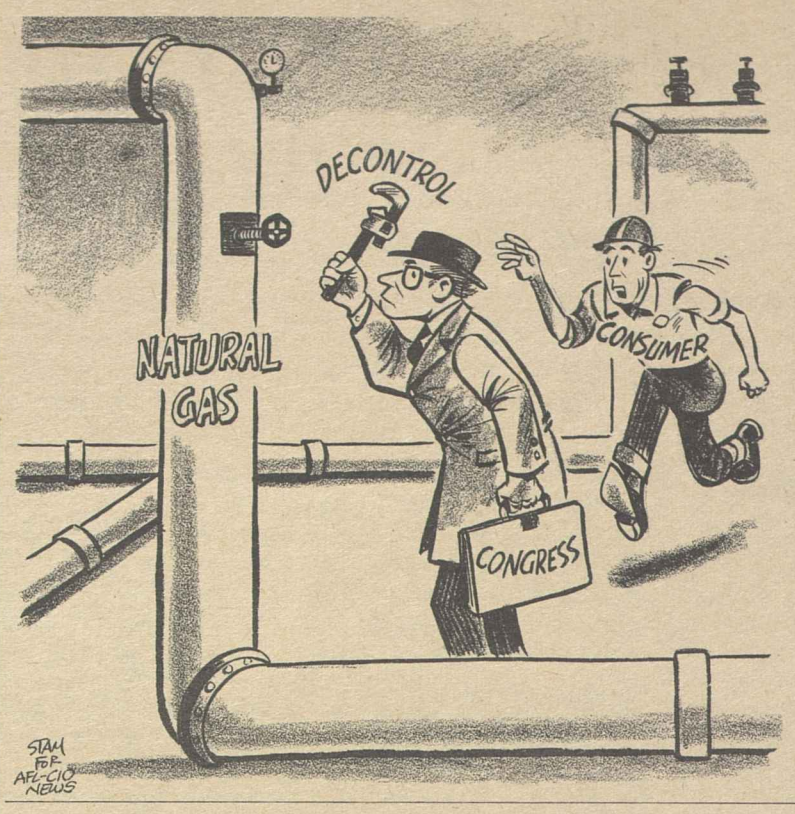
"To avoid a rerun of these and other fights, the AFL-CIO strongly supports the override effort," he said.

Biemiller also cited important congressional hearings early in the second session of Congress. The Senate Finance Committee will be considering House-passed tax reform provisions, while the House Ways & Means Committee will be starting the second phase of its tax reform review, including the taxation of income from foreign sources.

Also scheduled, Biemiller noted, are House field hearings, outside of Washington, on National Health Security and continued Senate hearings on food stamp legislation.

"Ford Administration proposals which include prohibiting food stamps to strikers and making it tougher for the recently unemployed to qualify for benefits as well as the unfriendly committee membership, pose potentially serious problems for this program," he said.

Biemiller said the work of state and local central bodies in contacting members of Congress "significantly contributed" to success in several key bills, including passage of the construction site picketing bill.



Biemiller added, "We regret the President crawfished on his promise to sign this bill and instead vetoed it."

E. F. O'Brien Heads Cleveland FMCS Office

Edward F. O'Brien has been named a regional director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service with headquarters in Cleveland, FMCS Director W. J. Usery, Jr., announced.

A former staff representative for the Chemical Workers, O'Brien will handle mediation service activities for an area that includes most of the states of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Indiana. He has been with the FMCS for 20 years, nearly all that time at Cleveland.

'Don't Mess With That!'

NLRB Caseload Jumps To New Peak for Year

A record total of 44,923 cases were handled by the National Labor Relations Board during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1975, NLRB Chairman Betty S. Murphy announced in the agency's 40th annual report.

The number represented an increase of 2,550 over the total case intake of 42,373 of the previous year, a reflection of the "constantly growing demand" for the agency's services, Mrs. Murphy noted.

During the reporting period, the NLRB closed 43,707 cases of all types. Up 6 percent from fiscal 1974, the total number of closings included 29,808 cases involving unfair labor practice charges and 13,899 affecting employe representation.

The 1975 caseload included 31,253 charges accusing employers, unions or both of violating provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, a 12.7 percent increase from the 27,726 of the preceding year.

Representation petitions filed with the board fell to 13,083, a 7 percent decrease from the 14,082 of the year before.

The two kinds of cases—representation elections and unfair labor practice charges—amounted to 98.7 percent of the 1975 intake, the NLRB reported. The remaining 1.3 percent included unionshop petitions and unit clarification petitions.

Of the 31,253 unfair practice cases filed with the NLRB, alleged violations by employers increased to 20,311 cases, a 13-percent increase from the 17,978 filed in fiscal 1974. Charges against unions increased about 12 percent to 10,822 from 9,654 in 1974.

Sixty-six percent, or 13,426, of the charges against employers alleged discrimination or illegal discharge of workers. Of the charges against unions, there were 6,832 alleging illegal restraint and coercion of employes.

HUD Allocates $3 Billion for Mortgage Aid

The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development has agreed to earmark $3 billion of its $5 billion mortgage interest subsidy appropriation for new apartment projects.

Until now, only single-family homes and individually-owned condominiums had been eligible for the below-market 7.5 percent mortgage rates available through Ginnie Mae—the Government National Mortgage Association.

Without the subsidy, interest rates range from 9 percent for FHA-insured mortgages to nearly 10 percent on some conventional mortgages.

The $3 billion allocation to multi-family housing had been urged last fall by the President's Labor-Management Committee in order to stimulate a depressed sector of the housing industry, expand employment, meet an anticipated growing demand for rental units and keep rental costs from escalating.

HUD Sec. Carla Hills estimated that release of the mortgage subsidy funds would result in construction of 120,000 additional apartment units.

AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director Henry Schechter said apartments built under the 7.5 percent mortgage rate could be rented for an average of $40 a month less than units financed at regular FHA rates. Only FHA-insured housing is eligible for the apartment program mortgage subsidies.

Schechter noted that rising interest rates, higher fuel costs and other operating expenses have pushed up rental rates sharply and have priced many families out of the market for new apartments.

New rental construction has remained at a depressed level, he said, because at market interest rates developers "cannot produce units with rents low enough to find a broad market demand."

The remaining $2 billion of the $5 billion appropriated by Congress presumably will be available for single-family home mortgages, although HUD has not yet released the funds.

HUD said the money released for multi-family housing could also be used to finance apartments built under a program of rent subsidies for low- and moderate-income families.

Human Dignity 'Impact' Studies Urged as Control on Automation

St. Louis—Corporations should be required to carry out a "human dignity" impact study before introducing technological advances that threaten the well-being of large numbers of workers, President Glenn E. Watts of the Communications Workers recommended at an international conference on human dignity and American democracy here.

"We should know in advance what the effect of sweeping change will be on the human beings involved, and we should plan for an orderly transition that will protect the rights and interests of workers," he declared.

Watts, whose remarks were part of a panel discussion on the effects of mass production and automation on labor and human dignity, suggested the human dignity impact study be conducted simultaneously with the environmental impact study that is presently required.

The mechanisms for such a study are already in place, including the facilities and resources at the nation's great universities, Watts noted. He predicted that as technological change accelerates, provision for such studies will in time be written into collective bargaining agreements.

The conference, sponsored by Saint Louis University in celebration of its 200th birthday, drew leaders from the fields of business and industry, government, education, religion, labor, the media and other segments of society. The purpose of the two-day meeting was to specify what needs to be done in the next 10 years to properly promote and defend the place of human dignity in America.

Watts noted that mass production and automation do not—of themselves — destroy human dignity. Rather, he said, the human problem lies in the way jobs are structured, recognition is provided "and, just simply, how people are treated."

"Something is fundamentally wrong with the way work is being structured," Watts declared. There are forces at work in the economy other than automation that serve to destroy a person's dignity, he said.

"One of these is the pressure workers feel from management to simply produce a product as fast as possible and to hell with craftsmanship," he said. "Workers respond to attention, recognition and responsibility."

It is job pressure such as this—not automation—which most offends the dignity of CWA members, Watts observed.

"The telephone industry is probably more automated than any other in the country," he added. "Our union has not resisted, in principle, this introduction of new technology.

"On the contrary, we have welcomed it and helped it along, insisting only that it be introduced intelligently and over a reasonable period of time," he said.

Watts also urged rededication to the principle of a full-employment economy. He noted that jobless rates in the current recession have been so high "I fear the leaders of this country will come to think that unemployment at some figure around 6 percent isn't too bad."

"That kind of thinking ignores human dignity and human need," Watts said. "The most demeaning, degrading condition of all, for any person who wants to work, is unemployment."

House Report Stresses Jobless Fund Deficits

America's unemployment insurance system "is no longer self-supporting" and the deficit in both state and federal funds will become much larger unless the financing mechanism is quickly strengthened.

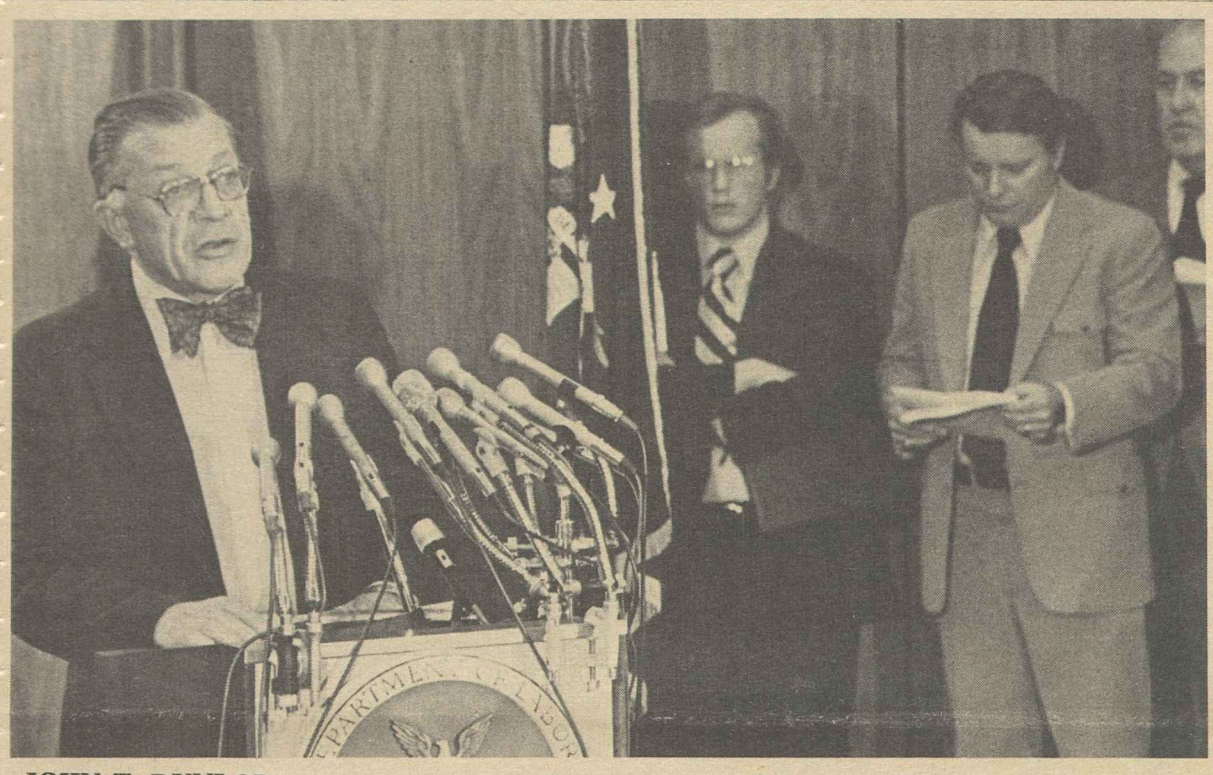
That grim warning comes from a report by the House Ways & Means Committee in support of legislation that—among other features—would increase the payroll tax employers pay to finance the program.

As of mid-December, 13 states plus Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia had exhausted their reserves and were borrowing from the federal fund. But the federal reserve also had been exhausted by the devastating recession and was in turn borrowing from general government funds.

With unemployment expected to remain high, the Labor Dept. estimates that 25 to 30 states will have exhausted their unemployment insurance reserves by the end of 1976 and that the combined state and federal unemployment insurance deficit will reach a staggering $22.7 billion by 1978 under present financing.

The House committee bill would raise the taxable wage base—the amount of each worker's pay on which employers are taxed—from $4,200 to $8,000 a year. There would also be a temporary rise in the amount of the tax earmarked for the federal program from the present five-tenths of 1 percent to seven-tenths of 1 percent.

When the unemployment insurance program was initiated, all wages were subject to the payroll tax. In 1940, a $3,000 wage base was established to match the wage base under the social security program, but at that time the figure covered nearly 93 percent of total wages. Currently, only about 50 percent of total wages are subject to the employer-paid tax.



An $8,000 wage base would cover an estimated 61.5 percent of earnings by 1977, when it would take effect under the House bill.

Meany Links Jobless Mark To Ford's Inaction, Vetoes

JOHN T. DUNLOP announces his resignation as Secretary of Labor in the aftermath of President Ford's veto of the construction site picketing bill. Dunlop said reaction to the veto indicated a loss of the trust and confidence necessary for labor-management-government cooperation.

Aftermath of Veto:

President's Broken Promise Forces Dunlop's Resignation

By David L. Perlman

President Ford's broken promise destroyed the "trust, confidence and respect" that Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop considers essential to labor-management-government cooperation.

Dunlop said he decided to resign after reaching a "professional judgment" that he couldn't be effective in an atmosphere soured by reaction to Ford's veto of the construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill.

AFL-CIO President George Meany said Ford's action cost the nation the services of a talented man who was making "a significant contribution to America."

Dunlop was the principal author of the legislative package that Ford promised to sign, but then vetoed under pressure from right-wing, anti-union groups. The vetoed legislation included both the construction site picketing rights that building trades unions sought in order to remedy a long-standing discrimination and the bargaining bill intended to stabilize the industry's labor-management relations.

Meany said Ford's decision to veto the bill undermined Dunlop's credibility and made it impossible for him to continue in office. "The regrettable result is that the nation has lost the services of an outstanding citizen," Meany said.

Dunlop plans to return to Harvard University after his resignation becomes effective on Feb. 1, but will remain a "practitioner" in the labor relations field.

Meany said he is certain that Dunlop "will continue to serve the process of collective bargaining capably and with unabated enthusiasm." He said that "as a private citizen," Dunlop will have the confidence of all parties, "who always knew him as a man of his word."

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., said Dunlop's "tragic" resignation could have been avoided, if Ford had kept his word instead of caving in to "the rankest form of political pressure."

Dunlop's credibility was "undermined by the President he served," Georgine said. "His programs and aspirations, developed over 35 years as an economist and construction industry authority, were scuttled by

Buckley, Evans Lose Union Shop Challenge

A challenge to the union shop by conservative commentators William F. Buckley, Jr., and M. Stanton Evans has been thrown out by the National Labor Relations Board.

The board refused to grant Buckley and Evans an administrative order declaring unlawful the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement which they said required them to be members in good standing of the Television & Radio Artists.

The NLRB's ruling noted that since Buckley and Evans have not tested the union membership requirement their petition for a declaratory order is not "justiciable" —that is, capable of being judged.

The board heard oral arguments in the case last Nov. 17. The ruling was by NLRB Chairman Betty Murphy and Members Howard Jenkins, Jr., and John A. Penello. Member John H. Fanning concurred in the dismissal but on separate grounds. Peter D. Walther, the board's newest member, did not participate in the finding.

8.5% Yearly Rate 'Economic Horror'

By James M. Shevis

America closed out the year 1975 with its highest average annual jobless rate — 8.5 percent — since the start of World War II, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Despite this "economic horror," AFL-CIO President George Meany charged, the Ford Administration "still refuses to do anything" to put the country back to work.

BLS said the nation's unemployment rate for December was unchanged at 8.3 percent, which "demonstrates that there has been little improvement in the job situation since the depths of the recession early last spring," Meany declared. Unemployment peaked in May with a seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 9.2 percent.

"The lack of improvement results from President Ford's repeated vetoes of any job-creating legislation, and means that millions of Americans have been condemned by his Administration to the misery of unemployment," Meany said.

The 8.5 percent average jobless rate was the highest since 1941 when America still suffered from the lingering effects of the Great Depression. The unemployment rate that year averaged 9.9 percent.

The number of workers without jobs in 1975 averaged 7.83 million while the number of employed persons during the year averaged 84,783,000. In 1974, when the unemployment rate averaged 5.6 percent, the average number of jobless workers was 5.07 million and the average number of employed was 85,936,000.

Meany noted that the official fig-

32 States Reduce Aid To Jobless

A recession-born program providing up to 65 weeks of unemployment compensation has been cut back in 32 states and the District of Columbia.

A new "trigger" that took effect at the start of 1976 reduced the maximum period of state and federal unemployment benefits in most states. In some cases, the maximum weeks of benefits will drop to 39; in others, to 52.

Unless unemployment nationally takes a dramatic and unexpected drop, workers in every state will continue this year to be entitled to at least 39 weeks of benefits—26 under the regular state program and 13 additional under a federal-state extended benefits program.

But the temporary program of federal supplemental benefits (FSB) that was enacted during the depths of the recession last year will begin to be phased out.

Starting this month, only states

Pittsburgh Teachers Resist Fines, Padlocks

Pittsburgh—Striking city school teachers refused to obey a court order to return to work despite stiff fines and the shutdown of their union's offices by sheriff's deputies.

The teachers, members of the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers, Local 400 of the American Federation of Teachers, faced further court proceedings in the bitter dispute that has kept them from their classrooms since the walkout began last Dec. 1.

Meanwhile, organized labor rallied to support the union, which has accused the city school board of "frustrating the collective bargaining process" and of "planning all along to bring this strike to an end by injunction and not by a negotiated settlement."

Steelworkers President I. W. Abel condemned the injunction in a telegram to the president of the school board, and called for good-faith bargaining instead of court threats.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. offered the full support of its 29 affiliated national unions to the teachers, and the executive council of the AFT adopted a resolution declaring that repressive measures such as fines "never have and never will settle the basic issues of the strike."

against the PFT, Common Pleas Court Judge Donald E. Ziegler ordered the union to pay an additional $10,000 for each day the seven-week walkout continues.

He also fined each striking public school teacher and teachers' aide $100 for every day they fail to report for work. In addition, Ziegler ordered the property and bank accounts of the PFT attached to pay the fines against it.

PFT President Albert Fondy, describing the judge's fines as "nothing short of outrageous," characterized the individual fines as "invalid" and "completely beyond any logical or legal justification."

Fondy assured the 4,400 members of Local 400 that backup financial assistance would be available from the AFT and that the local union would appeal the fines "all the way to the Supreme Court and would seek a stay of this wholly unwarranted action.

Fondy also criticized Ziegler's appointment of a five-member fact-finding panel to hear arguments in the dispute and recommend a solution. He said the panel could offer "no help" to the parties and noted it would take more than a week to explain the issues involved. Ziegler proposed giving each side only one hour to state its position.

Issues in the strike include salaries, class size, job security, school discipline and implementation of reading program improvements. The school board's last money offer to the teachers amounted to an average raise of $100.

Teachers' salaries now range from $8,700 to $16,700 a year. The union seeks increases ranging from $1,300 to $3,500 a year, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1976, plus two additional raises ranging from $1,400 to $2,500 a year by Sept. 1, 1977.

Fondy said the PFT's treasury is "virtually empty" and that the local would be unable to pay the heavy fines. Allegheny County sheriff's deputies padlocked the union's offices on Jan. 14, following a court order to attach the union's assets.

In his wire to Rev. LeRoy Patrick, president of the Pittsburgh Board of Education, Abel expressed his union's opposition to "your unwise use of court injunctions."

Abel noted that such measures resolve nothing. "Any collective bargaining dispute can be best settled by the parties themselves at the collective bargaining table . . . not by injunctions or harsh penalties or fines," he added.

President William H. McClennan of the Public Employee Dept. noted that the minimal pay increase proposals of the school board hardly reflect good-faith bargaining." He called on the board of education "to use the bargaining mechanism to end the strike and to stop punishing people for trying to maintain educational standards."

L. B. Granger Dies, Headed Urban League

Alexandria, La. — Lester B. Granger, retired executive director of the National Urban League, died at his home here Jan. 9. He was 79.

Granger, a former school teacher, had been with the league since 1934 and served as its executive director for 20 years until his retirement in 1961.

In a message to Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., the current head of the league, AFL-CIO President George Meany said that Granger's contribution to the entire nation will serve as a permanent monument to a great leader.

"His dedication and hard work in the National Urban League, designed to bring about equality in employment and throughout society, is an outstanding example to all who believe in equality and full civil rights for all," Meany declared.

Shopcraft Unions Ratify Rail Pacts

New three-year contracts covering 75,000 members of four railroad shopcraft union went into effect Jan. 12, with notification to the nation's major carriers that the agreement had been ratified.

President James E. Yost of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. announced the agreement received overwhelming approval by members of the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, the Carmen and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The fourth union, the Firemen & Oilers, does not require member ratification.

The agreement, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1975, provides for wage and benefit increases totaling 41 percent.

Financial Problems Explored:

Public Employe Leaders Refute Myths on City Woes

The real financial problems of cities and states won't be solved by making scapegoats of public employes, union leaders warned.

Three union presidents and other participants in a public sector labor-management conference sharply challenged a myth that public workers are overpaid in relation to their counterparts in private industry and also enjoy superior fringe benefits and job security.

One of the neutrals attending the conference agreed. Dean Alan K. Campbell of Syracuse University's graduate public administration school, cited a survey showing that public workers have just about caught up with private sector pay, but still receive fewer fringe benefits.

But Fire Fighters President William H. McClennan noted that the facts don't keep people from blaming "greedy labor leaders" for the problems of the cities.

President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees saw an obvious need for major tax reform at all levels of government to provide the level of services needed. He lashed out at supposedly liberal "new politics" governors who "outrageously scapegoat" public workers "rather than face up to problems."

President Albert Shanker of the Teachers scoffed at "the myth of tremendous power of public employes" and suggested that public officials be better advised to work with unions to achieve federalization of welfare and national tax reform.

A somewhat similar view was expressed by Sam Zagoria, director of the Labor-Management Relations Service of the National League of Cities, Conference of Mayors and National Association of Counties. Zagoria's group joined with the American Arbitration Association in sponsoring the two-day conference on "Public Sector Labor Relations in a Troubled Economy."

Public officials and public sector unions "did not inflict 8 percent inflation on this nation," Zagoria said. "Nor did they join forces to push this country into 8 percent unemployment." They have to work together, he said, instead of looking around "for a fall guy."

Conference programs, however, revealed that few public officials had the same broad concept of collective bargaining expressed by the union participants.

Wurf raked the League of Cities for its "shameful" legal attack on extension of the wage-hour law to public workers and denounced its proposal for specially trained "strikebreaking" crews to move into communities where fire fighters or police strike.

Seattle Mayor Wesley Uhlman, who shared the platform with Wurf, sought to somehow portray the attack on the wage-hour law as support for collective bargaining. On such matters as overtime pay, Uhlman said, "we don't want the federal government interfering" in an issue that should be resolved at the bargaining table.

Uhlman endorsed the right to strike by public workers, except where the "health and safety of the public" might be jeopardized.

But Mayor Arthur Holland of Trenton, N.J., who appeared on a panel with Shanker and McClennan, advocated a tough crackdown on any striking public workers. He said he "previously" had advocated compulsory arbitration as the alternative to a strike but now opposes that—at least in his city—because there are no funds available to pay higher wages if an arbitrator should so direct.

Shanker termed attempts to outlaw strikes akin to totalitarianism and noted that most free governments throughout the world do not regard public worker strikes as illegal.

Higher wages achieved through collective bargaining—and sometimes strikes—haven't made teachers "affluent," Shanker said. And part of the settlements teachers have won meant better education for children through smaller classes.

McClennan reminded his audience that the problems of the cities—increasingly inhabited by the poor who need more services but can least sustain the tax base needed to finance them—cannot be resolved by getting "tough" with public worker unions.

For public officials to say "look at New York" won't solve anything, he said. The "real need" is to improve the collective bargaining process.

McClennan, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., called for "a set of national ground rules" as proposed in the legislation sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.). That bill, he noted, is being fought by municipal officials in the same "tooth and nail" manner that private employers fought the Wagner Act 40 years ago.

For fire fighters and police, McClennan said, "we should work our way toward a system of fair, final, binding arbitration." But he stressed that "we want to be certain that before we give up what we believe is our fundamental right to strike, we get a fair and equitable system in return."

At another panel discussion, John A. McCart, the executive director of the Public Employee Dept., stressed the realities of public worker pensions as contrasted with distorted accounts of overgenerous pension payouts.

He noted that 94 percent of state retirement systems require worker contributions—as against only 10 percent of private plans. And vesting rights are frequently inferior to the standards now required by law of private pension plans.

Wurf Urges Congressional Probe Of State, Local Retirement Systems

A congressional investigation of public employe retirement systems was urged by President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees as he charged that many states and cities have mismanaged their pension plans.

Wurf said the law requires Congress to look into the fiscal soundness of state and local government pension funds. He pointed out, however, that the only congressional action since enactment of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 has been a series of hearings by a House subcommittee.

"Our union has compiled a great deal of data on pension plans affecting our members, information which paints a picture quite different from the popular editorial page conception of retired public workers living in the lap of luxury," Wurf said.

"But the fact is—no one really has the facts. That's why we believe the Congress should act without delay to fulfill its study mandate."

The AFSCME statement came in letters from Wurf to Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, and Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards.

Unlike many pension plans in private industry where the employer pays the full cost, Wurf said, most state and local government plans require the workers to pay from one-third to one-half of total pension contributions.

"While employes have been contributing their share to pension funds, some public employers have failed to do so," he asserted.

Wurf cited these examples:

- As much as $17.2 million in Maryland state retirement funds were held in a non-interest bearing account in a bank for which the former state treasurer was chief executive officer, according to newspaper accounts in 1973.
- In Hamtramck, Mich., the city administration used employe contributions to the police pension fund as operating revenue from 1965 to 1970.
- In a more recent case, still unresolved, the pension fund for police officers in the town of Stratford, Conn., has been reduced by some $1.5 million over the past two years following the apparently illicit transfer of funds without prior authorization.

Emphasizing that almost all public employe pension plans require worker contributions, Wurf said state employes in North Dakota and city employes in Baltimore have paid more than half the cost in recent years. In addition, he noted, workers must pay federal income taxes on their contributions.

But in private industry plans that do not require employe contributions, workers defer their tax liability until retirement age, when they are usually in lower tax brackets.

In addition, public employes in many communities must remain on the job for 15 to 20 years before gaining a fully vested right to a pension. In Atlanta, city workers' pensions are not vested until after 20 years of service.

And, Wurf noted, approximately one-third of all state and local government employes are not covered under social security and must rely entirely on pension benefits for retirement income.

Rallies Set in 13 Cities:

Unions Gear for GE, Westinghouse Talks

Grass-roots rallies of General Electric and Westinghouse workers were slated at 15 locations from coast to coast on Jan. 17 as the 13 national unions that represent them prepared to kick off contract negotiations with the electrical-manufacturing industry.

Delegates from nearly 300 union locals in 41 states representing about 175,000 workers planned to attend the rallies, sponsored by the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE-Westinghouse Unions.

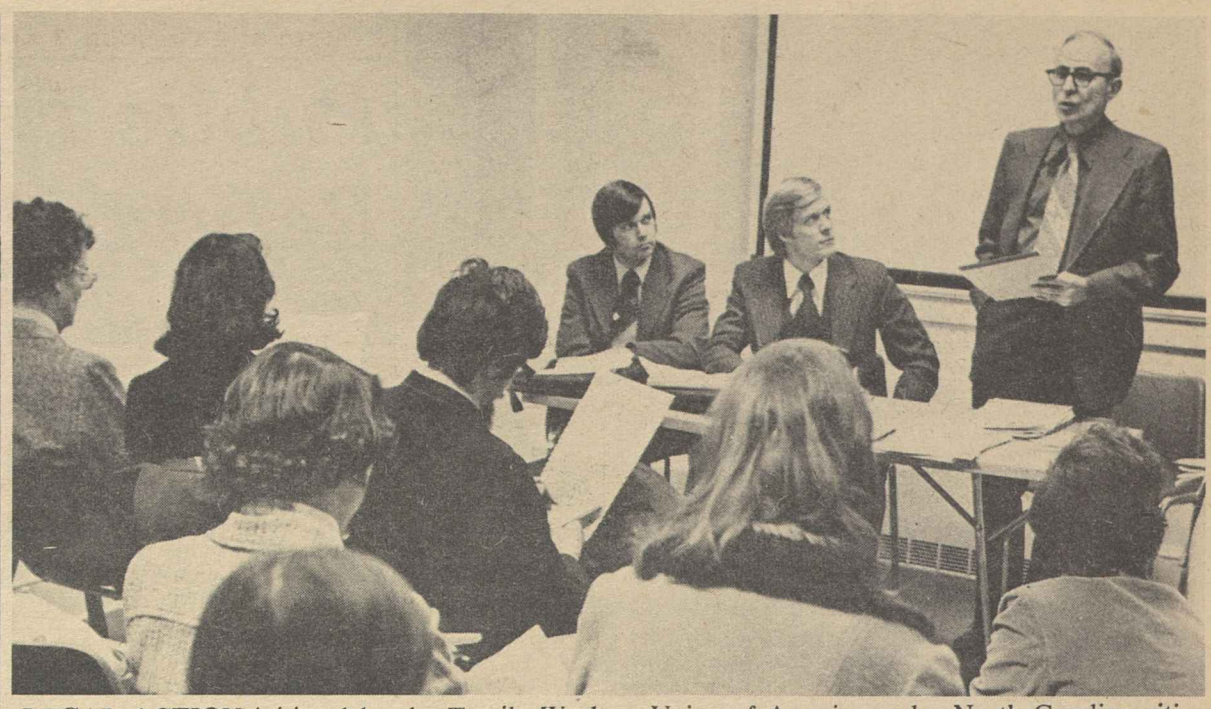
The CBC, a voluntary association of trade unions representing workers in the two giant corporations, will open negotiations with GE in mid-April, two months before the June 27 expiration date of current contracts between the firm and the 13 CBC unions. The GE talks will be in New York.

Talks with Westinghouse are scheduled to begin in early May against a July 11 deadline. GE employs about 130,000 members of CBC unions and Westinghouse employs 45,000.

Purpose of the rallies is to discuss bargaining issues in the various contract areas—wages, fringe benefits, union security and administration. Following the rallies, contract proposals will be drawn up by the CBC's national bargaining goals committee which in turn will submit its recommendations to the organization's full steering committee.

Rally locations are Atlanta; Baltimore; Chicago; Cincinnati; Cleveland; Columbus, Ohio.; Dallas; Louisville; Lynn, Mass.; Memphis; Newark, N.J.; Pittsburgh; Pittsfield, Mass.; San Jose, Calif., and Syracuse, N.Y.

AFL-CIO affiliates represented by the CBC are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Firemen & Oilers, Carpenters, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Unaffiliated members of the CBC are the Teamsters, Auto Workers and the United Electrical Workers.



Negotiations with GE will be conducted separately by the two CBC unions having national contracts with the company—the IUE and the UE. However, each union will include on its bargaining committee a number of members of other CBC organizations.

The other unions have individual plant agreements with the company and will negotiate locally, also with coordinated committees. However, the basic contract patterns will be established at the New York bargaining table.

IUE also is the largest union at Westinghouse, followed by the IBEW. Negotiations with Westinghouse will be conducted in Pittsburgh.

At least one major CBC union leader is scheduled to keynote each of the 15 rallies. Technicians from CBC unions will be on hand at each rally to supply factual material on the various bargaining issues.

The CBC is marking its 10th anniversary and its fourth round of coordinated bargaining with the electrical manufacturing industry.

LEGAL ACTION initiated by the Textile Workers Union of America and a North Carolina citizens group seeking to tighten federal controls on cotton dust is announced by TWUA Research Director George Perkel, right. Union job health experts, citing the link between high levels of cotton dust and "brown lung" disease, accused the Labor Dept. of delaying proceedings for the development of an effective federal standard to protect mill workers.

Textile Workers Sue Labor Dept. To Tighten 'Brown Lung' Controls

The Textile Workers Union of America accused the Labor Dept. of delaying efforts to tighten federal controls on cotton dust needed to protect mill workers from "brown lung" disease—suggesting the foot-dragging is politically motivated.

The TWUA and the North Carolina Public Interest Research Group made the charges in filing a suit in U.S. District Court in Washington to compel the Secretary of Labor to begin formal proceedings for the development of an effective cotton dust standard.

Current exposure levels permitted by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration unnecessarily increase the dangers of brown lung disease, or byssinosis, among mill workers, the union warned.

The TWUA wants to have the exposure level reduced from 1 milligram per cubic meter of air to one-tenth milligram for an eight-hour period.

In New York, TWUA President Sol Stetin said that every Secretary of Labor since 1971 has been aware that the current standard inadequately protects workers from the disease.

Despite numerous promises to modify the standard, Stetin charged that they have failed to perform their duties under the 1970 Occupational Safety & Health Act by "unlawfully withholding and unreasonably delaying action."

Even after the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health issued a criteria document in 1974 calling for reducing cotton dust exposure below 0.2 milligrams, the Labor Dept. has still failed to propose a stiffer standard, Stetin said.

He linked the delays to political favors from the former Nixon Administration in return for the role textile manufacturers played in the 1972 presidential election.

At a Washington press conference, the TWUA and the North Carolina student group distributed copies of the memorandum that had been uncovered during the Watergate investigation which promised that to encourage business support of the Nixon re-election campaign, OSHA would not issue any "highly controversial" job health standards, such as a curb on cotton dust.

Wib Gulley, director of the North Carolina citizens' group, said the dangers of cotton dust are particularly severe in the state since about one-third of the nation's textile workers are situated in North Carolina.

He said state health officials concede that 15,000 active textile workers are victims of byssinosis. Breathlessness brought on by acute stages of the disease totally disables workers, he said.

Because of the high level of cotton dust in mills, the research group estimated that the textile industry currently has 800,000 potential cases of brown lung.

Despite the high level of exposure currently permitted by OSHA, Gulley charged that no mill in North Carolina meets the standard.

He said it was not uncommon to find exposure levels five to seven times in excess of the 1 milligram standard. At one North Carolina plant, Gulley said the research group found the cotton dust in the air to be 23 times higher than the limit.

TWUA Research Director George Perkel said that although OSHA is currently working on an economic impact statement, expected to be released in April, there are no guarantees a new standard would be quickly forthcoming.

The NLRB decision follows lengthy and unsuccessful federal court litigation against AFTRA by Buckley and Evans that culminated over a year ago in the Supreme Court's refusal to consider their claim.

The board noted that during the oral argument counsel for AFTRA repeated the union's position that all the union can lawfully require of Buckley and Evans under the union security provisions is "financial core membership"—that is, the payment of union dues and fees.

The NLRB added that counsel for Buckley and Evans had conceded that his clients never requested the union or the broadcasting companies which air their views to state in writing that the payment of the uniformly required dues and initiation fees would satisfy the union shop provisions without any requirement of full-fledged membership.

"The petitioners thus have never actually tested AFTRA's policy in this respect," the board observed.

"With respect to the petition herein, there is no dispute and the law is admittedly clear that a union . . . can only require the payment of periodic dues and initiation fees after the statutory 30-day period and cannot, under any circumstances, require 'full-fledged membership' or any other type of membership," the board said in its opinion, "and a termination of employment for reasons other than nonpayment of such dues and fees would be a violation of the (National Labor Relations) Act.

"Likewise, a refusal to employ an individual who refused to become a 'member' of AFTRA or any other union would also be a violation of the Act.

"Therefore, there is no justiciable issue to be decided or uncertainty to be dispelled by the issuance of a declaratory order."

Buckley, who appears as the host of the television program, "Firing Line," and Evans, who appears on the radio program, "Spectrum," originally sued in federal court on grounds that AFTRA's union shop agreements constituted an "unreasonable restraint" of freedom of speech.

A U.S. district judge upheld their argument, but the decision was overturned by the 2nd U.S. Court of Appeals which said they should have taken their case to the NLRB. The litigants appealed to the Supreme Court which ruled against considering the case.

In its 1974 finding, the appeals court noted there was no abridgement of First Amendment rights arising from the congressional authorization granting a union the power to collect dues from employes in a union shop.

"The congressional purpose in authorizing mandatory union dues is surely a permissible one," the appeals court observed.

"A required tolerance of 'free riders' — i.e., those who enjoy the benefits of the union's negotiating efforts without assuming a corresponding portion of the union's financial burden — would result not only in flagrant inequity, but might eventually seriously undermine the union's ability to perform its bargaining function."

Inskeep Succeeds Lay At Utah AFL-CIO Helm

Salt Lake City—E. W. Inskeep has been named to succeed Frank C. Lay as president of the Utah AFL-CIO. Lay has resigned to join the Region VI staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Inskeep, a member of the Machinists for 42 years, is president of the IAM District 114 and a vice president of the state labor federation. He took over the new post Jan. 5.

Jobless Aid Duration Cut Back in 32 States that had an insured unemployment rate averaging at least 6 percent over the most recent 13-week period will continue to offer the maximum 65-week payments.

Insured unemployment is generally close to 2 percent below the actual unemployment. Thus, a 6 percent insured jobless rate would amount to nearly 8 percent under the Bureau of Labor Statistics count of unemployment.

The listings could vary from week to week because of the change in the 13-week average of insured unemployment. But as the AFL-CIO News went to press, the following jurisdictions were still entitled to the 65-week maximum:

Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Hawaii, Illinois, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

States where insured unemployment was between 5 and 6 percent, where the maximum benefit drops to 52 weeks, are:

Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, New Mexico, South Carolina, Tennessee and West Virginia.

The maximum combination drops to 39 weeks in the following 20 states and the District of Columbia, where insured unemployment was below 5 percent:

Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Persons in these states already drawing FSB benefits will continue to receive them. But others will not, even if they are currently unemployed and receiving regular unemployment compensation.

A new requirement of the law obligates all FSB recipients to take part in any training programs that their state might designate. The requirement is intended to increase their opportunity for employment.

Manpower Journal Becomes 'Worklife'

The Labor Dept.'s monthly journal, Manpower, became Worklife with the publication of its January issue to reflect the recent name-change of the Manpower Administration to the Employment & Training Administration.

A series of special bicentennial articles and features beginning in the January edition examine the roles American workers played in shaping the history of the nation.

A Man of His Word...

THE NATION HAS LOST a man of great talent and ability, who had made and was making a significant contribution to America.

But the President has made it impossible for Mr. Dunlop to continue to make that contribution as Secretary of Labor. The President undermined Mr. Dunlop's credibility and the regrettable result is that the nation has lost the services of an outstanding citizen.

I am sure that in private life Mr. Dunlop will continue to serve the process of collective bargaining capably and with unabated enthusiasm. For as a private citizen, Mr. Dunlop will once again have the confidence of the parties involved, who always knew him as a man of his word.

—AFL-CIO President George Meany

...And Another Man

THE EXPERIENCE of the past few years points up the importance of the elections coming up this year:

To move forward on important programs, to strengthen and get taxpayers' money's worth out of present programs, to get the economy in shape and keep it there . . . to do these and other things you've got to have a Congress and a President in tune with one another and with the people's needs.

If ever this was made clear it's been during the presidency of Gerald Ford. Entering the White House as an appointed President after 25 years in Congress, he proposed not just a honeymoon with the 2-1 Democratic House and 3-2 Democratic Senate, but a marriage.

The marriage came apart quicker than you can say Humpty-Dumpty, and nothing's about to put it together again. Ford took up where Richard Nixon left off. He got his hands firmly on the veto like a scythe and mowed down one congressional initiative after another.

During the worst unemployment since the 1930s, he vetoed measures to create jobs. In the worst housing slump in decades, he vetoed measures to build housing. In a period of ecological concern, he vetoed legislation to make strip-mine owners clean up their mess. When Congress voted to provide more for the school lunch program, he vetoed that. With fuel prices spiralling, early in his presidency he vetoed legislation to control prices on domestic crude oil. He vetoed health legislation and education appropriations.

His recent tax veto almost stripped wage-earners of 1975 tax cuts. A last-ditch compromise saved them.

As a parting shot for 1975, he reneged on a promise of support for construction labor's situs picketing bill, passed by the Congress, and slapped it down.

The contrast between the President and the Congress has been sharp. The Congress concerned itself with the needs of people sweating out unemployment and getting belted at the supermarket and gasoline pump. The President bled mostly for the oil companies. The Congress tried to create jobs. The President opted for noninterference with unemployment.

The result, with few exceptions, has been stalemate—one that seems doomed to continue as long as President and Congress are at cross-purposes.

This can be remedied—but not until next November.

A Word Edgewise:

Luxury of Soviet Elite Reflects Racket Rather Than Ideology

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE PROBLEMS constantly encountered in discussions of the Soviet regime is the standard conservative argument that the Communists want to replace capitalism with public ownership and eliminate private property. This is considered a bad thing. The difficulty is that this attributes to the Soviet elite a set of ideals, when in fact it is a crew of cynical gangsters. Gangsters who, by the way, live a life of luxury worthy of top American capitalists and whose children grow up in a private universe comparable to the old Groton-Harvard syndrome. True, Brezhnev doesn't own his "dacha," but does the President of American Widgets own that nice cottage ("Conference Center") in Barbados? Or does American Widgets own it, and the Lear jet used to get there?

In other words, the argument between the Communists and advocates of a free society does not hinge on the nature of property. To coin an original phrase, this is a red herring—as is the talk about "Godless atheism." Stalin gave up "Godless atheism" during World War II, shot the old militants of the "League of the Militant Godless," and co-opted the Orthodox Church. He decided religion had utility, provided it knew its place.

This paid off: the Metropolitan of Leningrad, a Communist stooge, has just been elected one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches. He has stated authoritatively there is no religious persecution in the Soviet Union.

One of the main reasons why Soviet Communism is treated as an ideology rather than a racket is probably—ironically enough—the body of literature by ex-Communists, most of whom were intellectuals who simply didn't recognize a brutal con game when they saw one. On my shelves there must be 15 or 20 volumes in this genre ranging from the collection "The God That Failed," Koestler's "Darkness at Noon" and Poretsky's "Our Own People" to the more realistic "Case of Comrade Tulayev" by Victor Serge. To one degree or another, they all treat Soviet totalitarianism as a set of principles, derived from Marx and Engels, that have been twisted and perverted by a Stalinist bureaucracy.

This has led some Soviet dissidents to sponsor a "Back to Lenin!" movement. The historian Roy Medvedev has devoted two volumes to this thesis, but members of this school refuse to recognize that Lenin opened the casino. In the December issue of "Midstream," the historian and biographer Joel Carmichael emphasizes the fact (actually on the record since 1921) that the Kaiser's secret service—in addition to providing the Bolshevik leader with a train from Switzerland to Russia—supplied the Communists with the equivalent of 800 million 1976 dollars to undermine the democratic provisional government that overthrew Czarism in February 1917.

How's that for a "destabilization" operation? The Germans temporarily got their money's worth: the Bolshevik Revolution took Russia out of the war.

NO, DESPITE ITS patina of high theory, and the commitment of some genuine idealists, at ground zero the Soviet system has always been a sanguinary racket. The terror was introduced by Lenin (whose favorite N. Bukharin got off the jolly quip that he believed in the two-party system: "one in power and the other in jail") and perfected by Stalin in the great purges.

Bukharin turned up again in an underground joke: three men met in an "isolator" discussing their charges. The first said, "I was accused of conspiring with Bukharin." The second, "I was accused of conspiring against Bukharin." The third, "I'm Bukharin." Solzhenitsyn has given us the central operational code of the elite: a guard asks a "zek" en route to Siberia what he got. "25 years—and for nothing." "Nonsense," says the guard. "For nothing you get ten."

What triggered this historical excursion is the news that Moscow has, since the great Helsinki jamboree, clamped down on emigration and in general taken a very hard line on "Basket 3," the section dealing with improved international communications.

Of course they have: They got what they wanted from us, a legitimation of their post-World War II conquests. Now all bets are off. When will Chairman Kissinger realize that the normal 19th Century rules of diplomacy do not apply to gangsters?

New Makeup for GNP:

Healthy Growth Pattern Keyed To Resources, Pollution Plans

By Gus Tyler

TO GROW OR NOT TO GROW. That was the question recently at a conference of scientists, intellectuals and businessmen held at Woodlands, Tex.

Leading the debate for those who say it is necessary to check growth was Dr. Dennis Meadows, one of the authors of the original Club of Rome book, "Limits of Growth." He argued strongly that depletion of resources, pollution and overpopulation would make life on earth impossible unless these ruinous forces were contained.

Speaking for the other side was Dr. Herman Kahn, head of the think-tank, Hudson Institute. He thinks that growth is both good and necessary. Without it the poor of the earth would be even poorer and, hence, more restless and hostile.

The debate about Limits of Growth is now at least three years old. Little new has been added to the argument although much that is new has happened in the interim.

In the United States, for instance, we have been living at what amounts to zero growth—no growth — for several years. Our gross national product (GNP) has not been expanding as it had in the past. In some years, the GNP has even shrunk.

And, if we are to judge from experience, no-growth is no good. No-growth has meant unemployment—the growth is not there for new jobs—and has also meant inflation—the added supply is not there to meet demand.

We have limited growth not because our Administration in Washington has become enamored with the Club of Rome book, but because "cooling the economy" was believed to be a way to check price increases. But, however we got there, no-growth is a no-no for America's future.

Unfortunately the debate about "growth" goes on and on without anyone defining growth. It is simply assumed that growth means "pollution" and "exhaustion." But it need not mean anything of the kind; indeed "growth" can mean the opposite.

Our GNP—the measure of our growth—is simply the dollar value of all the goods and services in any one year. If we change the makeup of our GNP we can continue to grow while ending up with less pollution and greater resources.

WE NEED TO concentrate on two primary purposes: de-polluting and re-resourcing.

One of our major industries ought to be cleaning up our waterways, scrubbing our oceans, purifying our air, detoxifying our soils, recycling our cans and bottles and paper. To do any of these things is as much a "service" to our society as mowing a lawn, shining shoes, or teaching a class and, hence, is part of our GNP.

A second major industry ought to be the development of new resources of energy: solar, wind, tidal, geothermal, biophysical, photovoltaic, etc. If we go at this with commitment, we do not exhaust our reserves; we replenish our resources.

A third major industry ought to be cultivation of our oceans—for food, minerals, fibers, chemicals.

Growth is dangerous only as we continue to grow in the old ways. But growth is mankind's best hope if we grow in a new way—restoring the polluted, replenishing the exhausted, and developing entirely new resources.

Developing Jobs for Women Among HRDI's Key Efforts

DEVELOPING GOOD-PAYING jobs that offer a solid chance for advancement and work careers for women will be a prime emphasis in the year ahead for the Human Resources Development Institute, the AFL-CIO's manpower arm.

That report was made by HRDI Executive Director Charles Bradford, who pointed out that jobs for women has always been one of the institute's key efforts, and account for about 25 percent of the jobs developed through local union cooperation in communities throughout the nation. He credited the interest and cooperation of local unions in the HRDI effort to develop jobs for disadvantaged and hard-to-employ workers for much of the successful record the institute has rolled up since it was chartered as a private corporation in 1968.

High unemployment has made HRDI's job-development effort "much more difficult . . . very tough," but the organization has been able to meet or exceed the goals set by the Labor Dept. in each of the manpower programs it has contracted to HRDI, Bradford said. And in response to the increased incidence of plant shutdowns, workweek cutbacks and hiring freezes that stem from the nation's economic troubles, HRDI has been able to help a number of laid-off union members find new jobs, he said.

Bradford noted that HRDI also has the financial responsibility for 21 Apprenticeship Outreach programs which are placing minority workers in the construction industry — facing a jobless rate near 20 percent — HRDI would meet and even exceed quotas set by the Labor Dept. this year through continued union cooperation.

Citing HRDI's performance under Labor Dept. contracts in the administration of outreach programs, Bradford stressed, "we think that we are giving far in excess of what the taxpayer expects. . . . We do our best to see that everyone gets a full measure."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Bradford said that two of the institute's newer programs, both dealing with persons charged with or convicted of criminal offenses, are working out well. He said the Female Offender Program developed by the Virginia State AFL-CIO with HRDI's help, and the Pre-Trial Intervention Program sponsored by the Nebraska State AFL-CIO, are producing good results. He said that while "most employers are reluctant to hire offenders," good relationships developed by HRDI in other programs to place disadvantaged workers often pave the way for employers to "give offenders a chance" to make good on the job.

Noting that the turnover rate is one of the best measures of the effectiveness of a job-development and placement program, Bradford said that two of every three workers that HRDI has been able to place are still on the job three months later. That, he said, is a high retention rate, and it indicates both the quality of the jobs themselves and the determination of disadvantaged workers to improve their lives.

Bradford was questioned by Sara Fritz of United Press International and Robert Dobkin of the Associated Press. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

WITH THE PROLONGED RECESSION and continuing inflation pinching the family budget and the governmental budget, we will be hearing a lot of tough talk about hardnosed solutions this year:

Cut costs and hold the line on taxes by getting the loafers off welfare. Crack down on food stamp cheaters. Slash government payrolls. Put the brakes on runaway social programs. Stop throwing tax dollars at problems. Decentralize. Dismantle federal programs and let the states and localities take them over.

Unfortunately, the usual array of fiscal and political conservatives has been joined by a new breed of conservative liberals who have forgotten or never learned their history. When President Eisenhower took office and named a special commission to tell him why the federal government was growing, he was told the states were unable or unwilling to meet the needs of their citizens.

A new congressional study punctures the alarmist prophecies propagated by the Nixon and Ford Administrations. But there is little hope that facts and sober analysis will slow down the misconceptions and alarm preached by the nation's leaders.

In 1975, President Ford said he was horrified by the federal deficit. "The size and growth of the federal budget has taken on a life of its own," he said. In the 1976 State of the Union address and the budget, Ford will be doubly horrified.

A year ago, Ford was specific even though wrong. In a major speech, he singled out social security, food stamps and federal retirement payments as examples of "income redistribution" programs that claim an ever-larger share of federal spending.

But two of those programs are contributed to by wage-earners and employers while food stamps are deliberately designed to help those most in need obtain an adequate diet.

Two top Nixon-Ford officials were the chief cheerleaders of the runaway rhetoric.

"We are at a crossroads" in America between social spending and defense spending, warned then budget director Roy Ash. Ash's budget report said that if social programs continued to grow at the same rate as in the past 20 years, government spending would rise from one-third of the gross national product to more than half the GNP in two more decades.

CASPAR WEINBERGER spread the alarm. In a farewell speech as Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare last summer, Weinberger said:

"There is an overriding danger inherent in this growth of an American welfare state. The danger is simply that we may undermine our whole economy. If social programs continue growing for the next two decades at the same pace they have in the last two, we will spend more than half of our whole gross national product for domestic social programs alone by the year 2000."

If these fearmongers had consulted history, they would have learned that the basic federal income assistance programs such as social security and unemployment insurance date from the 1930s. They were humanitarian responses of a democratic society, designed to help millions of people at the time in their lives when they needed a cushion against hardship and as countercyclical devices to pump purchasing power into the economy.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office issued a study in December which, by providing some historical perspective, deflates the reactionary rhetoric.

The CBO study reviewed 11 major federal income assistance programs, such as social security, jobless pay, medicare, medicaid, aid to families with dependent children and food stamps. In 1955, four were nonexistent and the other seven were just beginning to expand benefits and coverage.

Therefore, the study said, spending on such programs rose from 3.4 percent of GNP in 1951 to 9.3 percent in 1975.

In making its projections, the CBO study said that if current programs are maintained and benefits adjusted to keep up with inflation, the costs will be about 10 percent of the GNP by year 2000.

LOCAL UNION cooperation has been the key to the successful job-development and placement effort of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, HRDI Executive Director Charles Bradford, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Dobkin of the Associated Press and Sarah Fritz of United Press International.

How to Buy:

Price Outlook Better in '76, But Consumers Can't Relax

By Sidney Margolius

WHAT CAN YOU EXPECT in living costs and conditions for 1976? Probably a better year than you've had since 1972. Costs of some very vital needs will continue to rise, but some commodities are leveling off and even receding from recent runaway levels. At the same time, rising business volume indicates an improvement in the employment outlook if not in all industries.

On the whole, you can expect that living costs may rise in the neighborhood of 5 percent to 6 percent compared to the 7½ percent of the past 12 months.

The lower inflation rate may provide some relief for working families who have suffered a steady erosion of buying power since 1972. That year, average weekly earnings for a worker with three dependents were $121.09. That sum had a buying power in terms of 1967 dollars of $96.64.

This past fall those average earnings had gone up to $150.73, seemingly a big increase. But adjusted for the inflation since 1967, that $150.73 could buy only $92.13 of goods and services. The grim irony is that the average wage-earner now has $29.64 more in his pay envelopes but has lost $4.51 in buying power.

How well you fare this year may depend on how you plan your money management and buying, and how flexible you may be in adjusting eating and living habits.

The three big problems for 1976 are a further rise in the already lofty cost of home operating expenses, the increase in car ownership costs, the persistent long-term increase in medical costs—up another 12 percent in the past 12 months.

While food prices have been leveling off, you still need to shop with care since food does take 25 percent of the average wage-earner's after-tax expenditures.

Very young families and the elderly will have the most stubborn living-cost problems in '76 because of still rising housing and medical costs.

Here are specific price trends so you know what you have to deal with in '76:

FOOD: Cheaper beef and poultry can help keep your food bills at present levels or a little lower, at least until next summer.

Underlying reason for the recent drop in beef's price is that producers have been shipping more grass-fed young beef because of high costs of grain feeding, although more grain-fed beef will be marketed in 1976. Grass-fed beef is cheaper, and because more is being shipped at a younger age, is more tender than it usually is.

Since it has a thinner fat covering and less marbling, grass-fed beef actually is more nutritious than grain-fed. The "choice" grade beef from grain-fed cattle typically is 25 percent fat. The lower "good" grade from grass-fed or "short-fed" cattle may range from 18 to 22 percent fat.

Another potential help is the lower prices expected on poultry. Usually you can figure that if the price of broilers is half that of ground beef, the broilers are the better value.

Sharpest increase has been on pork. While pork is expected to be a little more abundant and a little less expensive this coming year, some of the present prices are obviously irrational, such as the tags of over $2 a pound for bacon.

As food prices have jumped, consumers generally have resorted to three ways to defend their budgets. They noticeably have cut consumption of foods which have gone up most, especially meat, sugar and sugar-using products including canned fruits, and coffee; buying in bulk and in larger sizes, even institutional sizes; seeking out new lower-cost forms of traditional foods, such as ground turkey, at less cost than ground beef, and soya products for blending with ground beef and for nutritional enrichment of casseroles, soups, etc.; and also a noticeable tendency to reduce use of the costlier "convenience" foods.

HOUSING: Most new houses now are in the $38,000-$40,000 bracket. Prices of older homes also have risen sharply. The median now is $35,400—11 percent higher than a year ago.

Heating costs have reached the point where some families now phone their fuel-oil dealers ahead of time to ask how much the delivery will cost, and some ask to go on a twelve-month plan.

As well as controlling use of heat, hot water and utilities, this also is a year to weatherstrip and insulate as much as you can. The cost of insulation has not risen nearly as much as the cost of fuel.

CAR COSTS: All car owner and operating costs have risen to the point where those for even an intermediate-size eight-cylinder car in metropolitan areas now are estimated by the AAA at $2,250 a year if you drive 10,000 miles, or 22.5 cents a mile. Costs of even a six-cylinder compact now are estimated at 18.5 cents a mile.

The main needs are to curb depreciation (annual loss in market value) through meticulous care, and to hold down gasoline consumption. Gasoline prices went up another 10 percent in 1975.

2 to 225 Million:

U.S. Census System Grows with Nation

THE NATION'S POPULATION in 1980 will be between 220 and 225 million, the Bureau of the Census forecasts.

This is quite a jump from the approximately two million on July 4, 1776, and the 3,929,214 in the first census in 1790.

When the Declaration of Independence was signed, there had been population counts, of sorts, taken in the colonies by British officials. However, nothing like a complete count of the inhabitants had ever been attempted.

The enumeration of 1790 was made to provide an equitable basis for representation in the House of Representatives. The idea of some form of representative legislative body was basic to the political thinking of the 55 delegates assembled at the 1787 Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia.

The Constitution, when ready for state ratification on Sept. 17, 1787, provided that representatives and direct taxes should be apportioned among the states according to their respective numbers, and that the enumeration should be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress, and within every subsequent term of 10 years. Thus the framework of representation and apportionment was established in the beginning.

The first Census Act provided that the census should begin on the first Monday in August 1790 and should be completed in nine months. U.S. marshals were put in charge. Every person of 16 years and older was required to answer the census questions to the best of his or her knowledge "on pain of forfeiting 20 dollars." Thus, from the beginning, answering census questions was required by law.

The 1800 census asked for the age of the white population in addition to the information collected in 1790. Then in 1810, against the background of renewed trouble with Great Britain, Congress recognized the importance of developing the nation's economic independence from foreign manufactures. So the census was expanded to include inquiries on manufacturing to determine the kinds, quantities, and values of goods processed in each state and territory.

Many reforms were instituted in the 1850 census, the most far-reaching of which was the beginning of the individual enumeration of persons. Each free person, not just the head of the family, was to have his name recorded, together with specified details. Each slave was to be personally identified. The census inquired in greater detail than ever before about farming, business, industry and mining. The 1850 census was the first to offer protection of confidentiality for information provided.

The tenth Census Act, providing for the 1880 census, required the supervisors and enumerators, who for the first time replaced the federal marshals and assistants, to take an oath: "I will not disclose any information contained in the schedule, lists, or statements obtained by me to any person or persons, except to my superiors." This essentially is the same oath all census employes must swear today.

Tabulation of data collected in the 1890 and 1900 census was staggering because of the many subjects covered. It was apparent that planning each decennial census, which had been done by Congress since 1790, was a job for specialists.

Thus Congress set up a permanent Census Office which later became the Bureau of the Census in the Commerce Dept.

In the late 1930s, the bureau pioneered the use of the sampling technique, offering replies from a scientifically selected cross-section of the population which represented the answers that a full census would provide at a fraction of the time and cost.

This culminated in the Current Population Survey, which has been conducted every month since 1940, providing fast, up-to-date measures of many social and economic trends.

Further Expansion Sought:

Social Security Act Found Healthy at 40

After 40 years of social security—that has brought billions in benefits to the elderly, disabled, unemployed, dependent children and the sick—the far-reaching social program has yet to reach its full potential, Wilbur J. Cohen writes in the American Federationist.

Cohen, a former secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, terms the program one of the most significant developments in social legislation in the nation's history.

Despite unrelenting attacks since its inception, social security has made substantial progress over the years, he observes. Congress has approved major improvements and extensions of the program 15 times since it was first enacted in 1935.

During the 1930s, most of the opposition to social security came from employers and conservative Republican politicians. The attacks were vicious and emotional, punctuated with such labels as "compulsion," "regimentation," and "socialism."

Attempts by employers, the Republican Party and the Hearst newspapers to use social security as a campaign ploy in the 1936 presidential election backfired, Cohen points out.

"Whereas they thought the average man would rebel against the so-called "pay cut" which would occur because of the new payroll contributions for social security, the reaction of the workers at the time was that if employers were suddenly so solicitous of their welfare, there must be something right about old age insurance," he notes.

The overwhelming defeat of Alf Landon was viewed as voter endorsement of President Roosevelt's social programs. The electoral support also helped convince the Supreme Court that the social security act was constitutional.

Today's attacks on social security are more sophisticated, but the goal is the same—to weaken or change the system and take away the basic right to social insurance benefits while imposing obnoxious qualifications and restriction, Cohen warns.

Now the dean of the College of Education at the University of Michigan, Cohen points out that 90 percent of the nation's workers are covered by social security.

"It is no exaggeration to say that, in one way or another, the life of every one of the 215 million people in the United States presently is affected by the overall social security program," Cohen stresses.

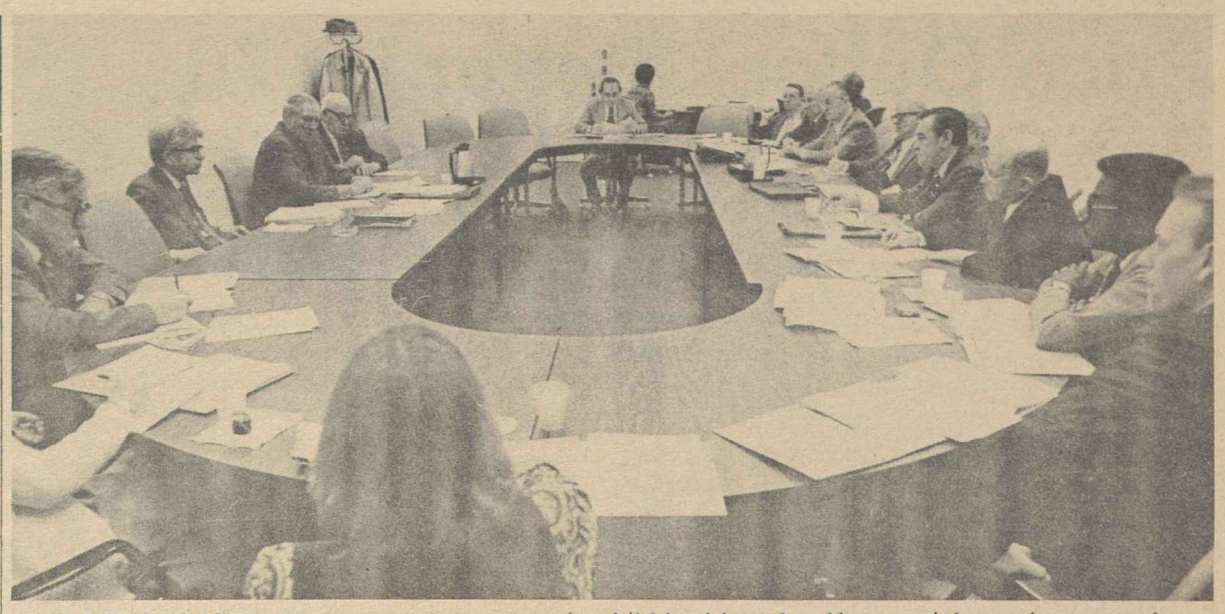
Social security, which paid out more than $100 billion in benefits in 1974, has become an accepted part of the American way of life, the article notes.

More than 32 million persons are receiving regular old age benefits every month. Several million others are drawing weekly unemployment insurance, and some 11 million receive monthly welfare checks under AFDC. Another 4 million aged, blind and disabled persons receive supplemental social security income regularly and 25 million needy persons were given assistance under the Medicaid program in 1974.

Cohen points out that social security and other federal, state and private pension and social welfare programs, disburse $15 billion every month—"a significant volume of purchasing power which has set a floor under consumer income and moderated the adverse economic impact of the recession on families and the economy."

The widespread acceptance of social security is due largely to the contributory earnings-related social insurance philosophy that has long had the support of the AFL-CIO, he observes.

The emphasis on individual and social responsibility is now widely accepted by liberals and conservatives and most socio-economic groups.



"The federal statutory right to earned benefits without recourse to welfare or resource restrictions appeals to minorities as well as the majority. The low cost of administering the program—only 2 percent of benefits—has made the social security program a distinctive and acceptable feature of a free society."

While the program has made remarkable achievements, Cohen stresses that Congress and the President must consider resolving immediate and long-run needs of social security.

He urges expanding the maximum earnings base from the present $15,300 a year to $24,000 so income can be increased to cover anticipated expenditures and rebuild the reserve fund.

"The most far-reaching legislation needed is the enactment of a national health insurance plan as part of the social security system," he suggests. "Proponents of public-sector responsibility in a national health insurance plan believe that only through the public sector can equity to all participating individuals be assured."

"The social security program is a sound structure on which we can build and adopt to changing needs," Cohen advises. "We have both the economic resources and the administrative capacity to continue to improve it incrementally in relation to our national priorities and productivity."

POLICY REVIEW of government programs in child health and welfare, social security, unemployment compensation and related areas is conducted by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Social Security and staff experts in social insurance and legislation. The committee also explored legislative developments in labor-sponsored health and social programs.

Labor Dept. Ordered to Justify Ending 'No Hands in Dies' Rule

Philadelphia—A three-judge panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the Labor Dept. failed to justify its revocation of a "no hands in dies" standard protecting workers from serious hazards in the operation of power presses.

Responding to a suit brought by the AFL-CIO and the federation's Industrial Union Dept., the judges directed the Labor Dept. to explain fully why it dropped the labor-backed safety provision in favor of less restrictive safeguards.

Named in the suit were former Labor Sec. Peter J. Brennan and Assistant Labor Sec. John H. Stender, former head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, who authorized modification of the standard Dec. 3, 1974.

The case is based on a section of the 1970 Occupational Safety & Health Act that requires the Secretary of Labor, whenever he promulgates a new rule substantially different from an existing national consensus standard, to spell out "the reasons why the rule as adopted will better effectuate the purposes of the act."

Although Brennan listed six reasons for revoking the consensus standard, the judicial panel concluded the statement "does not adequately disclose why the rule he adopted" will better achieve the intent of the safety law.

In the metal stamping industry, which is highly dependent on power press operations, the current injury rate is 23.2 per 100 workers annually, according to Labor Dept. reports.

Thousands of workers who must insert, adjust or extract stock manually while operating power presses face the hazard of mangled fingers and hands or amputations every year. In Michigan alone, job injury statistics showed that during 1973 there were 307 amputations on power presses resulting from workers placing their hands in die areas.

Although a number of power press injuries are the result of mechanical failure, most safety experts agree, the leading cause of injuries is human error—particularly when workers are required to place their hands in danger zones of the presses.

Hoping to eliminate these serious "point of operation" injuries, the American National Standards Institute in February 1971 published the "no hands in dies" consensus standard.

The standard spelled out the responsibility of employers to modify power presses within three years after its adoption to eliminate the need of press operators to insert their hands in the hazardous die areas.

The Secretary of Labor adopted the standard on May 29, 1971, and set an effective rate of Aug. 31, 1974—giving employers more than three years to make the needed changes on their presses.

But the new safety standard soon came under fire from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the American Metal Stamping Association, which called for its revocation.

Pressure from business and employer groups caused OSHA early in 1974 to propose revocation of the standard even before it was to go into effect.

The Labor Secretary made it official on Dec. 3, 1974, declaring that the "no hands in dies" rule was neither technically nor economically feasible and substituting a so-called "fail safe" system on presses that would halt operations until a mechanical failure is corrected.

In its suit, the AFL-CIO agreed that the "no hands" rule may not be feasible for all power presses, but stressed, "it does not follow that a universal departure from the national consensus standard would better effectuate the purposes of OSHA."

The suit pointed out that studies show the "no hands" rule is both economically and technologically feasible on many mechanical presses, but "nowhere does the Secretary discuss the reason why a partial departure from the national consensus standard would be inappropriate."

While the Labor Dept. is preparing its response to the judicial panel, the diluted standard will remain in effect, OSHA said.

Meanwhile, OSHA has placed the metal stamping industry in its national emphasis program, an effort to curb injuries and occupational illnesses in particularly hazardous jobs. The injury rate in metal stamping operations is more than double that for all of private nonfarm industry.

Food Pushes Wholesale Index Down

Wholesale prices fell four-tenths of 1 percent last month, despite another increase in prices of industrial commodities, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The decline in the government's wholesale price index in December was the first in six months and the largest since last March.

Prices of industrial commodities rose by six-tenths of 1 percent, seasonally adjusted, the same increase as in November. The industrial items index was up by 6 percent for the entire year.

Just about all industrial prices rose in December, BLS noted, but those for lumber and wood products, pulp, paper and miscellaneous products rose more than in November.

A sharp drop in food prices—more than double the November decline—was responsible for the drop in the overall wholesale price index, the government reported. Farm products and processed foods and feeds declined a seasonally adjusted 2.5 percent in December.

The overall wholesale price index stood at 178.7 percent of its 1967 base, or 4.2 percent higher than a year earlier. At the end of 1974, wholesale prices were 20.9 percent above the December 1973 level.

Multinationals Assailed As Threat to Economy

"Multinational corporations indulging in unbridled pursuit of corporate profit pose a direct threat to the economic health of the United States," President I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., charges in the latest issue of Viewpoint magazine.

Viewpoint, the IUD's quarterly magazine of opinion, looks at the operations of multinational corporations and their effects on the economy, job opportunities and future of American working people. In the foreword, Abel says:

"America's working men and women have been the first to feel the effects of multinational corporate activity, through losses of jobs, and job opportunities, to imports or the restricting of exports of manufacturing goods."

"Loss of American jobs, the siphoning off of technological advantage, and the flight of American investment capital are now making themselves felt on a wider scale. . . . It is time and past time for our nation to reassert its public interest. We must reform the tax and other laws that not only permit but require the shifting overseas of so much American production and jobs."

In its articles, Viewpoint examines the effect of U.S. tax law in encouraging overseas investment and job creation by multinationals, how export of American technology is damaging the country's economic future, the cost in lost U.S. job opportunities of multinational overseas activity, and the enormous political power enjoyed by multinational corporations.

President Dominick D'Ambrosio of the Allied Industrial Workers writes of his union's experiences with a multinational corporation. North American Rep. Laurent C. Enkell of the International Union of Food & Allied Workers' Association discusses the efforts of international trade secretariats to meet the problems posed by multinationals to trade unions.

The Industrial Union Dept., in a resolution adopted by its convention last September, called on the Congress "to implement policies" ensuring that multinational operations follow public policy. The resolution called for an end to tax laws favoring foreign operations of multinational firms, governmental monitoring of the corporations' activities, and regulation of technology exports.

Meany Hits Ford Inaction:

8.5% Jobless Rate Sets 34-Year Mark

ures for the year 1975 "badly understate" both the numbers and the impact of unemployment on America.

"To get the true measure," he said, "the 1.2 million workers too discouraged to even seek work must be added to the 7.9 million the government officially counts as jobless.

"In addition, 3.5 million Americans were compelled to work part-time because full-time work was not available," Meany noted. "If those 3.5 million workers are working half-time—and that is a generous estimate—then realistically half that number must be added to the unemployment figures.

"In other words, a truer unemployment figure is 10.85 million workers, or 11.6 percent of the work force."

In the government's detailed report on employment and unemployment in December, the number of jobless workers during the month totaled 7,768,000 while the number of persons with jobs stood at 85,511,000.

December employment was 233,000 above the November level of 85,278,000 while the number of jobless was 67,000 more than in November. The jobless rate remained the same because of an increase of 300,000 in the civilian labor force. The labor force last month totaled 93,279,000.

Total employment in December was nearly 1.7 million higher than the recession low of 83.8 million last March. Industry payroll employment, up by 240,000 in December, stood at 77.8 million.

While the total number of industry payroll jobs has grown by about 1.5 million since last June, BLS noted, the payroll job count was still about 1 million below the record level reached in September 1974. December gains were registered in nearly two-thirds of the 172 industries surveyed monthly, BLS said.

The average duration of joblessness edged down in December to 16.4 weeks, after registering a large increase in the previous month. Nevertheless, BLS noted, the number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer rose slightly — a continuation of the steady increases of the past two years.

The number of "hard-core" jobless—persons out of work for 27 weeks or longer—remained at a record 1.6 million last month. A year earlier, the number of hard-core unemployed was about one-third of that figure, or 537,000.

Among the various labor force groups, the employment situation improved over the month mostly for adult males and blue-collar workers. The jobless rate for adult men fell four-tenths of 1 percent to 6.5 percent while the rate for blue-collar workers dropped from 11 to 10.3 percent.

But rates for most of the other major labor force categories, including household heads, full-time workers and married men, showed little change. The rates for adult women and teenagers rose by two-tenths of 1 percent each to 8 and 19.9 percent, respectively.

Employment in manufacturing increased by 80,000 in December, BLS reported, with about two-thirds of the increase occurring in the durable-goods sector.

Contract-construction employment was about unchanged at its recession low, some 700,000 jobs below the peak attained in early 1974. Employment in services continued to climb, rising by 60,000 over the month.

'For Us It's 100%!'

Unions Sue Government On Arbitration Dispute

Both principle and paychecks are involved in a suit brought by the Federal Employees Pay Council to compel the government to live up to an agreement to arbitrate a complex salary-setting controversy.

The Pay Council represents federal white-collar workers in procedures to determine the size of the pay raise needed each year to comply with the law that ties government salaries to private industry pay for comparable jobs. It has three members designated by the AFL-CIO, including the two top officers of the American Federation of Government Employees, and two persons named by unaffiliated unions.

Representing federal management in the salary-setting process are the Civil Service Commission and the Office of Management & Budget. The heads of the two agencies are "the President's agent," in the terminology of the salary comparability law.

The dispute arose out of the formula for determining the comparability matchup between government and private industry jobs—specifically the job definitions of secretary and computer operators.

If the management-proposed job descriptions were adopted, the comparability pay increase would be lower. The reason, the unions contend, is that higher-level government jobs would be matched against lower-level private industry employment.

The controversy arose in 1974 and the parties agreed not to include data for the disputed job categories in the salary mix while they tried to resolve their differences.

Finally, on Feb. 25, 1975, the Pay Council and management signed a formal agreement for third-party arbitration of the dispute. But before the arbitration took place, the Justice Dept. issued an advisory opinion that government management had no right to enter into such an agreement.

Despite union protests, the Civil Service Commission and OMB accepted the Justice Dept. position and abandoned the arbitration move. Then, when further direct negotiations failed to resolve the dispute, management on Dec. 11, 1975, announced a unilateral decision to impose the job definitions the unions had challenged.

The Pay Council has now sued in federal district court to seek a judicial determination that the arbitration agreement was lawful, and to compel management to comply with it.

Last year's comparability pay adjustment was slashed by President Ford from the 8.66 percent found due under the salary-setting procedure to 5 percent as an "economy" move. Government unions see the unilateral management interpretation of salary comparability as another squeeze on federal workers.

The dispute does not affect blue-collar government workers, whose hourly pay rates are tied to wage scales in the localities where they work.

Dunlop Quits In Aftermath Of Ford Veto

a right-wing band opposed to the concept of collective bargaining."

Dunlop cast no stones in his resignation statement and specified that he was not resigning "in protest of the veto," but because his soundings indicated that he wouldn't be able to accomplish much in the atmosphere that has developed since the veto.

The decision to resign was his own, he stressed. In talking to labor and management leaders over the past several weeks, he did not seek or receive advice on whether he should remain in office.

Dunlop did make an indirect reference to the pressure of Republican Party conservatives on Ford to veto the bill, and to the widespread belief that Ford went back on his word in order to appease the Reagan wing of the GOP.

Dunlop said he accepted President Ford's invitation to join the Cabinet a year ago after Ford had told him that his "first priority" was to restore communications between the labor movement and the Administration so as to achieve cooperation of both labor and management in dealing with the nation's serious economic problems.

He cited minimum wage legislation and workers' compensation as areas he had intended to explore during the coming months with labor and management.

While Dunlop carefully avoided blaming Ford for pulling the rug out from under him by the veto, he acknowledged in reply to a question that the President was aware of the probable repercussions when he decided to veto the bill.

The reaction to the Ford veto, Dunlop stressed, goes beyond the construction industry and affects labor, management and government relations generally.

Until Feb. 1, Dunlop plans to serve merely as a "caretaker" head of the Labor Dept., avoiding testimony before congressional committees. He told reporters that he had not discussed a successor with Ford, nor made a recommendation.

California Witnesses Pin Blame For Job Crisis on Ford Policies

Los Angeles—Organized labor laid the blame for high unemployment, inflation and rising personal bankruptcies at the doorstep of the Ford Administration in a one-day congressional hearing on jobs here.

"The Administration's rationale is that high unemployment is essential to the control of inflation," John F. Henning, executive secretary of the California AFL-CIO, told a regional hearing of the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

"It hasn't worked. The cost of fuel, food and interest rates, for example, are still stealing worker dollars and bringing new and frightening bankruptcies to American industry."

Rather than a continuation of the Administration's "ruinous policies" of economic restriction, Henning said the nation should embark on a course of fiscal and monetary expansion.

His testimony came at the fourth in a series of regional hearings that are part of the congressional committee's 30th anniversary review of the Employment Act of 1946, which charged the federal government with the responsibility for insuring full employment.

"The White House tells us that we must accept an unemployment rate of 7.9 percent throughout 1976," Henning said. "That would be the highest jobless rate of the industrialized world.

"We have been living with the tragedy of an approximate 8 million workers unemployed month after month nationally and an approximate 1 million unemployed in California. We're tired of it."

He said December jobless rates were 9.8 percent in San Francisco, 9.6 percent in Los Angeles, 10.8 percent in San Diego, and 11.9 percent in the Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario area.

Job opportunities in California not only have failed to grow sufficiently even to begin to approach full employment, he said, but have declined in absolute numbers during the past year.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, described stories of staggering unemployment in Los Angeles and throughout California as "tragic" and "outrageous."

"This country must come to grips with the fact that we are just spinning our wheels on the problems of unemployment," Humphrey declared. "It is fiscally irresponsible . . . not to do something about the unemployed."

The Joint Economic Committee will sponsor a national conference in Washington, D.C., in mid-March to review the findings of its regional hearings and to prepare legislative recommendations.

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley, another witness at the hearing here, gave the most dramatic testimony on the impact of high unemployment in the city.

Bradley recited the story of applicants for an opening as an elevator mechanic's helper at City Hall, with a starting salary of $864 a month. A crowd started gathering at 4 a.m. on a Monday and by 7 a.m., more than 300 applicants were in line.

One man was injured when a plate glass door broke as the crowd pushed to get the job applications. Police had to be called to restore order. The turnout was the largest the city has had for a single opening with no educational or experience requirements. And the job was not advertised.

Pension Plan Terminations Exceed 5,000

An unexpectedly large number of pension plans served notice of termination during 1975, the government's pension benefits insurance agency reported.

The agency received 5,035 notices of termination—representing nearly one out of 20 covered pension plans. A sampling of terminations last May indicated that most of the discontinued programs were small, with an average of 30 persons each.

While the agency did not have a breakdown of the reasons for termination, AFL-CIO Associate Social Security Director Lawrence Smedley cited two contributing factors. One was the unusually large number of business failures resulting from the recession. The other was the anticipation of higher employer costs under new pension funding requirements that became effective on Jan. 1, 1976.

Under the 1974 pension reform law, the compulsory insurance program will in most cases protect workers covered by the discontinued plans against loss of vested benefits. Where assets of the plan are insufficient to meet the basic obligations of the pension fund, the insurance program makes up the difference.

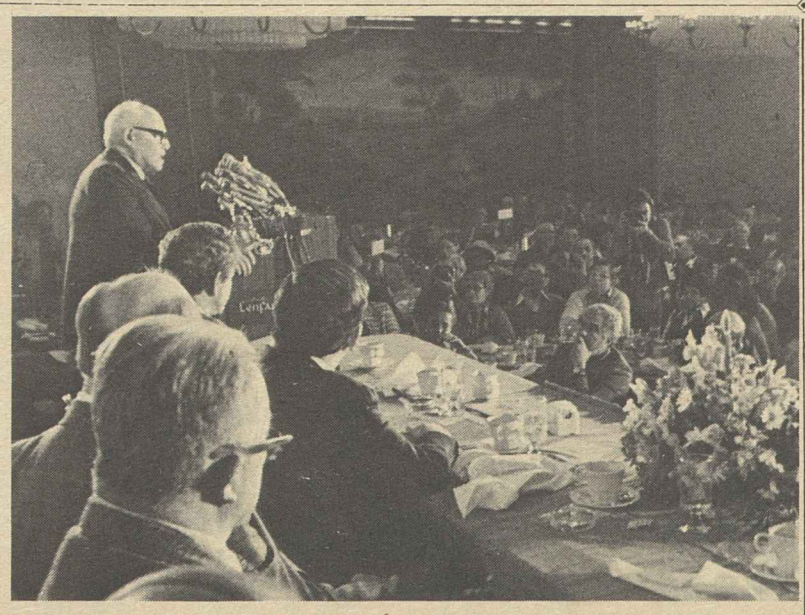
Ford's Stand-Pat Program Called Policy For Disaster

W. J. Usery Named to Labor Post

AFL-CIO President George Meany congratulated W. J. Usery, Jr., upon his nomination as Secretary of Labor and said organized labor wishes him well in carrying out the duty of the office to "promote the welfare of American workers."



Meany observed, however, that the 52-year-old former Machinist is assuming the office "under difficult circumstances following the events which compelled the resignation of one of the most distinguished secretaries of labor ever to hold that office, John Dunlop."

Dunlop resigned the post after reaching a "professional judgment" that he could no longer be effective in an atmosphere poisoned by President Ford's broken promise to sign the union-backed construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill.

Usery's nomination came on Jan. 22 and is subject to Senate confirmation. Ford, who announced his choice in the Oval Office of the White House with Usery by his side, expressed confidence in the Georgia native's ability to handle "this very tough job" in a year of heavy collective bargaining.

Usery, who has achieved a distinguished record over the past two years as director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, agreed with Ford that "it will be a tough job." He stressed, however, that he is an optimist and assured the President, "I will do my very best."

INVESTIGATION OF REPORTS linking campaign fund promises from anti-union employers to President Ford's veto of common-site picketing legislation is urged by AFL-CIO President George Meany during an address to the Ladies' Garment Workers legislative conference.

Cites Contractors' Checks:

Meany Asks Probe Of Bid to 'Buy' Veto

By John R. Oravec

AFL-CIO President George Meany called on the Federal Elections Commission to investigate published reports that anti-union contractors and businessmen offered payoffs to President Ford's election campaign in return for his veto of the common-site picketing legislation.

Meany charged that Ford's commitment to the building trades unions to sign the bill gave way to right-wing and employer pressure, political considerations and the promise of campaign funds.

While the White House was flooded with form letters stemming from a drive initiated by the National Right to Work Committee and the Chamber of Commerce, the President's campaign committee —according to press reports—also was receiving mail in the form of $1,000 checks, the legal maximum contribution from individuals.

There was an odd thing about the checks," Meany observed. "They were unsigned. But the letters attached promised that signed checks would be forwarded if the President vetoed the situs picketing bill.

"Here was a blatant attempt to purchase a veto. If these press reports are true — and to date there has been no denial from the White House — these proffered gifts to the President's campaign were in essence an attempt to bribe the President.

"In my opinion this phase of the effort to defeat the Situs Picketing-Collective Bargaining bill should be investigated by the Federal Elections Commission and by the Congress, which passed the bill."

Addressing a Ladies' Garment Workers legislative conference several hours before the delivery of the State of the Union message, Meany said that Ford's self-reversal on situs picketing is the clearest example of his lack of integrity.

Veto of Funding Bill First Test for House

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to override President Ford's veto of a key appropriations bill that includes funds for programs of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Labor Dept.

Most of the money for the government's social programs is tied up in the biggest non-defense funding bill—$36 billion for the current fiscal year plus $9 billion for a transition period involved in the changeover to a new fiscal year. It does not involve the Fiscal 1977 budget, which the President has just submitted.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the appropriations are "consistent" with the budget resolution adopted by Congress, but are about $1 billion more than Ford had requested.

The veto override attempt, set for Jan. 27 in the House, is seen as an important test of whether the President or Congress will have the final word on the nation's budget.

Biemiller noted in a letter to House members that the Administration had sought "drastic cutbacks" in such areas as medical research, child health services, mental health, alcohol and drug abuse programs, vocational rehabilitation and community service programs.

Included in the vetoed bill are

Budget Sets Tight Rein On Growth

By David L. Perlman

President Ford asked Congress and the American people to accept continued recession-level unemployment and to rely on private industry to lead the nation to a slow economic comeback.

His televised State of the Union address and a more detailed budget proposal used conservative Republican rhetoric to advocate a lesser role for government and greater individual "self-reliance."

It's "not the American way for the government to provide employment," Ford told reporters at a news briefing on his budget.

The President insisted that economic conditions are "better" even though the nation's unemployment is substantially higher than it was a year ago, when Ford grimly conceded that the State of the Union was "not good." He said the economy will improve even more if the government holds down spending.

In overall tone, Ford's proposed budget bore out AFL-CIO President George Meany's prediction that it would turn out to be "little more than a political gimmick, with about as much value as a campaign slogan."

Democrats Cite Need For Jobs

Congressional Democrats termed President Ford's economic program a prescription for disaster and called for job-creating programs to break the recession.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, was chosen by the Democratic congressional leadership to reply to Ford. Muskie addressed the nation from the office of Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield.

He told a nationwide television audience that Ford's "penny-wise and pound-foolish" program translates into "fewer jobs and higher prices."

The path to a balanced budget is full employment, Muskie stressed, and not the over 7 percent jobless rate and 7 million unemployed that Ford's budget projects for a year from now. The projected budget deficits for this year and next would be wiped out if the unemployment rate were brought back down to 1968 levels, Muskie declared.

Muskie challenged Ford's reliance on private industry to revive the economy and declared that unemployment must also be the concern of government.

With millions out of work, Muskie declared, "there are houses to build . . . roads to repair . . . rivers to clean . . . railroads to

Building Trades Map Campaign to Beat Ford

Cherry Hill, N.J.—Building trades leaders laid the groundwork at a regional conference here for an all-out campaign to defeat President Ford in 1976.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., called on the millions of trade unionists represented by the department's affiliated unions "to do everything in our power to prevent the nomination and election of President Ford."

Addressing nearly 400 representatives of local and state Building & Construction Trades Councils from 11 northeastern states, Georgine explored the problems of high unemployment in the building trades and Ford's political decision to veto the construction site picketing legislation.

When the President broke his promise on the legislative package, Georgine said, the nation was also deprived of the stability the construction industry needed in the companion collective bargaining measure.

"All of America lost," he stressed, "especially in the resignation of Labor Sec. John Dunlop, who had far too much integrity to remain in the Cabinet of a man whose word he no longer could trust."

Georgine said the building trades emerged "sadder but stronger" from the experience with Ford. "We continue to fight . . . not retire to a corner," he declared.

It's essential that the building trades work closely with COPE on NEWLY ORGANIZED bargaining unit of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees stages a sitdown strike at the Labor Dept. cafeteria, operated by Stouffer, Inc. The cafeteria workers took the action after Stouffer refused to recognize the union and to rehire two workers fired in the organizing effort.

Strike Hits Cafeteria in Labor Dept.

Food service workers staging a sitdown strike all but shut down the cafeteria in the new Labor Dept. building after their employer refused to recognize their union and rehire two discharged employes.

The cafeteria is operated by Stouffer, Inc., a non-union national food chain, under contract with the General Services Arministration. The Labor Dept. is a tenant of the GSA-managed building.

Members of the Government Employees working for the Labor Dept. reported that the strike is more than 80 percent effective. The cafeteria had not been a popular lunch rendezvous even before the strike because of Stouffer's anti-union reputation.

The strike began after 27 of the 31 cafeteria workers signed certification cards with Local 25 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees. Ronald Richardson, executive secretary-treasurer of the local, said the dispute intensified when the cafeteria management refused to recognize the bargaining unit and threatened to hire replacements for the strikers.

The cafeteria manager had fired six of the workers for union organizing activities prior to the strike, but has agreed to rehire four of the six.

Stouffer also has refused to discuss the implementation of grievance machinery or wage increases that it had promised workers earlier, Richardson said.

The payment of strike benefits to members of the new bargaining unit was approved shortly after the strike started at a general membership meeting of the local.

About 1,000 members of another bargaining unit of the local who are employed by General Services, Inc., which operates cafeterias in a number of other government buildings in Washington, ratified a new contract at the meeting providing for wage increases of 30 to 40 cents an hour.

Kahan Retiring From TWUA Post

New York—Irving Kahan, public relations and publications director of the Textile Workers of America, will retire Mar. 1 after 35 years on the union's staff.

Kahan left the commercial newspaper field to become the first editor of a weekly newspaper published by the former CIO Textile Dyers union in 1940. When the union became part of the TWUA in 1948, he served as managing editor and editor of Textile Labor. In 1957, he was named public relations and publications director. Kahan is 64.

Disclosure Rules Set In R-T-W Fund Case

A federal judge has spelled out rules under which the National Right to Work Legal Defense and Educational Foundation must divulge some of its corporate contributors.

The ruling is the latest in a case now almost three years old in which 10 unions are seeking to stop companies from using the right-to-work group as a cover for harassing legal actions against unions.

The unions contend such contributions constitute a violation of a section of the Landrum-Griffin Act that prohibits an employer or employer association from financing litigation by union members against their union.

Federal District Judge Charles Richey first ruled in June 1974 that the foundation must divulge its contributors. The foundation, an arm of the National Right to Work Committee, has lost a series of appeals since, including a March 1975 refusal by a three-judge appellate court to interfere in Richey's ruling.

The latest ruling was in response to a foundation appeal three days before its Jan. 8 deadline for divulging the names of a sampling of contributors.

The new ruling sets up a procedure for union lawyers to continue to find out as much information as possible from public records, then notify the court when additional information is necessary. The court will then handle each request in the continuing process, either by seeking further information from the parties or by holding private hearings.

Judge Richey denied a request by the "work" group that the court review the list of contributors and forward information from them to a federal magistrate appointed for the purpose. The magistrate would have been charged with deciding whether the contributors were in the same line of business as the unions, whether they had contracts with the unions and whether the contracts contained union security clauses.

In denying that request, Judge Richey said the procedure he established "represents an accommodation of interests deemed by this court to be the most equitable." But he said if his system proved "in any way deficient, this court reserves the power to reinstate the original provision of the June 15, 1974 order."

Union attorneys said it was "a Solomon-like compromise" that protected both sides but the foundation called it "a nose in the tent" for future disclosures. The right-to-work group feels that public disclosure will dry up its revenue sources and lead to "retaliation" by unions.

The latest ruling prevents union attorneys from communicating information on donors directly to officials of unions which have contracts with the company. But the lawyers can still have the information necessary to prove that the contributions by companies violate the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Unions joining in the suit are the Auto Workers; Machinists; Teachers; Farm Workers; State, County & Municipal Employees; Television & Radio Artists; Sheet Metal Workers; Laborers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Communications Workers.

The original suit was filed by the unions in May 1973.

Mediation Service Cites Archie Robinson

Robinson is currently working on a biography of AFL-CIO President George Meany.

To Achieve Potential:

Labor Asks Changes In Group Health Law

The AFL-CIO called for early congressional action on amendments to the Health Maintenance Organization Act that would give prepaid health care groups a fair chance to compete with fee-for-service providers.

The potential of the HMO law for improving health delivery and containing costs cannot be achieved without the amendments, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned in testimony before a Senate Health subcommittee.

Seidman told the subcommittee the AFL-CIO supports efforts to improve the original legislation needed to:

- Clarify the intent of Congress on "dual choice" health plans—without interpretation by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare—by giving unions the right to reject HMO options in negotiations.
- Modify a House-passed amendment so as to phase in over a five-year period a requirement that HMO professionals spend the majority of their time treating prepaid members.
- Reduce the basic package of benefits and services that HMOs are presently required to provide before they can qualify under the act.
- Eliminate existing open enrollment provisions to prevent unfair burdening of HMOs with aged and chronically ill subscribers rejected by conventional health insurance programs.

"We are convinced that HMOs will enjoy a healthy growth if they are given the opportunity to compete on even terms with fee-for-service," Seidman declared. "All that is needed is a fair market test."

He pointed out that while the AFL-CIO supports the principle of open enrollment and a community rating system of prepaid health plans, the combination of the two in the existing law puts HMOs at a serious disadvantage.

"If HMOs are required to be community rated and at the same time maintain a policy of open enrollment, few are going to survive," Seidman warned.

He noted that missing from both the House and Senate versions of the legislation are needed provisions to make the HMO Act permanent, rather than a demonstration program.

He also pointed out that funding authorizations in the House-passed bill are too low and should be increased by the Senate, particularly for the next two fiscal years.

In an earlier address at a national conference of the Group Health Association of America, Seidman said it is especially vital for workers to keep options on health plans in union contract negotiations.

Although labor supports the development of effective prepaid group practice programs, he pointed out that it would be "naive to assume that every qualified HMO is necessarily good." Some existing HMOs should be avoided at all costs, he warned.

Seidman noted that both management and labor representatives are concerned with the escalating costs of health care and for the need to get maximum benefits for money contributed to the programs. And, he added, both sides of the bargaining table are also concerned about the broad scope of benefits mandated in the existing law.

"The required HMO package is so comprehensive, many employe benefit plans cannot afford it," he said stressing the need for the amendments before Congress to narrow the requirements.

"An HMO should not be required to provide a scope of benefits more comprehensive than the best medical, surgical and hospitalization coverage provided by traditional health insurance plans," Seidman observed.

Deferred Raises Average 5.4% In 1976 for 5.5 Million Workers

Deferred wage increases averaging 5.4 percent are scheduled to take effect this year under major collective bargaining agreements covering 5.5 million private, nonfarm workers, the Labor Dept. reported. This compares with a 5.1 percent average deferred increase in 1975.

In addition, more than 4.6 million of the 5.9 million workers under major contracts with cost-of-living escalator clauses are scheduled to receive at least one COL review—and possibly pay raise—in 1976, the government noted.

Deferred increases are wage-rate boosts negotiated in prior years. Major contracts are those covering 1,000 or more workers.

The Labor Dept.'s analysis also noted that at least 4.4 million workers are covered by contracts expiring or subject to renegotiation under wage reopener clauses in 1976, about 2 million more than last year.

Key negotiations are slated in the auto and farm equipment manufacturing industries, trucking, electrical equipment manufacturing, rubber products manufacturing and meatpacking.

The government's findings appear in the January issue of the Monthly Labor Review. In an article by Peter Kuhmerker, economist in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, these other observations are made about 1976 deferred wage increases:

- Such increases will be "appreciably higher" in the nonmanufacturing sector than in manufacturing—5.8 percent compared with 4.8 percent. In cents-per-hour terms, the averages for these two broad sectors will be 43.1 and 26.4 cents, respectively.

A major influence in the higher non-manufacturing increases is the construction industry. Some 928,000 construction workers are slated to receive an average of 8.1 percent, or 74.8 cents, in 1976.

- The deferred increases in construction are counterbalanced, to a degree, by smaller wage increases scheduled in the communications and railroad industries, 3.3 and 3 percent, respectively.
- The average deferred increase of 5.4 percent for all industries in 1976 amounts to 36.4 cents. Contracts negotiated in 1975 provided for an average 6.4 percent increase for 2.1 million workers this year. In addition, 3.4 million employes will receive a 4.8 percent average increase as a result of 1974 settlements.

"One reason for the disparity in size of the average increase under contracts negotiated in these two years is the 'front-loading' of wage increases in long-term contracts," the article observes.

"Wage increases, on a percentage basis, generally decline considerably from the first to the second year of a contract and, to a lesser extent, from the second to the third."

On the cost-of-living escalators, the Labor Dept. notes that about 58 percent — 5.9 million — of all workers under major contracts in the private, nonfarm sector are covered by such provisions.

Of the 5.9 million workers covered by escalator provisions, 2.4 million—primarily in the transportation and steel industries—are under quarterly reviews, and 2.5 million, mainly in communications, trucking and eletrical equipment, are under annual reviews.

An additional 824,000 workers, mostly in the railroad industry, are under contracts calling for semi-annual reviews.

Political Deal Charged:

Ohio AFL-CIO Hits Retreat on Safety

Columbus, O.—The Ohio AFL-CIO has called on Gov. James A. Rhodes to reconsider a decision to scuttle the joint federal-state job safety enforcement program.

The state federation also demanded the resignation of two Rhodes administration officials, whom it accused of plotting to kill the state role in occupational safety and health efforts.

The existing federal-state program was developed under former Gov. John J. Gilligan through a Labor Dept. contract, which doubled the number of job safety inspectors in Ohio.

Under a 1972 agreement with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, 46 state inspectors were assigned to work with 44 federal inspectors to enforce the federal safety law. A year later, 13 more state inspectors were added to bolster enforcement efforts.

However, the effectiveness of the federal-state safety program disturbed employers throughout the state and business groups worked for the defeat of Gilligan in 1974 with the promise that safety enforcement programs would be curbed in the Rhodes administration, the state federation charged.

Documents the state federation released to the press implicate Gov. Rhodes and two of his top aides in an effort to make good on commitments made to business supporters in the 1974 election campaign, State AFL-CIO President Milan Marsh said.

"Yet, the governor refuses to personally answer the charges," Marsh said.

He described the effort to terminate the federal-state cooperation as "a secret plot" between the director of the Ohio Dept. of Industrial Relations and a regional official of OSHA.

Marsh called for the resignation of Mrs. Helen Evans, director of the department, and Sam J. McAdow, deputy director, for their role in the plan to terminate the safety program. He said that neither they nor the governor have denied the contents of those documents.

He said the Rhodes administration's claim that it is not abandoning job safety, but merely switching emphasis, cannot be defended.

Ohio had the most vigorous enforcement of the federal safety law in the nation, Marsh declared. "Ending this contract will mean a slash of more than 60 percent in OSHA enforcement in Ohio."

The state federation is also calling for an investigation by the Ohio legislature into the Rhodes administration's safety plan and asking the Ohio congressional delegation to look into the OSHA's role in the move to terminate the contract.

Illegal Payouts Probe Covers 30 Big Firms

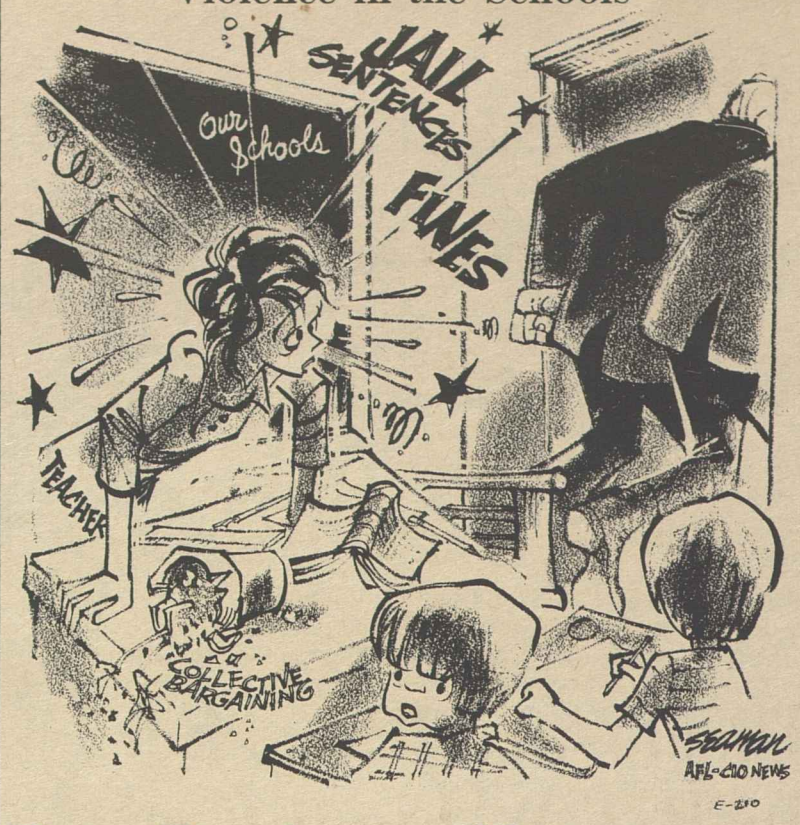
Thirty major American corporations, including some of the world's biggest multinational firms, are under investigation by the Securities & Exchange Commission for alleged improper payments, such as bribes, kickbacks and illegal political contributions, the government agency disclosed.

SEC Chairman Roderick M. Hills told a congressional subcommittee that another 15 companies have completed internal housecleaning investigations of their own and voluntarily informed the federal agency of the results. In several instances, he said, questionable payments and activities were involved.

Earlier, Gulf Oil Corp.'s board of directors announced the resignation of its chairman, Bob R. Dorsey, and two other executives in the wake of a scandal involving illegal political contributions by the company, both at home and abroad.

In addition to Gulf, Hills said, the SEC had bought civil injunctive actions against American Shipbuilding Co., Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co., Sanitas Corp., United Brands Co., General Refractories Co., Phillips Petroleum Co., Northrop Corp., and Ashland Oil, Inc.

Hills declined to identify any other companies involved in the growing scandal. The names of the foregoing corporations already had been made public.



Hills, along with Stanley Sporkin, the SEC's enforcement chief, appeared before the Priorities & Economy in Government subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee to give the commission's initial status report on its inquiry into improper corporate payments.

Hills said the SEC's investigations have revealed problems of a "serious magnitude." Corporate payments differed from company to company, he said, ranging from bonuses to selected employes that were kicked back for use as illegal domestic political contributions to direct payments to foreign governments or consultants in return for favorable business concessions.

"Payments aggregating tens of millions of dollars" were involved in the illegal payoffs, Hills said.

"In each case," he noted, "there was direct involvement and participation by senior management officials coupled with, in most cases, a concealment of the practices from the full board of directors and outside auditors."

Violence in the Schools

Pay Package Narrows Pittsburgh School Issues

The striking Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers tentatively agreed to a $9.5 million salary package proposed by a citizens' factfinding committee but still had not worked out a back-to-work agreement with the city school board.

Negotiations to resolve several important non-economic issues continued and, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, the PFT maintained its picket lines.

The salary proposal would provide $3 million for increases in the first year of a two-year contract, $6.5 million in the second.

Yet to be settled were the issues of class size, discipline, job security, implementation of reading program improvements and other matters.

Teachers' salaries under the old contract that expired last Nov. 30 ranged from $8,700 to $16,700 a year. No agreement had been reached on how the $9.5 million proposal would be distributed in terms of raises at the AFL-CIO News press time.

The five-member committee that recommended the settlement was appointed by an Allegheny County court judge. The teachers went on strike last Dec. 1.

After approval by the union's negotiators, terms of the agreement must be approved by PFT's executive board, then submitted to the organization's membership for ratification. Involved are some 3,700 teachers and 700 teachers' aides.

Common Pleas Court Judge Donald E. Ziegler, who appointed the special factfinding commission, ordered 18 local union leaders to appear in court on Jan. 23 to show cause why they should not be fined or jailed for contempt if they did not end the strike.

Ziegler already had fined the union $75,000 for ignoring his Jan. 3 back-to-work orders.

Meanwhile, a teachers' strike in the United States Virgin Islands gathered support on the mainland with picketing of Virgin Islands information offices sponsored by the American Federation of Teachers and the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. in Washington, New York, Chicago, Miami, San Francisco, and other cities.

The teachers' walkout on the islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas and St. John began on Jan. 8, seven months after their old contract expired.

A district court found the Virgin Islands teachers and a local of teachers' aides guilty of violating an order restraining the walkout and fined each of the two AFT locals involved $5,000 a day. In addition, each striking teacher was fined a day's pay for each day out.

The Virgin Islands government put a long list of restrictive proposals before the teachers' negotiating team during 13 days of talks last fall. Among them was a proposed freeze on increments and salaries until at least 1977 and a 20 percent increase in class sizes.

PICKETS MARCH outside the Virgin Islands Government information office in Washington in support of a two-week-old strike by teachers on the islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas and St. John. Taking part in the demonstration were national officers of the American Federation of Teachers, the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., and the Washington Teachers Union, Local 6.

Import Quotas Supported for Specialty Steel

Union and industry officials have urged President Ford to adopt the recommendations of the government's International Trade Commission and impose quotas on specialty steel imports.

The commission found that imports of stainless steel and alloy-tool steel had captured the majority of the U.S. market in some products and "sent unemployment in the industry soaring as high as 40 percent." Most of the imports come from Japan and Sweden; most of the domestic production comes from Pennsylvania.

It marked the first time that the commission had recommended quotas under the 1974 Trade Act.

Steelworkers President I. W. Abel, in a statement issued with specialty steel manufacturers who had joined the union last July in petitioning for import relief, termed the finding of injury "a major step in the right direction."

The President has 60 days to act on the recommendation, and the union and industry leaders urged him to approve it promptly. If the President should reject or change the recommendation, Congress would have an opportunity to overturn his rejection.

The commission voted 4-1, with one absention, to recommend an import quota that would be based on the average annual imports for each specialized steel product during the 1970-74 period. That would be a decline of more than 10 percent from recent import levels.

Since 1973, the share of the U.S. market for stainless and alloy steel doubled, the Trade Commission noted. It said that "during the latter part of 1974 and intensifying in 1975, imports soared, domestic shipments plummeted, and profits declined precipitously."

If Ford approves the restrictions, the quota will remain in effect for five years.

The union-industry statement said the hearings before the ITC demonstrated that the United States has "technological and productive superiority" in special steel manufacturing. But it said U.S. firms "cannot continue to meet the predatory price-cutting practices of the foreign specialty steel producers whose facilities are owned, directed or heavily subsidized by their governments."

Minton Cites Union Support For CARE

The labor movement continued to show its support for CARE during the past year, Lee W. Minton said in a report to AFL-CIO President George Meany.

Minton, who is president-emeritus of the Glass Bottle Blowers, is a CARE vice president and has long been active in the cooperative relief agency which channels food and assistance to needy persons throughout the world.

In addition to individual contributions from union members, Minton cited donations to CARE's African drought and famine relief program that included a $2,500 contribution from the AFL-CIO and $1,000 or more from the Ladies' Garment Workers, Retail Clerks, Greater New Orleans AFL-CIO and the Machinists.

He noted that 21 million people throughout the world were helped by CARE with food, school supplies, medicine and housing. Almost all of CARE's assistance, Minton said, went to infants, children and pregnant women.

Ford's Dangerous Policies

IF THE POLICIES of the Ford Administration and the policies of the Federal Reserve under Dr. Burns's chairmanship continue, we will have very high levels of unemployment—roughly 6 to 8 million unemployed—right on through the rest of this decade.

This means social instability—not only hardships on people, hardships on families and a really horrible economic situation—but social and political instability are built into that kind of thing. It's very dangerous for American society.

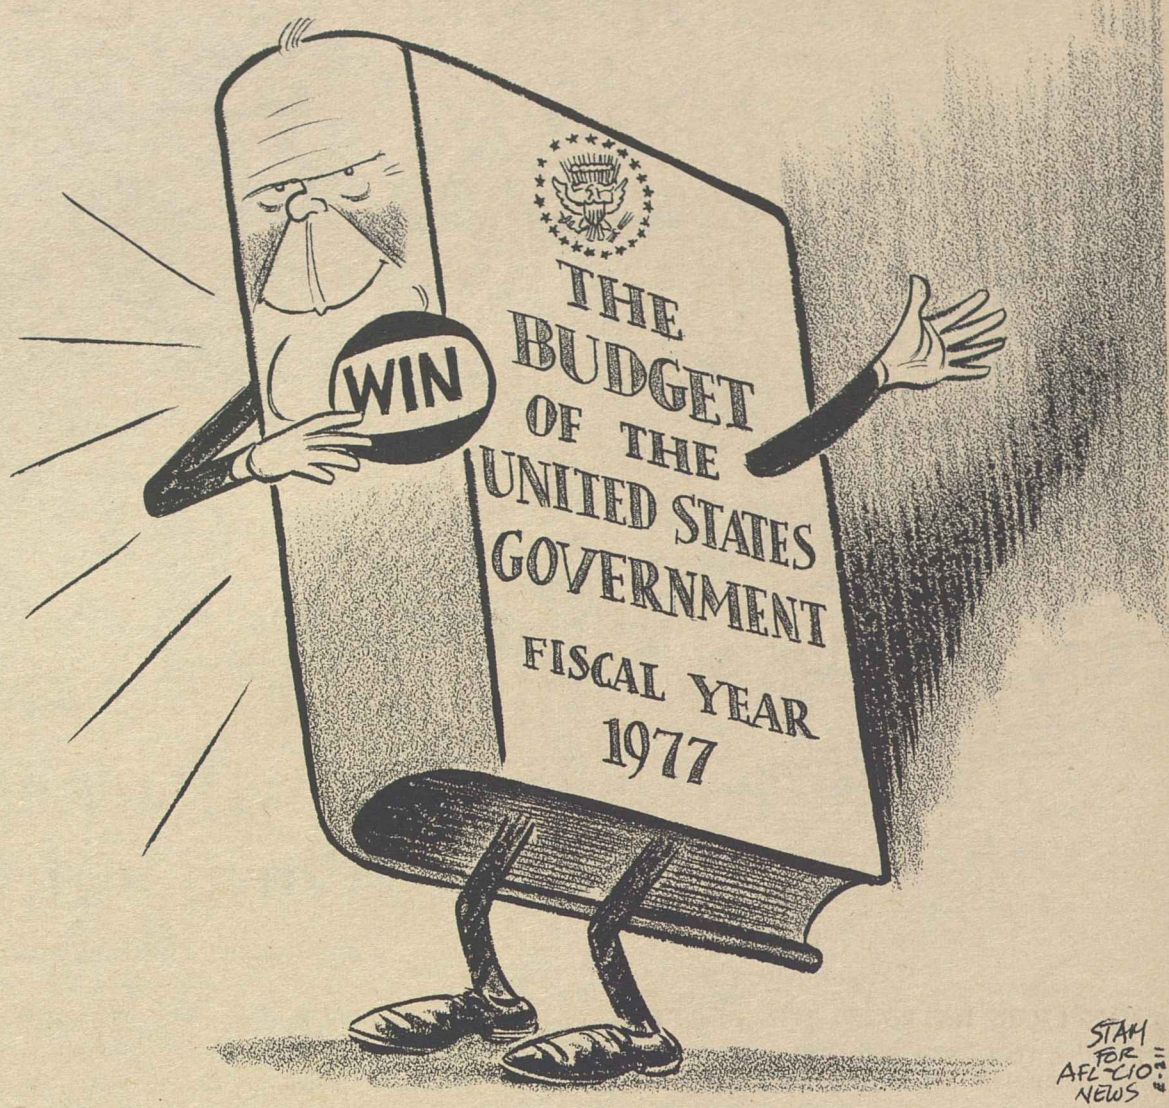
1941 was the last year when it was anything like this, and 1941 was the year we were coming out of the Great Depression.

We haven't had in the United States an economic mess and an unemployment situation as bad since—as bad as the one we've had over the past couple of years. We've had the deepest and most prolonged economic recession since the 1930s—a terrible commentary on the economic policies that the Nixon Administration got started at the beginning of 1969.

The Ford Administration has carried those Nixon policies forward.

What they've done is have very high interest rates and generally restrictive policies, in the name of combatting inflation—all of which was supposed to bring down the rate of inflation.

By putting these policies into effect, they created two back-to-back recessions—the first in 1969 and 1970, and then the current recession—'73 to '75. There was very little lull between—we never got full recovery from the recession of 1969.



WE'VE BEEN SUFFERING from very high levels of unemployment—unused capacity—so it is not only unemployment, but in terms of the business community, there's a lot of idle plants and idle equipment. There also have been low levels of sales—retail sales—because the buying power of workers' take-home pay has declined during most of the past three years. It's still quite low—compared with where it was about three years ago—it's some 5 percent or so lower than it was toward the end of 1972.

It's the view of the AFL-CIO that we need new full employment legislation; we need legislation that will declare that full employment in the American economy means an unemployment rate, in terms of government policy, no higher than 3 percent.

It is the view of the AFL-CIO that we need government commitments to carry these programs forward, not only in terms of the White House and the Executive Branch of the government, but also the Congress. The Congress should have procedures to examine the White House proposals and modify them, if necessary—and all within a short time—and to go forward with the mechanisms, the plans, the programs, and the measures to bring unemployment down as fast as possible and to prevent unemployment from ever again rising above 3 percent of the labor force.

There is absolutely no reason why the United States has to suffer along year after year, with these high levels of unemployment, idle plants, idle equipment. We are wasting our potential.

A Word Edgewise:

Eulogies of Chou En-lai Ignore His Role in Deaths of 20 Million

By John P. Roche

AS THE OBITUARIES for the late Chou En-lai mounted, I detected on my ideological Richter scale a distinct earthquake. A check of the correlates indicated the location was George Orwell's grave. Understandably: Never in history have so many nice things been said about so evil a man. Chou En-lai, after all, was the deputy warden of the world's largest concentration camp, though if his American obits were read in Hong Kong a number of refugees might start swimming back to the mainland.

Doubtless part of the chorus of praise was a simple consequence of age. Indeed, I was reminded of the 19th Century Spanish dictator Nervaez who, on his deathbed was asked by his confessor to forgive his enemies. "But I have no enemies," he chuckled to the startled priest, "I had them all shot."

Another aspect of the Chou-worship grew from his appeal to the intellectuals. A mandarin in background, well-educated in China, Japan and Europe, the master of at least four languages, urbane, sophisticated, witty, Chou went over big with correspondents, visiting intellectuals and diplomats. Unlike Mao, who probably ate with his fingers, Chou never drank the water in the finger bowl or used the wrong fork on the fish. The paeans of praise have been tempered by repeated use of the word "ruthless," but in context this became a bit abstract: He was like a "ruthless" editor who rejected manuscripts.

Nothing said here is intended to denigrate Chou's brilliance, both as an individual and as an apparatchik. No one, friend or foe, who ever encountered him denied his talents, particularly as an outside man. He even managed to walk out of an international Communist meeting in Moscow with supreme dignity—no mean trick given the collective vulgarity of the audience. And, since praise from Caesar is praise indeed, we have Chairman Kissinger's testimony that coping with Chou on the diplomatic level was a real test of intellectual capacity. Moreover, Chou was unquestionably a brave man (he is the heroic protagonist in Andre Malraux's novel, "Man's Fate"), but, alas, we have learned that there is no necessary correlation between human courage and the merits of the cause for which it is employed.

The most intriguing aspect of Chou's career was his conscious decision in 1931 to accept party demotion and become the associate rather than rival of Mao Tse-tung. Mao has always been a prize example of Communist exotica. Without going into the Byzantine details of the struggle between Stalin and the Chinese Communists in the late 1920s, it is simply not true to say that Mao developed an independent variant of Marxism based on the peasantry rather than the proletariat. Lenin, who had a program ("Get Power!") for all situations, had come up with this concept in dealing with Ireland; and at a Conference of the Toilers of the East at Baku in July 1920, the Hungarian, Bela Kun, speaking for the Comintern, announced that the Soviet system could be established in pre-capitalist conditions as the dictatorship of the poor peasantry. Needless to say, his resolution on "The Soviet System of Government in the East" was adopted unanimously.

MAO'S DIFFICULTIES thus arose not from heresy, but from refusing to accept insane orders from Stalin and from developing what amounted to an evangelical Communist hymnal—the "Red Book" of the sayings of Mao. Chou, however, cast his lot with Mao (one wonders what he thought of some of Mao's inspirational thoughts) and never looked back. Indeed, the relationship was rather like that of Louis Howe and Franklin D. Roosevelt as depicted in the splendid TV special, "Eleanor and Franklin." Chou made it clear that he was no competitor—just a servant of Mao and "the Revolution."

In one sense, this was selflessness, but in another it was the road to survival and power. Standing in Mao's shadow, he was in power terms the invisible man—but he was also conveniently located to provide his leader with daggers and, with the dispassionate manner of the unambitious, suggest where they might best be planted. One rarely saw Chou in action; all you spotted was movement behind the drapes.

Well, in any case, one of the shrewdest enemies of freedom has departed and—if such is possible—must be enjoying with his customary sardonic charm the movement for his canonization. And when you realize that the Chinese Communists killed over 20 million people in "re-educating" the mainland, you can understand why Orwell is gyrating in his grave.

A Report On Congress —1975

By Andrew J. Biemiller
Director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation

CONFLICTS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT and the Congress, resulting in bitter veto fights and frustrating inaction, sometimes tend to obliterate the issues themselves. The fight often becomes the news, not the specific legislation or its value.

Such was the fate of the most important issue of 1975— legislative action to stimulate the economy and provide jobs for unemployed Americans. It became a rhetorical battle, taken out of context from its central role of building a healthy economy. It was a cutting-edge issue that was dulled in the public view by unrelated subjects, scapegoat issues and an overabundance of confusion fostered by simplistic and erroneous presidential pronouncements.

The issue, as labor viewed it, was the congressional appropriation of sufficient funds for job-creation programs to begin to move the country to full employment—the only economic condition that makes any sense.

President Ford, on the other hand, claimed that the issue was holding the line on the budget deficit—that line he drew across a chart in one television speech. He made it a fight against big government, against deficit spending, and tried to blur the fact that what he was really against was jobs for unemployed workers.

Regrettably, some of labor's so-called friends on Capitol Hill were hypnotized by the President's rhetoric, and, as President Meany has stated, tried "to beat the the President at his own game, which is recessionary economics."

SO THE PLIGHT of the unemployed was ignored. Ignored too, was the concept of the federal budget as an investment in the future prosperity of America. Ignored was the basic economic fact that for every percentage point that unemployment is reduced the budget deficit is also reduced by $16 billion.

And all the while that Congress joined the President in the phony charge that the size of the deficit caused inflation, the President continued to pursue policies—particularly in interest rates, energy and food—guaranteed to escalate inflation.

It makes little difference to the unemployed that the President was pursuing a deliberate policy of high unemployment and the Congress was trapped by its own rhetoric. The net result is that the unemployed still do not have jobs. The enormity of the problem is underscored by the fact that 25 million Americans were unemployed at some time during 1975.

1976 will hopefully not be a repeat of 1975 despite election year posturing by President and Congress alike. Make no mistake: the President appears willing to continue to fudge the issue, to fight deficits, not recession.

WHAT CAN BE HOPED, however, is that Congress will not again play into the President's hands. The Congress must not fall victim to President Ford's unproven theory that holding down the budget deficit is the miraculous cure for inflation, recession, hardship and suffering. The Congress must provide the funds that are necessary to end the recession, to put the unemployed back to work and to stop the hardship and suffering of the people.

That is the best way to ultimately reduce the budget deficit—put people back to work—make them tax payers, not tax users.

While President Ford has to woo conservative Republicans who will be voting in his party's presidential primaries, it will be up to the Congress to get America moving again. Once again, the central legislative issue will be the budget. The lines should be clearly drawn between an unelected President seeking votes from a small but vocal segment of his minority party and a Congress elected to represent all the people.

Labor's task in 1976 is also clear: We must try to get as many votes as possible on every issue so that the President will know the Congress intends to override all the vetoes that are certain to come.

Legislatively, it is not going to be an easy year. But, as the votes in this record demonstrate, organized labor will not be confused by rhetoric. We are committed to progress, and we count our friends, not by what they say, but how they vote.

This special section carries labor's report card on the first session of the 94th Congress.

Congressmen have been judged on 23 key issues and Senators on 22—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation. The tables also include the cumulative voting record of each member since election to the House or Senate.

With the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and its importance to the labor movement and the nation.

A congressman or senator may claim he supported labor's position because he voted for final passage of a bill. But in many cases, the key vote was on an amendment that would have seriously weakened or greatly improved the bill. The votes used here are those considered most significant.

By Alexander E. Barkan
Director, AFL-CIO COPE

REMEMBER NOVEMBER 1974? State and local union COPEs urged members to vote for COPE-endorsed candidates. These candidates, members were told, would do their best for working people. Union members responded overwhelmingly, helping to re-elect many friends to the U.S. House and Senate and adding scores of new friends to the Congress.

The records carried in these pages show that almost without exception the candidates COPE backed in 1974 have lived up to expectations. They've voted time and again for the welfare of workers and their families.

Unfortunately, the willingness of Congress to enact good programs has run up against the sharp cutting edge of the presidential veto. President Ford has wielded his power of veto like a scythe to cut down one congressional initiative after another in a reverse of the old axiom: In this instance, Congress proposes, the President disposes.

THE RESULT, with few exceptions, has been stalemate—and this reflects unfortunately and unfairly on the serious attempts Congress has made to deal with problems, only to be thwarted by presidential vetoes.

The fact is the men and women who were endorsed by state and local COPE groups in 1974, and successfully elected, have produced responsibly, as the records on these pages reflect. A study of these records will show that COPE-backed candidates have voted in extremely high percentages in support of the AFL-CIO position on important legislative issues.

They have written an excellent record, and the value of their presence in Congress is spotlighted by the contrast with the President. Had COPE been less successful in 1974—when, with union members voting overwhelmingly for COPE-supported candidates, we were able to elect some 70 percent of those endorsed—the President would have had a virtually free hand in imposing negative and regressive policies upon the nation. Instead, he has fought a rear-guard action with the veto as his weapon, which is bad enough.

ONE OF THE MAJOR problems confronting the AFL-CIO political effort in 1976 is that there is little room for new gains for liberals in the U.S. House. Any conservative who survived the elections of 1974 has the odds with him in 1976. By contrast, dozens of workers' friends who were elected for the first time in 1974—from normally conservative districts—will be vulnerable this year. Our efforts must be directed at keeping those newly-won congressional seats.

Similarly, in the U.S. Senate, the arithmetic argues against new gains. With 33 Senate seats up for election, more liberals than conservatives must defend their seats. In addition, at this moment three tried-and-true liberals are retiring and their seats must be protected. So protecting the liberal margin in the Senate means we will have to work diligently.

Any way you look at it, 1976 is going to be a tough year. It will require a tremendous effort—an all-out registration drive among union members, a full-scale educational effort in which these voting records can be a key instrument, and on election day a get-out-the-vote program that exceeds anything we've done before.

In 1974, a year in which huge numbers of voters turned off, union members turned out—in far higher percentages than the electorate at-large—thanks to the COPE effort. Again this year—when political apathy still seems prevalent—we've got to achieve maximum possible participation of union members in the political process.

For beyond the obvious need to retain a progressive Congress is the clear lesson of the Ford presidency: To move forward with programs that help people and get full value for taxpayers' dollars, it is essential to have a Congress and President in tune with one another and with the people's needs.

This has not been the case under President Ford, whose power to stymie progress resides in the veto he has used so often. The problem can be remedied—but not until next Nov. 2, Election Day.

1. Emergency Jobs Veto

With the recession deepening and national unemployment at 9.2 percent—the highest since 1941—President Ford in late May vetoed labor-backed emergency employment legislation appropriating $5.3 billion to create over 1 million jobs for the unemployed. The AFL-CIO General Board had recommended enactment of such legislation to stimulate economic recovery and relieve high unemployment.

The House effort to override this veto on June 4 was blocked by a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans and the 277-145 override vote fell 5 votes short of the necessary two-thirds margin.

2. Emergency Housing Veto

Legislation to stimulate the depressed housing industry—another program strongly backed by the AFL-CIO General Board—similarly fell victim to another Ford veto. The vetoed bill, by providing some $1.35 billion in housing subsidy assistance for both new construction and rehabilitation of more than 500,000 housing units over the next year, would have created an estimated 800,000 jobs in construction and related industries. The legislation also included a program of low-interest mortgage assistance loans to help jobless workers meet these payments.

Once again the House effort to overcome Ford's veto was blocked by the conservative coalition as the 268-157 override vote on June 4 fell 16 votes short of the two-thirds margin needed.

3. Public Works Jobs

Amid threats of still another presidential veto, the House on May 20 passed 312-86 a public works authorization bill allocating $5 billion in federal aid to states and local communities for public works construction programs. Needed public works programs are high on the AFL-CIO agenda because they create useful jobs. First priority for spending under the legislation was given to those areas where unemployment exceeded the national rate.

4. The Federal Budget

During debate on the second budget resolution setting fiscal 1976 spending and revenue levels, the House on Nov. 12 approved 213-203 a labor-backed amendment offered by Rep. O'Neill increasing spending for programs including jobs and education. The amendment bumped funding by some $8.5 billion in budget authority and $1.1 billion in outlays over the Budget Committee recommendations. Of the total budget authority in the "package" amendment, 16 percent was for jobs and education.

5. Railroad Jobs

Amid continuing threats of a presidential veto, the House on Oct. 23 approved 261-129 labor-endorsed railroad legislation. The bill authorized $240 million for the employment of jobless railroad workers and others in the rehabilitation and repair of dilapidated railroad track and roadbeds.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

6. Situs Picketing Rights (1)

The House on July 25 passed 230-178, legislation giving construction workers situs picketing rights. Sought by organized labor since 1951 when a Supreme Court decision had interpreted such action to be an illegal secondary boycott, the bill gave building tradesmen the same rights that industrial workers have to picket a job site in order to publicize a dispute with their employers.

7. Situs Picketing Rights (2)

Overcoming continuous opposition by anti-labor interests, the House on Dec. 11 approved 229-189 the conference report on the situs picketing bill. The conference-reported bill included earlier House-passed legislation sought by President Ford to promote stability in construction industry collective bargaining.

Later, however, President Ford, reneging on earlier promises to sign the legislation and ignoring the past support of situs picketing by every President since Truman, buckled to right-wing and big business pressures and vetoed the labor bill.

8. Food Stamp Cutback

During House debate on a supplemental appropriations bill, Rep. Findley (R-Ill.) attempted to severely cripple the food stamp program. Findley's amendment would have effectively prohibited benefits to many needy people including the working poor, the elderly and the families of both unemployed and striking workers. The House, on November 13, rejected this crippling amendment 159-230.

9. Job Safety

During debate on the Labor-HEW Appropriations bill, Rep. Findley (R-Ill.) renewed his yearly efforts to cripple the Occupational Safety & Health Act. His amendment would have prohibited the Occupational Safety & Health Administration from penalizing first violations of job safety regulations on any work site with fewer than 26 workers. His proviso would have effectively denied job safety protection to more than 30 percent of the workers and 90 percent of the work sites presently covered by the law.

The proposal was strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO, and the House on June 25 rejected it 186-231.

10. Tax Reform—Real Estate Loophole

In action on the first major tax reform bill since 1969, the House rejected a labor-backed reform amendment further closing an important real estate tax loophole. Introduced by Rep. Mikva (D-Ill.), the proposal would have prevented real estate investors from offsetting actual profits from one property with artificial "paper losses" from another. The House rejected the amendment 192-226 on Dec. 4.

11. Tax Reform—Export Subsidy Loophole

A second tax reform amendment to reduce from five to three years the tax loophole allowing firms to defer export profits through the Domestic International Sales Corp. (DISC) programs was also defeated. Introduced by Rep. Karth (D-Minn.), this reform was rejected by 199-223 on Dec. 4.

12. Tax Reform—Spending Ceiling

Prior to passage, Rep. Schneebeli (R-Pa.) attempted to send the tax bill back to committee with instructions to add an Administration-backed federal spending ceiling for 1976. The ceiling was designed to force an indiscriminate federal spending cutback in exchange for President Ford's approval of the tax bill. The House rejected the move 202-220 on Dec. 4.

13. Tax Reform—Passage

Although the real estate and DISC tax reform amendments were blocked, the House approved other major reform amendments strongly backed by the AFL-CIO. These amendments deleted from the bill a "give-away" provision allowing wealthy individuals to use current capital losses to recover past taxes, tightened the minimum tax on persons whose income would otherwise escape taxation and retained a withholding tax on earnings of foreign investors in U.S. firms. The bill also continued through 1976 tax reductions approved by Congress earlier in the year. The AFL-CIO thus supported final passage of the combination tax reform-tax cut bill which the House approved 257-168 on Dec. 4.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

14. Oil Price Controls (1)

Despite record high profits of the energy industry over the past few years directly contributing to the nation's inflationary problems, the oil lobby continued its efforts in 1975 to seek decontrol of oil prices. The major effort came during House consideration of an omnibus energy conservation bill. The House rejected outright decontrol and instead approved a compromise proposal by Representatives Staggers (D-W.Va.) and Eckhardt (D-Tex.) retaining price controls on oil from existing wells, rolling back the inflated price of "new" oil and establishing a three-tier system of oil pricing. The labor-backed amendment was approved by a 218-207 vote on July 30.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

15. Oil Price Control (2)

Prior to passage of the labor-backed comprehensive energy bill, the Ford Administration, bowing to oil industry opposition to the bill, threatened a veto of the measure. In a last-ditch effort to kill it, Rep. Brown (R-Ohio) attempted to have the bill recommitted to eliminate the price control provisions. The House rejected the Brown recommittal motion 171-232 on Sept. 23.

For Recommittal—Wrong. Against Recommittal—Right.

16. Nuclear Energy Development

Essential to the national goal of energy independence is the continued development of nuclear power as an alternative energy source. The 1957 Price-Anderson Act, a mandatory multi-million dollar program of private and federal liability insurance, protects the public against loss in the event of an accident at a nuclear power plant site. This law has spurred the development of nuclear power from the experimental energy stage to where it now is a significant source of energy for consumers.

Late in 1975, labor-endorsed legislation to extend this law for 10 years and increase the limits of liability was approved by Congress and signed into law. On Dec. 8 the House approved 329-61 extension of this important supplemental energy program.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

17. Hatch Act Reform

The 1939 Political Activity Act, commonly known as the Hatch Act, now prohibits some 2.8 million federal and postal employes from participating in partisan political activities. Reform legislation designed to correct this inequity while also strengthening existing restrictions against political coercion of federal workers was passed by the House in late 1975. During debate, the House on Oct. 21 rejected 147-260 an amendment by Rep. Fisher (D-Va.) that would have maintained nearly all the prohibitions against federal worker participation in the political process. The legislation is now before the Senate.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

18. Voting Rights Act

The 1965 landmark Civil Rights Act curbed the use of discriminatory voting practices and has resulted in significant increases in minority voting participation. Labor-supported legislation extending the act for 10 years and broadening its protections was passed by Congress and signed into law in 1975.

Prior to House passage of the bill, Rep. Butler (R-Va.) offered a crippling amendment allowing states to be exempted from coverage if they met certain minimal "escape" provisions. The proposal was strongly opposed by labor, civil rights and other groups, and the House rejected it 134-279 on June 3.

19. Housing Discrimination

Congress passed and the President signed into law legislation to restrict the practice of "redlining" certain urban areas by mortgage lenders. The redlining practice arbitrarily denies mortgage loans for housing and has been a major cause of inner-city decline. The House, in passing a comprehensive banking bill, included a provision requiring lenders in metropolitan areas to disclose over a four-year period the amount of mortgage money being made available in urban neighborhoods. The provision would thus discourage redlining and encourage credit allocation for inner city housing.

During debate on the bill Rep. Brown (R-Mich.) attempted to gut this anti-discrimination feature by limiting it to only certain metropolitan areas. The House, however, rejected this attempt 165-167 on Oct. 31.

20. Federal School Funds

A combination of runaway inflation and budget cuts in education by the Nixon and Ford Administrations has played a major role in the current financial crisis facing the nation's schools.

To alleviate this situation, the House, in debate on the fiscal 1976 Education Appropriations bill, approved 259-143 on Apr. 16 an amendment by Representatives Roybal (D-Calif.), Obey (D-Wis.), and Stokes (D-Ohio) increasing education spending by $487 million. President Ford's later veto of this appropriations bill was overridden.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

21. Consumer Protection

In an effort to scuttle labor-backed legislation establishing an Agency for Consumer Advocacy, anti-consumer forces led by Rep. Fuqua (D-Fla.) sought to place labor-management relations within the new agency's jurisdiction. The amendment, strongly backed by the Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Manufacturers and other anti-consumer groups, was an effort to kill the legislation. The House on Nov. 6 rejected the amendment 175-233.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

22. Strip Mining Veto

Labor-backed environmental legislation providing minimum federal standards for state development of mandatory strip mining control laws became another veto victim of President Ford in 1975. The legislation was in response to serious environmental devastation caused by surface mining companies in their strip mining operations.

In an effort to override the veto on June 10, the House failed to muster the two-thirds vote needed as the 278-143 vote was three votes short.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

23. Farm Bill Veto

Despite declining farm income and skyrocketing production costs which have financially squeezed small farmers, President Ford vetoed a one-year emergency farm bill that would have improved income guarantees to farmers while protecting consumers. The legislation had the strong backing of labor, consumer and various farm groups. On May 13, the House by a 245-182 vote fell 40 votes short of the two-thirds margin needed for override.

Labor's Stand on Major 1975 Senate Issues

1. Emergency Jobs

During deliberations on a comprehensive $6.1 billion emergency jobs appropriations bill, Sen, Johnston (D-La.) attempted to slash in half the $1.6 billion allocated for creation of public service jobs. His amendment was offered at a time when unemployment was at its highest level since the depression. More funding of public service jobs had been endorsed in the AFL-CIO General Board's economic recovery program.

The Senate rejected the Johnston proposal on Apr. 25 by a vote of 22-47.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

2. Public Works—Jobs

Ignoring threats of still another veto of jobs legislation, the Senate pased a multi-billion dollar accelerated public works employment bill. The bill included $2 billion in special funding to financially distressed state and local governments suffering from excessive unemployment. These funds had been added by way of an amendment by Sen. Muskie (D-Me.) which the Senate had approved on July 29 by a 58-36 vote. Final House approval of a conference report on this legislation is now pending.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

3. The Federal Budget

Utilizing the new budget process for the first time, the Senate Budget Committee focused its main effort on reducing the deficit instead of reducing the unemployment rate. The result was a Senate budget resolution that failed to provide the needed economic stimulus to put America back to work. When the Senate considered the Budget Committee resolution, it rejected 29-64 on Apr. 30 an amendment by Sen. Mondale (D-Minn.) adding $9 billion for various jobs-creating programs. The Mondale amendment would have provided an estimated one million jobs.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

4. Situs Picketing (1)

Legislation long sought by organized labor to give construction workers job site picketing rights ran headlong into a conservative-backed Senate filibuster. The Senate, however, broke the filibuster on Nov. 18. A cloture motion to end debate by Sen. Kennedy (D-Mass.) approved 62-37, gained the necessary 60 votes required under the new Senate filibuster rule.

For cloture—Right. Against cloture—Wrong.

5. Situs Picketing (2)

On Nov. 19, the Senate passed 52-45 its version of the situs picketing bill. Before passage, the Senate had grafted onto the measure a second bill endorsed by the AFL-CIO and strongly pushed by President Ford promoting stability in construction industry bargaining.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

6. Situs Picketing (3)

On Dec. 15, the Senate approved 52-43 the conference report on the situs picketing bill which maintained the collective bargaining provision. Although President Ford had indicated he would sign the bill if this bargaining section was included, he later broke his promise and vetoed the legislation in late December.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

7. Food Stamps for the Unemployed

With millions of Americans unemployed, many jobless persons have faced unnecessary delays in being certified for food stamps. Delays in receiving benefits have lasted as long as three months.

To remedy this situation, Senators Dole (R-Kan.) and McGovern (D-S.Dak.) during debate on a minor welfare reform bill offered an amendment establishing procedures for immediate benefit certification for the unemployed while verification of their eligibility was being determined. On June 10 the Senate approved the proposal 61-35. No further action has been taken.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

8. Job Safety

Reacting to a business-sponsored campaign to gut the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Senate approved an amendment sponsored by Sen. Curtis (R-Neb.). The amendment, added to the Labor-HEW appropriation bill, prohibited funds from being used to enforce OSHA at firms employing three or fewer workers. The amendment denied protection of the law to nearly 6 percent of the workforce.

The Senate on Sept. 24 agreed 48-45 to this weakening amendment. The amendment was dropped, however, in the conference report on the bill.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

9. Tax Reform—Foreign Profits

The AFL-CIO has long sought revisions in the tax code to permit the fair taxation of profits earned by U.S.-based multinational companies.

In Senate debate on a multi-billion-dollar tax reduction bill, Sen. Hartke (D-Ind.) sponsored an amendment to partially close this loophole. His proposal would repeal the foreign tax credit on all foreign oil-related income, making it instead a deduction while providing that such oil related income be taxed at a 24 percent tax rate. An effort by Sen. Curtis (R-Neb.) to table this labor-backed proposal was rejected by 44-52 on Mar. 19. This defeat paved the way for inclusion of the Hartke provision in the tax bill later passed by the Senate. The provision was, however, watered down in the final conference report on the tax rebate bill eventually signed into law.

10. Oil Price Controls (1)

Under pressure from the oil industry, the Senate on Sept. 10 failed to obtain the two-thirds majority needed to override President Ford's veto of labor-backed legislation continuing price ceilings on domestic oil for six months. The temporary extension was needed to give Congress time to complete action an a pending comprehensive conservation bill that included provisions dealing with oil price controls. The Senate vote of 61-39 was six votes shy of the margin needed for the veto override. Total oil price decontrol was avoided, however, as a later compromise energy bill partially retained price controls for 39 months.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

11. Oil Price Controls (2)

During earlier Senate consideration of the omnibus energy bill, efforts were similarly made to end oil price controls. A heated battle took place on an amendment by Sen. Johnston (D-La.) to decontrol prices on oil from existing wells recovered by secondary and tertiary means. An effort by Sen. Jackson (D-Wash.) to table the proposal was rejected 42-45 on Apr. 9. The failure of this tabling motion led to the eventual partial decontrol of this oil.

12. Natural Gas Price Decontrol

Consumers can expect to pay even higher prices for natural gas as the result of an amendment by Senators Pearson (R-Kan.) and Bentsen (D-Tex.) providing for eventual phase-out of federal price controls on gas shipped in interstate commerce. Their amendment was added to a short-term emergency bill dealing with predicted winter gas shortages.

A labor-backed effort by Sen. Hollings (D-S.C.) to table and thus kill the proposal was defeated on Oct. 2 by a 45-50 vote. The House will consider this legislation in the second session.

13. Nuclear Insurance Act

In 1975 Congress passed and the President signed labor-backed legislation extending for ten years the Price-Anderson Act. The 1957 law provides a mandatory federal-private program of insurance protecting the public against accidents at a nuclear power-plant site. The Senate approved the extension bill, which also expanded the act's liability limits, by a 76-18 vote on Dec. 16.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

14. Federal Pay Raise Reduction

President Ford succeeded in persuading the Senate to make federal workers bear the burden of his ineffective inflation-fighting efforts. The Senate on Sept. 18 rejected 39-53 a resolution to disapprove the President's recommendation to slash federal wage increases from 8.6 percent to 5 percent. The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the President's recommendation.

For disapproval — Right. Against disapproval — Wrong.

15. Voting Rights Act

In 1975 Congress approved legislation extending the Voting Rights Act for ten years and broadening its coverages to other miniorities. During Senate debate, anti-civil rights forces led by Sen. Scott (R-Va.) unsuccessfully attempted to cripple the legislation. Scott tried to allow states covered by the act to go to local federal courts instead of the federal district court in Washington, D.C., in efforts to "escape" from coverage under the law or to obtain approval of changes in their election laws. The Senate rejected his amendment 38-57 on July 24.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

16. Civil Rights—Busing

During Senate consideration of the Labor-HEW Appropriations bill, numerous efforts were made to limit severely the right of the courts and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to require busing as a means of enforcing compliance with the Constitution. One such amendment, offered by Sen. Byrd (D-W.Va.), blocked HEW from seeking quality, integrated education by prohibiting the use of funds to require the transportation of any student to a school other than the closest school offering the courses of study pursued by that student. The Senate approved the Byrd amendment 51-45 on Sept. 24.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

17. Filibuster Rule Reform

At the start of the 94th Congress, labor and civil rights groups again supported efforts to liberalize the Senate's rule for ending filibusters.

As in previous years, the first major procedural hurdle was whether a new Senate—before adopting its rules—could end debate by a simple majority vote. Sen. Pearson (R-Kan.) moved to close debate on a proposed change in the filibuster rule and Sen. Mansfield (D-Mont.) raised a point-of-order against the motion to bring the issue to a vote. When the Senate on Feb. 15 approved, 51-42, a motion by Sen. Mondale (D-Minn.) to table the Mansfield point of order, the Senate affirmed its right to close debate by majority vote at the beginning of a new Congress. This key vote eventually led to a change in the filibuster rule, whereby cloture could be obtained with 60 votes.

For tabling—Right. Against tabling—Wrong.

18. Housing Discrimination

In the first session, Congress also passed legislation designed to prevent the practice of "redlining" by mortgage lenders in metropolitan areas and thereby encourage credit allocation to inner-city housing. "Redlining" arbitrarily denies mortgage loans for housing in these sections of the nation's cities.

During debate on this legislation, Sen. Garn (R-Utah) led efforts to gut the redlining disclosure provisions. His substitute bill would have limited the number of cities in which mortgage lenders would be required to disclose the amount of mortgage money lent over the next three years. The Senate narrowly rejected the Garn proposal on Sept. 4, by 40-41.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

19. Federal School Funds Veto

As part of his broad-based attack on federal spending for social programs, President Ford—ignoring the financial crunch facing the nation's school systems—vetoed in early August a $7.9 billion education appropriations bills for fiscal 1976. The AFL-CIO supported the appropriations bill and backed the Senate override effort. On Sept. 10 the Senate by a vote of 88 to 12 achieved the two-thirds margin needed to override the veto. The House similarly overrode Ford's action and the bill was enacted into law.

For—Right. Against—Wrong.

20. Consumer Agency

An attempt by anti-consumer senators to block labor-backed legislation creating an Agency for Consumer Advocacy was rejected by the Senate. A proposal by Sen. Weicker (R-Conn.) sought to erode labor's support for the bill by placing labor-management relations under the agency's jurisdiction. The Weicker proposal was rejected 36-52 on May 12.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

21. Wage-Price Controls

A remnant of the discredited experiment in economic controls, the Wage-Price Council was established by President Ford in 1974 with statutory power to do little more than questionable inflation-monitoring. During debate on legislation to extend the council for one year, Sen. Stevenson (D-Ill.) tried to expand the authority of the agency principally by granting it power to subpoena data on wages and productivity. Labor backed an effort by Sen. Tower (R-Tex.) to table the Stevenson amendment. The Senate, however, by a 41-47 vote on May 6 rejected Tower's effort.

For tabling—Right. Against tabling—Wrong.

22. Defense Spending

During debate on the 1976 Defense Authorization bill, numerous unsuccessful attempts were made to suspend development of various weapons systems. One such amendment offered by Sen. McGovern (D-S.Dak.) would have cut off funding for the continued development of the B-1 strategic bomber. The Senate rejected the amendment by a 32-57 vote on June 5.

For—Wrong. Against—Right.

Labor Presses Jobs Drive:

Key Legislative Battles To Launch 2nd Session

KEY LEGISLATIVE BATTLES of vital concern to organized labor will begin soon after Congress convenes for its second session in 1976. On many of these issues Congress will have its hands full in trying to make legislative headway against a torrent of veto threats by a Republican Administration subservient to the demands of big business and fearful of the political pressures of right-wing politicians. At stake is nothing less than the economic and social well-being of America.

Anti-recession legislation tops labor's legislative agenda for 1976. With massive unemployment continuing, the AFL-CIO will seek congressional action on a full employment program to reduce joblessness and keep it at a 3 percent target level. Labor will fight to create large-scale public employment and stimulate private employment at the same time.

The AFL-CIO will also seek a modernized $3 minimum wage law to alleviate inflationary hardships and restore the buying power of the nation's lowest paid workers.

The illegal alien problem continues to aggravate the unemployment problem. Labor will press for enactment of legislation designed to stem the tide of "illegals" entering the country each year by making it easier to penalize those employers who knowingly hire these workers.

A MAJOR ENERGY BATTLE of significant economic proportions—the fight to deregulate the price of natural gas—also lies ahead. The energy cartels, having made some headway on the deregulation of oil prices, now seek to deregulate the price of natural gas shipped in interstate commerce. On the basis of threats of gas shortages this winter, the energy industry forced Senate passage of a short-term emergency gas bill to deal with this so-called crisis. Yet, when this seemingly innocuous bill was debated on the Senate floor a natural gas price deregulation provision was attached to it. With energy producers still reaping high profits, this provision will cost American consumers billions of dollars if it is sustained in the House and have a catastrophic effect on hopes for national economic recovery.

Another economic issue—tax reform—will be high on the congressional agenda. House-passed tax reform provisions backed by organized labor will be the subject of Senate Finance Committee hearings. The House Ways & Means Committee, meanwhile, commences phase two of its tax reform review, which includes among other issues the subject of taxation of foreign source income. The AFL-CIO will continue pressing on both of these fronts to accomplish its long sought goal of an equitable tax system that can provide the revenues necessary to sustain important federal programs.

To assist the millions of unemployed, the AFL-CIO is seeking federal standards for the state-run system of unemployment compensation. A watered-down version of the legislation has been reported by the Ways & Means Committee. The AFL-CIO will attempt to strengthen it substantially in the Senate.

Another unemployment assistance program—food stamps—will be the subject of an intensive congressional hearing. The program faces a serious challenge as congressional conservatives backed by the Ford Administration seek to prohibit food stamps for strikers and to make it tougher for the recently unemployed to qualify for them.

THE AFL-CIO continues to support legislation to establish a national postcard voter registration system that would encourage greater voter participation in the electoral process. Conservatives of both parties strongly oppose this legislation because of its potential impact on broadening the electorate.

In the consumer area, President Ford has threatened to veto labor-endorsed legislation establishing a consumer agency. The agency bill has passed both houses and is now in conference. Another consumer bill to reform the nation's system of automobile insurance—national no-fault standards—is awaiting action by both the House and Senate.

Congressional hearings will also continue on the issue of national health insurance. The AFL-CIO will continue to push its program to provide all Americans with quality health care at an affordable cost.

Congress can expect little or no cooperation on progressive legislation from the Ford Administration deeply engaged in political one-upmanship with the Republican Party's right wing.

So it is up to Congress to formulate its own program. In this task Congress will continue to find organized labor in the forefront of the struggle for economic and social justice.

40 Bills Fall Victim To Ford's Veto Policy

More than 40 bills passed by the Congress have been struck down by President Ford since he took office 17 months ago. In the vital area of jobs the President has either vetoed or threatened to veto virtually every major bill. The following are the veto victims of 1975.

1. Oil Import Fees—H.R. 1767
   Vetoed: Mar. 4
   No override attempt
2. Emergency Farm Bill—H.R. 4296
   Vetoed: May 1
   House sustained 245-182, May 13
3. Strip Mining—H.R. 25
   Vetoed: May 20
   House sustained 278-143, June 10
4. Emergency Employment Appropriations—H.R. 4481
   Vetoed: May 28
   House sustained 277-145, June 4
5. Tourism Promotion—H.R. 5537
   Vetoed: May 28
   No override attempt
6. Emergency Housing—H.R. 4485
   Vetoed: June 24
   House sustained 268-157, June 25
7. Oil Pricing—H.R. 4035
   Vetoed: July 21
   No override attempt
8. Education Appropriations—H.R. 5901
   Vetoed: July 25
   Overridden
9. Health Services—S. 66
   Vetoed: July 26
   Overridden
10. Oil Price Decontrol—S. 1849
    Vetoed: Sept. 9
    Senate sustained 61-39, Sept. 10
11. Tobacco Price Supports—H.R. 9497
    Vetoed: Sept. 30
    No override attempt
12. School Lunch—H.R. 4222
    Vetoed: Oct. 3
    Overridden
13. Foreign Missions—H.R. 12
    Vetoed: Nov. 29
    No override attempt
14. Tax Cuts—H.R. 5559
    Vetoed: Dec. 17
    House sustained 265-157, Dec. 18
15. Labor-HEW Appropriations—H.R. 8069
    Vetoed: Dec. 19
    Override vote set for Jan. 27, 1976
16. National Security Council Membership—S. 2350
    Vetoed: Dec. 31
17. Situs Picketing Rights—H.R. 5900
    Vetoed: Jan. 2

Meany Looks to Congress:

Ford's Policy Shifts Reflected Lack of Firmness, Integrity

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany Jan. 19, 1976 to a legislative conference held by the Ladies' Garment Workers in Washington.

WHEN YOU GET right down to the nitty gritty, there is no guarantee that what the President says tonight will be his position tomorrow morning. His track record of saying one thing and doing the opposite is now well established.

He began his abrupt changes in policy very early in his Administration. He first called for a tax increase, if you remember, at the very time the economy was starting its headlong plunge into the deepest recession since the 1930s. Not long after, without apology or explanation, he was calling for a tax cut to stimulate the economy.

You probably remember that proposal. He wanted to give the most tax relief to the wealthy and only pennies to the low- and middle-income families. He was very unhappy when the Congress, at the strong urging of the labor movement, gave the greatest tax relief to low- and middle-income people, but he finally signed the bill after much public hand-wringing.

The clearest example of the President's lack of integrity was, of course, his veto of the situs picketing bill. This bill was passed in the exact form he wanted, by the House and Senate, including the votes of a number of Republicans who were supporting their President. When the chips were down—when the right-wing threats of political reprisal became obvious, the President caved in. He proved that his word is worthless.

Now we know the President can't be trusted to keep his word; that he is so desperate for primary votes that he'll walk away from his commitments. And this from the man who told America that the truth would heal the wounds of Watergate.

Therefore, we can spend our time here today more productively by concentrating on what we in the labor movement are going to be seeking from this Congress to improve the lot of the American people. It can be summed up in six words—we must get America moving again.

We have no right to expect much from Arthur Burns—knowing his mentality; knowing his handicaps; knowing that he was really born in the 17th Century. But we do have a right to expect something from liberal friends, especially those liberal friends that we helped to put in Congress and who are going to expect more help again.

From newspaper reports it is clear that the President's budget will be little more than a political gimmick with about as much value as a campaign slogan. I understand it is going to be $394 billion. Boy, that's great, the big figure was $395 billion, so he's cut off a billion.

And there are some so-called friends of ours on Capitol Hill who will play right into his hands. They will use the same rhetoric as the President about holding down the budget deficit, as if by some miracle that will make inflation and recession and hardship and suffering disappear. In fact, if we hold down that budget deficit the Russians may even decide to keep an agreement now and then.

They will forget—as they did in 1975—that the federal budget is an investment in America—an investment in the future prosperity of this country. Unless the Congress provides the funds that are necessary to achieve prosperity, then the recession will continue, unemployment will remain high, people will suffer and America will once again retreat—not march ahead, as it should.

I DON'T KNOW how big a deficit will be necessary. I don't think the figure matters. The Congress should simply appropriate enough for the programs that mean jobs for American workers, enough to get the country moving again. The best way to reduce the budget deficit is to put people back to work—make them taxpayers, not tax users.

And every economist—including those in the White House—agrees that for every percentage point that unemployment is reduced, the budget deficit is similarly reduced by $16 billion. That means if unemployment was at the same level it was when Richard Nixon came into office, there would be today a budget surplus.

Well, you can't count on the President in this area. His economic advisers have convinced him to say "no" to everything for people and "yes" for anything that will increase profits.

On the other hand, there will be those in the Congress who will argue that we should wait until 1977 because there is sure to be a more liberal, more compassionate, more enlightened President in the White House.

Well, the problems confronting this nation and its people just can't wait. So we are going to push in this Congress at this time for the enactment of legislation we believe will resolve these problems.

On each issue, we are going to try to get as many votes as possible so that the President will know the Congress intends to override all those vetoes that are certain to come. The President's concept of government by veto must not be permitted to endanger the welfare of the American people.

Goldfinger Warns:

Nixon-Ford Economic Policies Spell More Trouble for Nation

PRESIDENT FORD has refused to turn from Nixon-shaped economic policies that have bred two back-to-back recessions and are squandering the nation's human and production potential, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger declared.

There is no reason for the nation to be "doomed to a really horrible economic situation," as many now forecast for the rest of the decade, Goldfinger stressed. He warned that the policies of the Administration and the Federal Reserve under Chairman Arthur Burns spell high levels of unemployment—roughly 6 to 8 million jobless for the next several years, and threaten social and political instability.

"We need a government commitment to full employment," with clearly defined goals and the plans, programs, mechanisms and proposals to bring unemployment down as fast as possible and to prevent unemployment from ever again rising above 3 percent, Goldfinger declared.

He said that new full employment legislation should spell out that policy and provide congressional procedures for examining White House proposals to fulfill it, coupled with the power to modify those proposals, if necessary.

Goldfinger urged adoption of specific and detailed proposals advanced by the AFL-CIO, such as full implementation of "the government's housing programs, so that home building can once again lead the economy out of the depths of economic troubles." He called for "a burst in residential construction" that would mean a boost for construction employment, and a boost for building materials, steel, timber, appliances, furniture, carpeting—"a lift for the whole economy."

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Goldfinger renewed the call for an accelerated public works program, with federal funds going "to local communities with high unemployment, to step up their short-term construction and maintenance and repair programs, and put the unemployed to useful work."

Questioning Goldfinger on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

WHEN LABOR Sec. John T. Dunlop announced his resignation to a jammed news conference he said he was not quitting in protest over President Ford's veto of the situs picketing/construction stabilization bill.

Rather, Dunlop said, he was resigning "because since the veto an atmosphere and a set of attitudes has developed, and is likely to persist, that seems to me to preclude constructive and cooperative policies and administration in the fields of concern generally to the Labor Dept."

Never at any time during the news conference did Dunlop indicate any criticism of Ford. On the contrary, the secretary has made it clear that he understood the kind of political pressures that were applied to the President to get him to veto the bill.

So, what does Sec. Dunlop mean when he says his resignation came because of the "atmosphere" and "set of attitudes?" A careful reading of his resignation statement sheds some light on this.

"In labor-management relations," said Dunlop, "a sense of trust, confidence and respect is essential for any genuine communications among labor, management and government. These attitudes do not preclude, indeed they permit and encourage, honest differences of view strongly expressed."

In other words, during discussions—or bargaining, if you will—over a controversial issue (such as the situs bill) honest and strong differences of opinion are and should be expressed.

But when a "deal" is made—or an agreement is reached—everyone shakes hands on it and gives his word that he will abide by the compromise.

"A man's word is his bond" is the way it used to be said. It's the way it's still said by labor and management negotiators thousands of times every year in negotiations leading to contract agreements. Neither side is entirely happy but both sides give their word that they will live up to the agreement.

Probably Gerald Ford just doesn't understand this. But John Dunlop does understand it. He understands that in striking a bargain in the often emotionally-charged atmosphere of labor-management negotiations "a sense of trust, confidence and respect is essential." Dunlop tried valiantly to apply the technique to the bargain that was struck by labor, management and government over the situs bill. The President's word was given that he would abide by the bargain.

But the President went back on his word and that necessary "sense of trust, confidence and respect" was destroyed.

Labor and management people learned a valuable lesson.

LABOR LEARNED that Gerald Ford would go back on his word under pressure. Management learned, to its delight, the same thing. The parting statements from labor and management on learning of the secretary's resignation are enlightening on this lesson.

President George Meany of the AFL-CIO said the nation had lost "a man of great talent and ability," but that he was sure Dunlop, in private life, would continue to serve the process of collective bargaining "with the confidence of the parties involved, who always knew him as a man of his word."

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. called the resignation an "almost irreparable loss to the ordinary citizen . . . who depend on persons of his talent, experience, knowledge and integrity to represent them."

John N. Matich, president of the Associated General Contractors, dismissed the whole matter as a battle over the legalization of secondary boycotts (which it was not). He said Ford should instruct his new Labor Secretary to draft new "reform" legislation. The legislation drafted by Dunlop, the contractors said, "had no power, no force and fell too short in far too many areas to be useful to this industry."

This is the same legislation the contractors originally agreed to. One can imagine what they will seek in the new "reform" legislation now that they have learned what the President will do for them.

BACK-TO-BACK RECESSIONS were the product of Nixon-shaped economic policies still championed by President Ford, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

TOP POLITICAL ACTION GOAL of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. is the defeat of President Ford in 1976, BCTD President Robert A. Georgine told local and state representatives at a regional conference in Cherry Hill, N.J.

Ford Plays Up Veto As Slap at Meany

President Ford is telling conservatives that his veto of the construction site picketing bill proves that he is not "selling out to George Meany."

Agriculture Sec. Earl Butz quoted Ford's reply to a delegation from the conservative Farm Bureau that complained of the Administration's grain policy adopted after labor protests of unrestricted sales to the Soviet Union.

He said Ford replied, "If you think it was selling out to George Meany, look at what I did on the common situs picketing bill. I'm certainly not his man."

the local, state and national levels, he said, and called for the BCTD units to step up participation in voter registration and get-out-the-vote efforts in the '76 elections.

"We must support those who support us, irrespective of party, and defeat those who oppose us," Georgine declared.

Turning to employment problems of construction workers, he noted that the 11 northeastern states have been hit harder by layoffs than any other section of the country.

Georgine said that the government's estimate that three-quarters of a million construction workers are unemployed is far too low, since it fails to take into account those "who are working much shorter hours than they ever have worked in their entire adult lives."

BLS reported an unemployment rate in contract construction of 16.2 percent at year-end, but Georgine said that statistics collected by the BCTD show a much gloomier picture in the Northeast.

- In Bridgeport, Conn., the average jobless rate for all construction workers is 37 percent, with electrical workers at about 40 percent, lathers 47 percent, and carpenters, plumbers and marble polishers at 35 percent.
- Rochester, N.Y., has an average jobless rate in the building trades of 49 percent, while 70 percent of the painters, 60 percent of the operating engineers and 50 percent of the tile setters are unemployed.
- Philadelphia's average jobless rate for the trades is 34 percent, including 60 percent of the bricklayers, 38 percent of the sheet metal workers, 35 percent of the iron workers and 23 percent of the elevator constructors.
- In Poughkeepsie, N.Y., the average rate is at 56 percent, with 70 percent of the laborers, 85 percent of the painters, 50 percent of the bricklayers and 43 percent of the carpenters out of work.

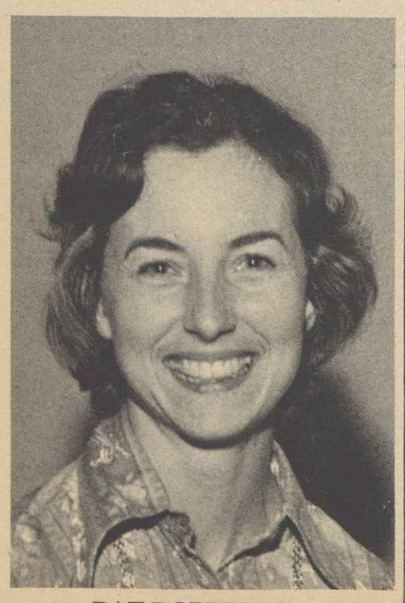
"We simply cannot tolerate this unemployment situation," Georgine said in outlining labor's program for full employment legislation.

One of the five workshops conducted during the three-day conference explored the AFL-CIO legislative campaign to enact a full employment bill.

Other workshops dealt with pension legislation, occupational safety and health, Davis-Bacon Act provisions and administration of local building trades councils.

Workshop moderators were President John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, President William Sidell of the Carpenters, President Angelo Fosco of the Laborers, BCTD Sec.-Treas. Joseph F. Maloney, and President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers.

Pat Robertson Heads Flight Service Union



Pat Robertson has moved up from a vice presidency to the presidency of the Association of Flight Attendants, succeeding Kelly Rueck.

Robertson will serve the remaining three years of Rueck's term of office. Rueck, who was serving her second four-year term, submitted her resignation to the AFA board of directors and executive board. She said personal considerations led to her decision "after long and deliberate thought."

Robertson is expected to appoint an acting vice president to replace herself within 30 days.

A native of Westminster, Md. she was a flight attendant for Piedmont Airlines from 1965 until 1974 when she was elected vice president of the Flight Attendants.

At Piedmont, she headed her local executive council and was active in the Piedmont Master Executive Council.

AFL-CIO Slates Housing Parley

A national housing conference focusing on current needs, federal housing and community development programs and the 1976 legislative outlook will be held by the AFL-CIO Department of Urban Affairs March 9-10 in New Orleans.

The conference is designed for national and international unions and state and local central bodies, said Henry B. Schecter, director of the Urban Affairs Department. Registration information can be obtained from the department.

Muskie Denounces President's Policies

mend . . . day-care centers to operate . . . cities to rebuild . . . new sources of energy to be developed."

Outlining a "congressional agenda for action," Muskie said direct employment programs "using federal dollars to pay for public service jobs"—would produce the most jobs at the least cost.

He called also for "federal assistance to local communities for short-term public works projects and to avoid layoffs in local government services."

Yet, he reminded his audience, Ford has said he will veto an anti-recession bill designed to create 30,000 jobs this year.

"The President says we cannot afford to help Americans find work." In fact, Muskie said, "we cannot, as taxpayers, afford not to."

Muskie said some of Ford's proposals would "simply shift the cost of federal programs from the federal government to the states and cities." Their effect would be to raise state and local taxes.

As did the President, Muskie expressed pride and confidence in America. But he said the nation must reject the counsel of "those of timid vision" who want the country to "go back on our guarantees to every American for a decent job and secure retirement."

Muskie asked a continued commitment "to quality education . . . consumer protection . . . worker safety." And he said government must curb "abuse of power by corporations that dominate the marketplace . . . ignore the quality of our air and water . . . the safety of workers" and "each year push and shove for more tax privileges and more exemptions from law."

Later this year, Muskie and his colleagues in Congress will face the job of drawing up an alternative budget and imposing a spending ceiling that will reflect, stronger than any rhetoric, the priorities of Congress.

House Democratic Leader Thomas O'Neill told reporters that "the President's budget priorities are 100 percent wrong" and House Budget Committee Chairman Brock Adams said Ford's proposals are "bad for the economy" because they "take from those with low incomes and give to the big corporations."

On the Republican side, cheers were generally loudest to the right of the GOP spectrum. Thus, Sen. Barry Goldwater praised Ford's "courage" and declared that "his strong efforts to reduce the overburdening power of the federal government should be applauded by every taxpaying American."

There were hedged comments, too, on both sides of the political aisle, some of which bore out AFL-CIO President George Meany's comments to a union legislative gathering.

Meany noted that some of labor's "so-called friends" in Congress "will use the same rhetoric as the President about holding down the budget deficit, as if by some miracle that will make inflation and recession and hardship and suffering disappear."

To revive the economy, Meany declared, the magnitude of the budget deficit doesn't matter. "Congress should simply appropriate enough for the programs that mean jobs for American workers, enough to get the country moving again."

Supreme Court Asked to Uphold Disability Benefits in Pregnancy

Labor has asked the Supreme Court to uphold federal court rulings that women unable to work because of pregnancy or childbirth are entitled to the same benefits provided workers with any other disabilities.

To allow a company benefit program to exempt pregnancy is discrimination based on sex and is thereby a violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Supreme Court was told.

The court heard arguments in two cases—against General Electric and the Liberty Mutual Insurance Co.—on which it will rule together, possibly by June.

Arguments were presented by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers while the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers filed supporting briefs. The IUE's associate general counsel, Ruth Weyand, argued the case for the union which filed the original GE case in 1971 as a class action on behalf of members of its local at a Salem, Va., air conditioning plant.

The original finding in that case was by a district judge who said "there is no rational distinction to be drawn between pregnancy-related disabilities and disability arising from any other cause."

A three-judge appellate panel upheld his finding last July, and GE joined the union in asking that the high court consider the case along with the appeal on a similar finding for two women at Liberty Mutual.

The joint brief of the AFL-CIO and the UAW termed it "one of the first priorities" of the two organizations to reform the income disability programs that discriminate against women during pregnancy.

It said the case should be decided solely on the question of whether pregnancy exemptions violate federal law. And it said Congress's understanding of what constitutes sex discrimination was reiterated recently when it let stand new guidelines of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare on equal treatment in education.

The companies in the cases are also coming to understand what constitutes sex discrimination, it was pointed out. Since the litigation started, both GE and Liberty Mutual have abandoned two practices —refusing to hire pregnant women for employment and demanding that employes take leave during a specified month of their pregnancy.

The court was also asked to disregard company arguments about pregnancy being a "voluntary" disability. In the lower court finding, the federal judge pointed out that GE's contention on this topic "loses much viability in light of its policy of providing disability benefits to its male employes for all disability, including cosmetic surgery, disabilities arising from attempted suicides, etc."

Hair transplants and vasectomies for men were cited in the Supreme Court arguments as "voluntary" or "self-inflicted" illnesses sometimes covered.

Similarly, the union lawyers said that company arguments about women not returning to work after childbirth were not germane to the discrimination issue, but were "abuses" of a program properly a matter of administration.

Weyand told the Supreme Court that one of the reasons women earn about 60 percent of the pay of their male counterparts is that women often don't have a "continuous work record." Yet company rules on pregnancy often force women out and preclude them from having a "continuous work record," she noted.

It was estimated that about 40 percent of American workers are covered by some sort of income maintenance program during disability and about 50 percent of those programs deny benefits during pregnancy and childbirth.

The AFL-CIO-UAW brief stressed that women members of every union have a direct financial stake in how the case is decided.

Conservative Rhetoric, Economics:

Ford's Stand-Pat Program Accepts High Joblessness

cut at mid-year was conditioned on the willingness of Congress to hold down spending. As with earlier tax proposals, persons with higher incomes would benefit the most. And a reduction in corporate income taxes urged by the President would enable companies to keep a bigger part of what Ford termed "the large increase in profits that is expected to accompany the economic recovery."

There was no compensating tax reform proposals to bring in new revenue in the President's budget, and his new energy proposals sought a $2.6 billion package of "tax incentives" to encourage the nation's oil and gas industry.

In both rhetoric and specifics, Ford's "new realism" appeared to have been tailored to the politics of the Republican presidential primaries, where Ford is being challenged from the political right by Ronald Reagan.

Ford did take one slap at Reagan's easily-punctured claim of a $90 billion "saving" if welfare funding were left to the states.

"We cannot simply dump welfare into the laps of the 50 states, their local taxpayers or private charities," Ford insisted.

But in the next breath of his State of the Union speech, Ford warmly embraced Reagan attitudes by attacking the "waste" of welfare programs, by proposing cutbacks in what he termed the "scandal-ridden food stamp program," and by calling for reductions in school lunch and other nutrition programs so that only children from families that are below the poverty level would be helped.

Again this year, the President proposed to hold pay raises for federal white-collar employes below "comparability" with private industry. He held them to a 5 percent ceiling this year and Ford told reporters that government workers shouldn't expect to get as much as the private sector because they have more job security—a concept that thousands of laid-off federal workers would be likely to challenge.

Ford also asked Congress to change the area prevailing wage formula so that federal blue-collar workers would get less of a pay raise. The present long-established procedure is too generous, the President complained.

The President's State of the Union address presented his Medicare proposals as a new benefit that would protect the elderly against "catastrophic" health care expenses.

He did, indeed, ask a ceiling of $500 a year for hospital expenses and $250 for doctor bills that would be charged to any elderly individual for services covered by Medicare. But glossed over was the fact that all elderly persons would be charged more money for hospital and doctor services until the proposed ceiling was reached. To achieve a big budget "savings," persons over 65 would be required to pay $1.3 billion more for their Medicare-covered hospital and doctor services than they now do.

Ford chose the most regressive means of strengthening the financing of the social security trust fund—choosing to raise the tax rate, which would fall hardest on the poorest-paid workers as a percentage of total income—rather than initiate a contribution from general revenues or choose a larger expansion of the taxable wage base.

"I strongly oppose" the use of federal funds for social scurity benefits, Ford told reporters.

The President proposed to wrap up an assortment of federally-financed health care programs, including Medicaid for the poor, into a single program of grants to the states—without any requirement for matching state funds.

He also proposed similar block grant approaches to federal aid to education, to an assortment of welfare services ranging from child care to drug addict treatment, and to child nutrition programs.

The President insisted, as had his predecessor, that states can make "better judgments" as to how federal funds should be used. He said public opinion in the states could be relied on to assure that needed programs aren't eliminated.

Ford proposed a $101.1 billion defense budget, up $8.3 billion from current levels despite proposed reductions in civilian Defense Dept. employment, elimination of subsidies for military commissaries and an end to re-enlistment bonuses.

He also sought major increases in energy programs, including solar and geothermal power.

Ford's budget request for Labor Dept. programs—$11.1 billion—was $2.9 billion under current levels, largely because of a planned phaseout of an emergency public service employment program that has provided recession victims with jobs that otherwise would go unfilled in state and local governments.

The Labor Dept. budget allocation for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration provides more money for "developing and enforcing occupational health standards," expanded training for OSHA inspectors with an emphasis on health conditions, and more money to promote "voluntary compliance" through an assortment of consultative and educational programs for employers. The declared purpose of the proposed consultation program is to "help employers and employes become aware of and understand their rights and responsibilities."

The OSHA budget seeks a big rise—from $2.3 million to $6 million—for studies to "ensure that new OSHA standards not only protect workers but also take account of related economic costs and technological feasibility factors."

The President asked reduced future funding for public works programs of the Economic Development Administration, citing the need for "budget restraint," and called for an end to the Job Opportunities public works program enacted as an anti-recession measure. The Administration complained it was "difficult to administer."

While the budget provides an expanded program of housing subsidies for lower-income families, it assumes that there will no longer be a need for the below-market mortgage interest rates now available to homebuyers through the Government National Mortgage Association.

Ford's budget-writers assumed that the 8.5 percent average unemployment rate of the 1975 calendar year will drop only to a 7.7 percent average jobless rate during 1976 and to 6.9 percent in 1977—far from the under-4-percent level most economists use for the definition of full employment and substantially above the 5.6 percent level of 1974. In that year Congress and the President reacted to what was then considered an abnormally high level of joblessness with a host of emergency measures that Ford now wants to scrap.

Even a separate long-range set of economic assumptions contained in Ford's budget does not return the nation to full employment. So gradual is the contemplated decline in unemployment that by 1981, the last year of the projection, unemployment is forecast at 4.9 percent.

Under the unified budget process of recent years, the projected budget receipts and outlays include such massive sums as social security taxes collected and social security benefits paid out as well as funds appropriated by Congress.

If Congress should adopt the President's budget proposals intact and if all of his economic assumptions were accurate—both inconceivable by all past precedents—the Treasury would take in $351.3 billion during the fiscal year that will start next October 1 and pay out $394.2 billion. That would leave a deficit of $43 billion, compared to an estimated $76 billion deficit for the current fiscal year which will end June 30, 1976. Because of a change in the fiscal year, from a July to an October start, there is a transition quarter running from July to October 1976 where it is assumed spending and revenue will continue at about present levels.

A drop in unemployment beyond the President's modest projection would wipe out a large part of the planned deficit by both increasing tax revenues and decreasing the need for welfare and other unemployment-related costs.

By the Administration's own calculations, the $43 billion deficit in the President's proposed budget would be translated into a $3 billion surplus if unemployment were brought down to 4 percent.

But Ford rejected any effort to achieve a full employment economy in the foreseeable future. "If we try to stimulate the economy beyond its capacity to respond," he contended, "it will lead only to a future whirlwind of inflation and unemployment."

Burns Again Assails Aid to Unemployed

Authur F. Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, is clinging to his earlier assertions that the nation's high jobless rate—currently at 8.3 percent—is due to extended unemployment benefits.

Interviewed on ABC-TV's Issues & Answers program, Burns declared that the duration of jobless benefits "is much too long" and is "one reason why unemployment has remained high."

Burns repeated his proposal, first made several months ago, that jobless insurance benefits should be cut to 13 weeks and coupled with a government "last-resort" jobs program.

Burns also called for a special wage rate for teenagers that would be "well below" the statutory minimum.

W. J. Usery Nominated As Secretary of Labor

In congratulating Usery, Meany pointed to his "able and constructive work" at FMCS director, as well as his prior service with the Labor Dept. and in the labor movement, and noted that this experience clearly qualified him for his new post.

Asked if he thought he could get along with organized labor, Usery told reporters he enjoyed the support and confidence of many people in the labor movement, and added: "I think we can work together."

Machinists President Floyd E. Smith observed that Usery has "a thorough, firsthand knowledge of the needs and aspirations of American workers," and that "his background is sorely needed in the Ford Cabinet."

If approved by the Senate, Usery would become the third Secretary of Labor in a year. Dunlop, a 61-year-old Harvard economist took over the job on Mar. 18, 1975, succeeding Peter J. Brennan. Dunlop plans to return to Harvard after his resignation becomes effective on Feb. 1.

Dunlop was the chief architect of the common site picketing bill that President Ford promised to sign, then vetoed under pressure from right-wing, anti-union forces. The bill, which included a provision to stabilize bargaining in the construction industry, would have given building-trades unions the right to picket an entire construction site during a dispute with a single contractor engaged in work at the site.

W. J. USERY, JR.

In announcing his resignation, Dunlop observed that reaction to Ford's veto of the bill had compromised his position as Labor Secretary.

Usery took over as director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service on Mar. 15, 1973, replacing J. Curtis Counts. Last April, Ford named him his special assistant for labor-management relations as well.

Before joining the FMCS, the Hardwick, Ga., native served four years as Assistant Secretary of Labor for labor-management relations. He has also served as a member of the National Commission for Industrial Peace and the Collective Bargaining Committee in Construction.

Usery entered government service after 20 years as a member of the Machinists. He served his local union as president, chief steward and negotiating committee chairman before joining the IAM staff as a grand lodge representative. He helped form and later chaired the Cape Kennedy Labor-Management Relations Council.

TWU Attacks Deregulation Of Airlines

The Transport Workers sharply criticized an Administration proposal to deregulate the airline industry and urged the Civil Aeronautics Board to oppose the legislation that has been introduced in Congress.

James F. Horst, TWUA's executive vice president, and William Lindner, director of its Air Transport Division, said deregulation would lead to chaos in the industry.

In a letter to the CAB, they termed the Administration bill "a union-busting, anti-labor proposal that will neither increase efficiency in the airline system, nor provide better services at lower costs without endangering safety."

The union warned that "cut-throat competition" that would follow deregulation "invites" the undercutting of pay rates and the debasement of working conditions."

It would in time "seal the doom of U.S.-flag carriers, just as the flags of convenience have all but wiped out the U.S. merchant marine," the union officers warned.

Third High Year:

Price Rises Totaled 7 Percent in 1975

Consumer prices rose another five-tenths of 1 percent in December, closing out 1975 with an annual inflation rate of 7 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In a separate report, BLS noted that real spendable earnings—take-home pay stripped of the effects of inflation—remained unchanged from November. Still, at $92.08, average weekly spendable pay was not much higher than the $91.32 workers averaged for the year 1965.

While the December-to-December increase of 7 percent in prices was an improvement over the 12.2 percent rise for 1974 and the 8.8 percent increase for 1973, it was nonetheless very high by historical standards.

The Commerce Dept. reported a day eariler that prices, as measured by its gross national product price index, rose 8.7 percent in 1975. The GNP price index is generally regarded as the broadest measure of inflation.

The December increase of five-tenths of 1 percent in the government's consumer price index compared with increases of seven-tenths of 1 percent in each of the two preceding months.

BLS said that higher prices for some food items and a wide variety of consumer services were responsible for most of the December rise, which lifted the CPI to 166.3 percent of its 1967 base. This meant that goods and services that cost $10 eight years ago were priced at $16.63 last month.

Food prices in December rose only three-tenths of 1 percent, compared with six-tenths of 1 percent in November and 1.3 percent in October. Nonfood commodity prices increased three-tenths of 1 percent for the fourth consecutive month, while charges for services were up six-tenths of 1 percent, or about half the 1.1 percent rise in November.

The slower rise in food costs reflected a sharp decline in pork prices, BLS noted. Beef prices, however, continued to fluctuate, showing an increase in December following a decline in November. Fresh vegetable prices rose sharply after four months of decline.

Higher prices for new cars were behind much of the increase in the index for nonfood commodities. BLS reported that the new car index rose 2.1 percent in December, or at a 25 percent annual rate. The higher price tag reflected the introduction of 1976 model cars, the government said. In addition, 1976 model imported cars were priced for the CPI for the first time in December.

There were also large increases in December for fuel oil, newspapers and magazines, and tobacco products, BLS reported. Prices for clothing rose slightly, continuing an upward trend over the past few months.

The rise in prices for services was attributed to higher charges for household services, public transportation and a variety of other services.

Mortgage interest rates, property taxes, natural gas rates, auto insurance and auto repair charges, and parking fees continued to rise in December, BLS noted. Charges for taxicab, railroad and airplane fares also rose over the month.

The cost of medical care, which declined slightly in November, rose eight-tenths of 1 percent as physicans' fees and charges for hospital services continued to show large increases.

Gross National Product Down 2 Years in Row

The nation's real gross national product—the value of all goods and services produced by American workers—declined 2 percent in 1975, after dropping 1.8 percent the year before, the Commerce Dept. reported.

The back-to-back yearly declines in real GNP marked the first time the nation's economic activity has declined two years in a row. The 2 percent dropoff last year was the sharpest since 1946.

Other yearend reports showed the economy poised uncertainly as joblessness remained at the highest levels since World War II began and the outlook for any sudden reduction murky.

In its preliminary report on real output, the government noted that last year's decline occurred even though economic growth in the October-to-December quarter rose at an annual rate of 5.4 percent.

The fourth-quarter gain was smaller than the 6-6.5 percent growth rate predicted by the Commerce Dept. a week earlier, and less than half the 12 percent advance in the previous quarter. The increase in real GNP in the April-to-June period was at a 3.3 percent rate while economic activity in the first quarter of the year plummeted at an annual rate of 9.2 percent.

Meanwhile, other government reports indicated recovery from the country's deepest and longest recession since the 1930s still was not assured.

The Labor Dept. reported about 6,761,900 persons were receiving unemployment insurance benefits under seven different programs in its latest reporting period, the week ended Jan. 3. This was an increase of 729,300 over the previous week.

Also, there were 744,100 initial claims for jobless insurance benefits filed in the week ended Jan. 10, an increase of 158,800 over a week earlier.

The Federal Reserve Board noted that manufacturers were using 70.8 percent of their plant capacity in the fourth quarter of 1975, up from 68.9 percent in the third quarter but not much better than the 66 percent level of the April-June quarter.

The Commerce Dept. reported that December housing starts were down 3 percent from the November pace to close out the worst home-construction year since 1946.

Total actual construction for all of 1975 was 1.16 million units, down 13 percent from 1.34 million units in 1974 and drastically below the 2 million and more starts in 1971, 1972 and 1973.

Another Commerce Dept. report showed personal income grew at a 7.9 percent rate in 1975, barely keeping pace with the rise in consumer prices for the year.

Labor Editors Support Full Mail Service

Labor editors want to see the U.S. Postal Service continue to perform the job for which it was established—speedy delivery of the mail at reasonable rates for all Americans.

The executive council of the International Labor Press Association sharply criticized right-wing proposals to franchise private industry competitors to the postal service.

It also criticized the postal service for seeking to solve its financial problems by drastic cutbacks of service and large-scale closings of post offices. The ILPA resolution protested "service curtailments at the expense both of postal service workers and consumers."

The ILPA also denounced the "union-busting" of the Washington Post and said the strike by the printing crafts at the daily can be settled only by "good-faith collective bargaining."

Another resolution endorsed a bill in Congress to restore citizenship rights to the late Eugene V. Debs, a labor editor and railroad union leader before his conviction in 1919 for making an anti-war speech as the Socialist Party leader.

The two-day council meeting included a luncheon marking the biennial changeover of officers. William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News and a Pulitzer Prize winner, was the speaker. The new top officers are Albert K. Herling, president, and Allen Y. Zack as secretary-treasurer. Herling is editor of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers newspaper and Zack is assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations.

Congress Sets Override Vote On Fund Bill

funds for 333 urgently needed new positions in the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

The vetoed bill does carry a restriction on school busing that the AFL-CIO had opposed. But failure to override the veto, Biemiller suggested, would merely mean that "the same anti-busing provision would be added to an inadequately funded new appropriations bill."

In another area, however, the second session of the 94th Congress opened with a compromise that avoided another veto.

The White House had threatened a veto of a multibillion dollar railroad aid bill that had passed Congress at the close of the first session in mid-December, but hadn't been sent to the President during the recess in order to forestall a pocket veto.

Negotiations between the Administration and congressional sponsors of the bill resulted in agreement to send the bill back to conference for changes, and then clear the revised version for the President's signature. Involved are funds for Conrail, the new railroad system that will take over bankrupt northeastern railroads.

There is no agreement, however, on another veto-threatened bill—a labor-supported $6.1 billion authorization for job-creating public works projects and countercyclical aid to local and state governments during recessions.

It has been cleared by a House-Senate conference committee, but has not yet been scheduled for final passage.

Meany Calls for Probe of Attempt To 'Buy' Veto of Site Picketing Bill

"His track record of saying one thing and doing the opposite is now well established," he told the ILGWU officials and 300 local union representatives.

Thus there is no guarantee that Ford will stick to the position he outlined in the message to Congress, Meany observed.

Every speech, statement and policy decision now coming from the White House is directed at the nomination and election of Mr. Ford, Meany said. "He is so desperate for primary votes that he'll walk away from his commitments."

Meany said that any program Ford would be proposing in his message would not be "a clarion call for progress." He said the best chances of improving conditions for American people lie with Congress.

Ford's programs, conceived by former President Nixon and Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns, are "economic fallacies that add up to disaster, failure and suffering for millions of Americans," Meany declared.

Despite expected opposition from the White House, Meany said the prospects of Congress passing full-employment legislation this year are good.

Noting that 12 million Americans are totally or partially unemployed, he said that the jobless must be given a chance to create their own opportunities through a sound commitment to full employment.

"The men and women of America want work — they want jobs. They don't want a handout or a dole."

Other high-priority items on labor's agenda for Congress outlined by Meany are:

- Tax reform to eliminate special privileges for the wealthy.
- The start of action on the Kennedy-Corman Health Security measure.
- Heading off Administration attempts to deregulate the price of natural gas.
- Minimum benefit and financing standards for the federal-state unemployment insurance system.
- A firm commitment in Congress for the bill to establish a federal consumer protection agency to assure enough votes to override a threatened Ford veto.
- Curbing the abuses of American-based firms that are exporting U.S. technology and jobs while importing foreign-made products to the erosion of U.S. jobs.

A major thrust of the ILGWU legislative conference was the union's campaign for repeal of Item 807 of the U.S. Tariff Schedule. Meany noted that American garment manufacturers are taking advantage of this loophole by shipping cloth cut domestically to low-wage countries and paying meager tariffs on the products shipped backed to U.S. markets.

The ILGWU pointed out that imports under the loophole rose from $1.7 million in 1965 to $238.3 million in 1974. The union charged that these imports have wiped out 50,000 U.S. apparel industry jobs, and would have a further adverse impact on employment unless the tariff code is changed.

Unionists Head Regions of Apprentice Bureau

Two former building trades craftsmen were appointed regional directors of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

Vernon P. Nilsen, a member of the Carpenters and a 16-year career employe of the Labor Dept., was named director of BAT Region X based in Seattle. C. Frank Steagald, Jr., who comes out of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, now heads the bureau's Region IV in Atlanta. He has been with the Labor Dept. for 10 years.

Congress Adopts Jobs Bill, Overrides Veto on Funding

Meany Blasts Ford:

Medicare Proposal Hit as 'Deception'

President Ford's proposal to provide "catastrophic insurance" for persons on Medicare was "calculated to deceive the American people," AFL-CIO President George Meany charged.

It would benefit only one out of 300 Medicare beneficiaries who need hospital care. But the other 299 would have to pay more than they do now, Meany said. And their added out-of-pocket costs—amounting to about $1.8 billion in higher deductibles for hospitalization and physician services—would total more than three times the value of the proposed catastrophic insurance.

Meany saw Ford's program as "Robin Hood in reverse—taking from the aged poor to reduce the federal budget deficit."

In a leter to AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies, Meany said the AFL-CIO Executive Council will make a detailed analysis of the Administration's budget proposals at its mid-February meeting.

Meanwhile, Meany wrote, "I wanted to bring to your early attention one example of complete deception in the President's self-styled 'common sense' budget."

Ford said that 3 million persons on Medicare would benefit from the catastrophic insurance plan, which would take over after they have paid $500 in hospital bills and $250 in doctor bills in a year.

But, Meany stressed, "under existing law, no more than 50,000 out of the 25 million Medicare beneficiaries would receive any help when hospitalized under the limits the President set." His proposals would increase the costs for the

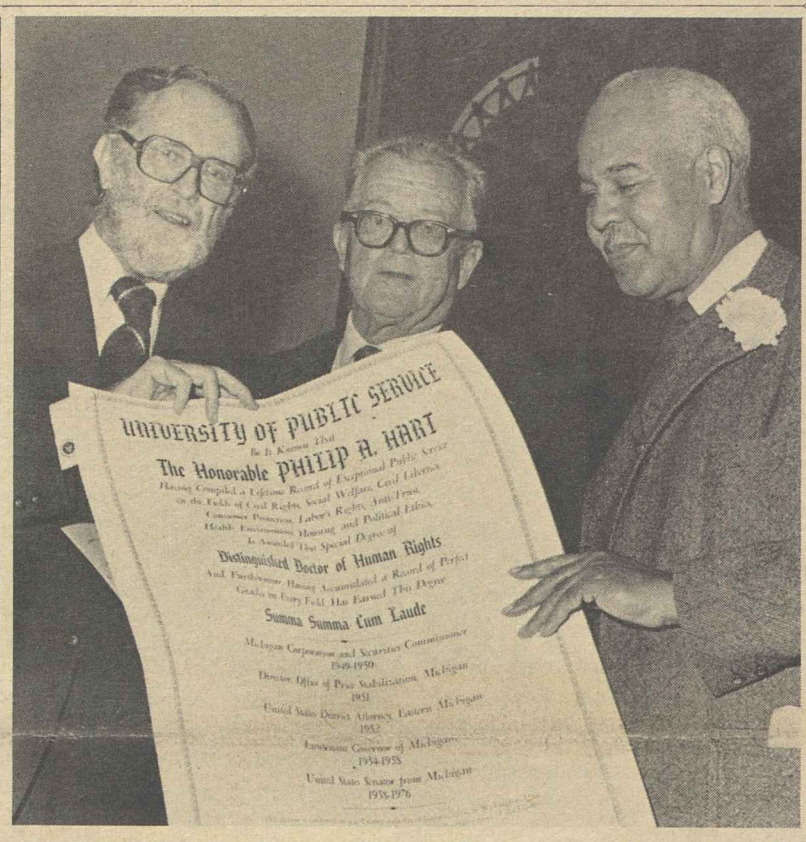
Aid Voted For Ailing Railroads

A labor-backed bill to provide financial help to the nation's railroads and avoid a complete breakdown of rail transportation in the Northeast won final approval from Congress.



After a last-minute compromise lifted the threat of a presidential veto, the House voted 353-62 for the bill and the Senate followed with a 56-28 vote.

The measure authorizes a package of up to $6.4 billion in federal grants, loans and investments.

Of this, $2.1 billion would be invested in bonds and preferred stock of the new Conrail system, which is being set up to take over freight operations and track of the Penn Central and six other bankrupt lines.

Workers who lose their jobs or are adversely affected by the consolidation will be entitled to severance pay or other forms of income protection.

Federal Court Decision:

R-T-W Group Ruled Front for Employers

A federal judge ruled that the legal arm of the National Right to Work Committee must be considered a front for employers who have a direct interest in weakening unions.

That's what a group of 10 unions contends in a suit that seeks a finding that the open-shop organization is violating a section of the Landrum-Griffin Act that bars an "interested employer" from financing a union member's suit against his union.

Since most of the funds for the "right-to-work" group come from employers, the unions asked for a list of contributors so the courts could determine whether "interested" employers were financing litigation against unions that represented or were trying to represent their workers.

U.S. District Judge Charles Richey, in Washington, D.C., ordered the open-shop foundation to furnish a sampling of its contributors. Both a federal appellate court and the U.S. Supreme Court refused to interfere.

To meet the R-T-W group's complaint that publication of the names would result in harassment of contributors, the judge set up elaborate procedures whereby only attorneys involved in the case would see the list.

Still the "work" group refused, and a week after the disclosure deadline passed, Judge Richey found the non-compliance to be willful and declared that the allegations the unions had made about the involvement of interested employers

Ford Dealt Twin Rebuff On Policies

By David L. Perlman

Congress defeated President Ford on a major veto override vote and then further challenged his budget priorities by passing a job-creating bill that the AFL-CIO termed "vitally important."

That bill also will be vetoed, the White House said. It is designed to put 600,000 persons to work. But Ford considers it "wasteful," the same epithet he used in vetoing the $45 billion appropriations bill that carried funds for programs of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Labor Dept.

In the face of this latest veto threat, the House sent the jobs bill to the President by a one-sided 321-80 vote—much more than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto.

The appropriations veto provided the first election year test on the key "spending" issue.

The vetoed bill was $1 billion over Ford's budget proposal, but within the spending ceilings set by Congress for this year's budget.

In a letter urging Congress to override the veto, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller noted that reducing the funding to the President's budget request would require "drastic cutbacks" in medical research, child health services, mental health, alcohol and drug abuse, vocational rehabilitation and community service programs.

Despite a last-minute Administration offer to compromise, one-third of the House Republican and

Outlook Rosy on Profits, Gloomy on Jobless Rate

By James M. Shevis

President Ford's economic message to Congress asked American workers to live with high levels of joblessness for the rest of the decade while big corporations enjoy a sharp jump in their profits.

It will take "several years" to return the nation to full economic health, Ford said in his annual message. He suggested the best way to regain economic strength in the long run is to hold down government spending and help private business gear up for expanded output.

"My policies are designed to support the long-term growth of the economy by fostering an environment in which the private sector can flourish," Ford said.

This was another expression of the same "trickle-down" theme the President had sounded a week earlier in his budget and State of the Union messages.

A separate report by the President's Council of Economic Advisers observed that "unemployment will almost surely remain distressingly high this year even though large gains in emplyoment are expected during 1976."

Underlying the CEA's annual economic report and the President's

Farm Workers Gain Pact Covering 3,000

Keene, Calif.—The Farm Workers have negotiated a master agreement covering about 3,000 UFW members employed at 16 ranches of the Western Growers Association. The agreement was the first reached under California's new farm labor law, which now is threatened by a lack of funds for administration and enforcement.

Three-year contracts have been ratified at Interharvest, Inc., and Meyers Tomatoes to provide wage rates ranging from a minimum of $3.10 an hour for field workers to a maximum of $4.175 for tractor operators. The two firms employ nearly 2,500 workers.

Local issues and wage scales at 14 smaller growers in the association are still to be worked out before contracts are presented for ratification, the UFW said.

Meanwhile, an emergency appropriations bill to provide $3.8 million for the operations of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board fell several votes short of the two-thirds

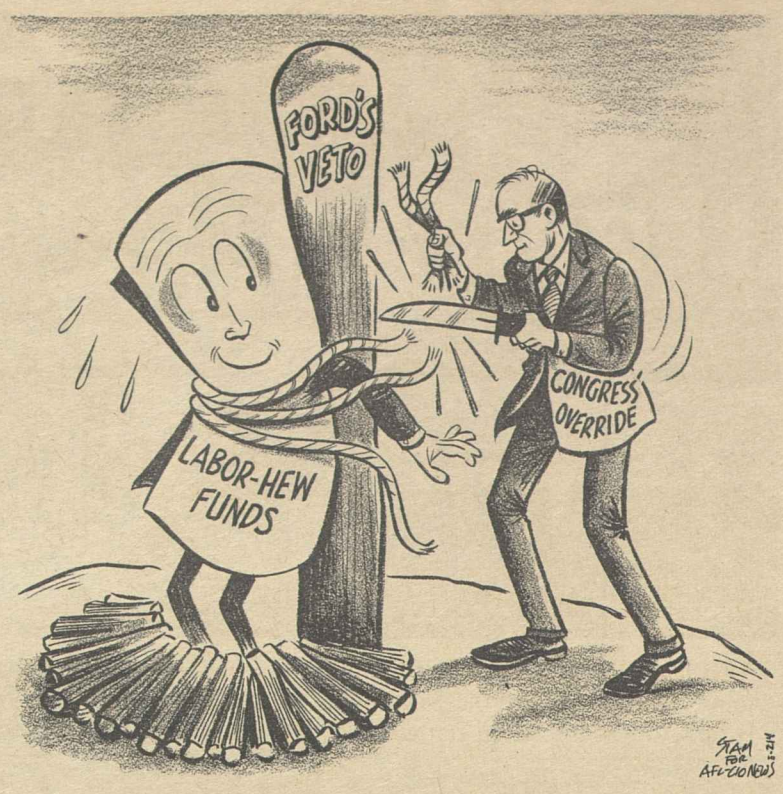
Conrail, short for the Consolidated Railway Association, is scheduled to take control of the seven railroads on Apr. 1. In addition to the Penn Central, they are the Erie Lackawanna, the Reading, the Jersey Central, the Lehigh Valley, the Ann Arbor and the Lehigh & Hudson River.

The bill also carries $1.6 billion for Amtrak to speed passenger service along the Washington-to-Boston corridor. The amount was scaled down from $2.4 billion originally in the bill as one of the changes made to get Administration support.



It sets up another $1.6 billion, of which $1 billion would be in the form of loan guarantees, to provide capital needed by railroads other than Conrail to rehabilitate facilities or equipment.

Another section of the bill would provide assistance to states that are seeking to retain needed freight services that otherwise would be dropped as too costly. The legislation also gives railroads greater flexibility in setting rates.

The earlier version of the bill, carrying a $7.4 billion authorization, had actually been passed by Congress on Dec. 19, 1975, the last day of the first session. But because of the presidential veto threat, it was never actually sent to the White House. The intent was to hold it until the start of the second session, so that Congress would have an opportunity to try to override the veto.

Instead, negotiations between the White House and key congressional sponsors brought an agreement on modifications that would make the bill acceptable to the Administration.

To make these changes, the House and Senate first rescinded their passage of the legislation and then sent the measure back to a House-Senate conference committee which incorporated the agreed-on changes. The final version then was passed by both bodies and sent to the President.

Meany Hits 'Deception' In Ford Medicare Plan

first two months of hospitalization to such an extent that the number reaching the limits on payments would rise to 3 million.

"Thus, in order to create a catastrophic insurance program," Meany said, "the President proposes to create catastrophe."

Meany noted also that Ford's proposal would cut the Medicare program by $26 billion over the next five years "with the nation's elderly forced to absorb virtually all of that cutback out of their meager resources."

The National Council of Senior Citizens also sharply attacked Ford's proposed Medicare changes.

Council President Nelson H. Cruikshank said its effect would be "to make health care costs so prohibitive that necessary visits to the doctor will be postponed, resulting in more serious illnesses among the elderly."

Other portions of the President's budget proposals have come under fire from unions whose members would be directly affected.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and the American Federation of Government Employees sharply criticized Ford's proposal to impose arbitrary limits—below even the cost-of-living level—on pay raises that are supposed to bring white collar and blue collar federal wages up to private industry levels for comparable jobs.

Public Employee Dept. President William H. McClennan said the department is "appalled at the apparent adverse effect of President Ford's budget on public services and public employes at the various levels of government."

AFGE President Clyde M. Webber noted that "federal workers were called upon by the Nixon-Ford Administrations to make 'sacrifices' in the public interest in 1972, 1973 and 1974 to 'curb inflation.' In 1975, the rationale was to 'reduce the budget deficit.' Now, in 1976, the excuse is 'fiscal restraint.'"

President Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers accused Ford of "playing games with figures" to make it appear that he is proposing more money instead of less for education.

Shanker termed the education budget proposals "totally inadequate" and called the budget as a whole "a fraud."

In another area, a budget analysis by the National Association of Counties raised serious questions about the adequacy of the budget and pointed out that "despite continued rising costs and local revenue shortfalls, the total amount of proposed aid to states and local governments remains the same."

David Sullivan 71, Dies, Led Service Employees

New York — David Sullivan, president-emeritus of the Service Employees and a former vice president of the AFL-CIO, died Jan. 23 at Booth Memorial Hospital here. He was 71.

Sullivan headed the SEIU from 1960 to 1971, a period when the union's membership rose from about 183,000 to 435,000. He served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council from 1965 to 1972.

In a message to his widow, Kathleen, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that Sullivan "was a diligent, dedicated, hard-working trade unionist who enriched all who worked with him. David's commitment to equal opportunity for all Americans shall long be remembered."

DAVID SULLIVAN

Meany and Kirkland expressed similar sentiments in a message to SEIU President George Hardy and the union's officers and members.

Sullivan, born in Cork, Ireland, came to the United States in 1925. He went to work as an elevator operator in New York City where he helped organize SEIU Local 32-B, the union's largest, which now has 45,000 members.

He was elected secretary-treasurer of the local in 1939 and its president in 1941. He also served as a vice president of the international before his election as SEIU president in 1960.

Sullivan also had been active in civic and community affairs, including service on a number of governmental commissions and advisory committees.

In addition to his wife, Sullivan is survived by three daughters, two sons and 15 grandchildren. A requiem mass was said at St. Nicholas of Tolentine Church Jan. 27. Burial was in Calvary Cemetery.

McCormack Heads National Fire Academy

David M. McCormack, a former president of Fire Fighters Local 854 in New York, has been sworn in as the superintendent of the National Fire Academy.

McCormack held the rank of deputy fire chief after 21 years of service with the New York fire department. He also has taught fire science and administration courses at New York area colleges.

IAFF President William H. McClennan said the fire fighters union supported McCormack's appointment to the position and pledged its full cooperation. The fire academy is being established under provisions of the National Fire Prevention & Control Act.

Twin Rebuff to Ford:

Jobs Bill Adopted, Fund Veto Beaten

17 of 35 Senate Republicans joined in overriding the veto. The needed two-thirds majorities were easily reached with a 310-113 vote in the House and a 70-24 vote in the Senate.

Last year, on bills of interest to labor, Congress tried nine times to override presidential vetoes but succeeded only three times.

In terms of economic impact, the Public Works Employment Act that Congress passed in defiance of the veto threat is a more important test.

Its origin was the priority package of anti-recession measures put forth by the House leadership last winter as unemployment was rising to its recession peak.

One ingredient was a $5 billion program of grants to state and local governments for public works projects on which construction could begin rapidly. The House passed the bill by a one-sided 312-86 margin and sent it to the Senate on May 20, 1975.

The Senate took up the bill last July, amending it substantially. It replaced most of the public works funds with a new program of "counter-cyclical" grants that would allow states and cities to maintain necessary services during periods of high unemployment — when revenues drop and the need for services increases.

The Senate adopted its version of the bill last July 29 by a 65-28 vote, setting the stage for a House-Senate conference.

Because the bills were so different, the conference was unusually prolonged. But finally, with a few legislative shortcuts, agreement was reached on a bill that:

- Authorized $2.5 billion—half the amount that had been voted by the House—for the public works provision of the bill. The program would remain in effect while unemployment averaged 6.5 percent or higher.
- Accepted the Senate-added provisions for counter-cyclical aid but shortened the time period the funding would be available from three years to 15 months. Overall, for each three-month period in which the national unemployment rate averages at least 6 percent, the federal government would allocate $125 million plus an additional $62.5 million for each one-half of 1 percent unemployment above the 6 percent level. Two-thirds of the money would go to local governments, one-third to states but only where the state or local unemployment rate was at least 6 percent.
- Added $100 million in grants to cities for urban economic development and extended the Job Opportunities Program, an ongoing public works jobs program, through next September with a $500 million authorization.
- Authorized for the 1977 fiscal year an additional $1.4 billion for construction of publicly-owned facilities for treatment of wastewater.

The Senate cleared the conference report by voice vote at the close of the first session, but it faced a more difficult course in the House, where there were procedural challenges to overcome.

In a letter sent to all House members before the vote, the AFL-CIO noted that the bill would "create more than 600,000 jobs, most of which will be in the severely depressed construction industry. The work will be performed on badly needed projects such as parks, playgrounds, libraries and schools . . . and sewer and water improvements."

That's the kind of legislation needed "if America is to reduce unemployment and rebuild the economy," the federation said.

On a key procedural issue, the House refused by a 268-133 margin to delete from the conference report the counter-cyclical aid.

That cleared the way for final passage of the bill by the 321-80 margin, and set the stage for another veto override battle.

Judge Rules R-T-W Unit Is Front for Employers

in the financing of the suits must now be assumed to be proven. He set a Feb. 20 date for the Right to Work foundation to show cause why he shouldn't issue an injunction barring the group from accepting contributions from interested employers.

Joining in the suit against the "work" organization are the Machinists; Auto Workers; State, County & Municipal Employees; Teachers; Farm Workers; Television & Radio Artists; Sheet Metal Workers; Laborers; Communications Workers; and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Ironically, less than a week earlier the open-shop foundation had won an unexpectedly sweeping ruling from a federal judge in California that would severely jeopardize the concept of the union shop if it were sustained.

The Railway & Airline Clerks, defendant in the suit financed by the "work" foundation, has announced that it will appeal the ruling by U.S. District Judge Leland C. Nielsen in San Diego.

The case, brought in the names of several Western Airlines employes, contends that the most that can be demanded of them under a union security agreement is payment of an amount equal to the portion of regular dues that goes into direct collective bargaining.

In upholding their claim, Judge Nielsen took what appeared to be an opposite approach from that taken by the Supreme Court a decade ago in a similar challenge. The court then held that the union shop authorization in the Railway Labor Act obligates a union to set up a refund procedure so that a person required to pay dues could request reimbursement for any portion that goes for political activities. Most unions, including the Railway Clerks, have adjusted their constitutions to allow such refund requests.

But Judge Nielsen's sweeping order appeared to include in the non-obligatory portion of dues such expenses as organizing, issuing publications that include coverage of matters other than collective bargaining, conducting conventions, paying per capita taxes to various labor federations, and expressing any views on government policies.

Proxy Vote Slated On Stevens Tactics

By John R. Oravec

The persistent labor law violations and anti-worker policies of J. P. Stevens & Co. will come up for review by stockholders at the company's annual meeting Mar. 2 in New York.

A minority stockholder initiated two proposals calling for an investigation of illegal management practices to repel union organization and inequities in Stevens's pension program. And the Securities & Exchange Commission has told the company it can't bar the issues from discussion.

Robert H. Hall, editor of Southern Exposure magazine and holder of three shares of Stevens stock, charged at a Washington news conference that Stevens "is probably the number one lawbreaker in corporate America today."

Hall noted that although the top management of Gulf Oil Corp. was fired for its role in illegal Watergate-related campaign fund contributions, "no one within Stevens has challenged the blatant and callous disregard for federal laws exhibited by the second largest textile company in the United States."

He pointed out that the company has repeatedly been found guilty of violating the National Labor Relations Act and has flouted court orders to cease all "deliberate" and "flagrant" abuses of the law.

The Textile Workers Union of America, which has conducted a 12-year campaign to organize Stevens workers throughout the South, commended Hall for his efforts to bring policies of the company's management to the attention of stockholders.

TWUA President Sol Stetin said that an independent study of the company's illegal action is long overdue, if only because of the adverse impact on Stevens workers and the cost to stockholders.

Hall warned that Stevens's actions "must be opposed not only because they are illegal and hurt the long-term interest of stockholders, but also because they are responsible for keeping the South as a whole as an economic colony."

Noting that the bulk of Stevens's 46,000 workers are concentrated in four southern states, Hall charged that the company has purposely violated federal labor law to thwart workers' efforts to organize in the region's largest industry to keep them from earning fair wages, "thereby pulling down the pay scale for all manufacturing jobs in the South."

One of the proposals initiated by Hall seeks the appointment of a committee of outside directors to report on the legal expenses, fines, back pay to workers and future costs stemming from the company's long-running opposition to the TWUA.

During an 11-year period, the TWUA and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. collected more than $1.3 million in behalf of some 300 Stevens workers who had suffered illegal discrimination for union activity.

In just one incident, Stevens had to pay $50,000 in damages to the TWUA and the IUD for illegally wiretapping the telephones of two union organizers.

Hall's other proposal asks for a review of the two-level pension plan, which he said provides for guaranteed payments for salaried employes but does not guarantee payments to the retirement fund for hourly workers, since that part of the plan is based on profit sharing.

The TWUA has sued the company under the new pension reform law to compel Stevens to establish a floor under retirement benefits for hourly wage workers.

Hall charged in his proposal that the company made no contributions to the hourly workers' pension plan during the years 1970, 1971 and 1972.

He said that although Stevens pays retiring executives tens of thousands of dollars annually, the average hourly worker retiring in 1973 received one "lump sum payment of under $1,000 from the company."

Hall's two proposals came to the attention of the Securities & Exchange Commission when Stevens objected that it should not be required to bring them before the stockholders.

The Wall Street Journal reported that the SEC examined the proposals and told Stevens that its objections were insufficient to deny their inclusion in the company's proxy statement.

"It's time that the corporate owners of Stevens took responsibility for management's contemptuous disrespect of laws that other companies obey," Hall said. He said it is vital that the outside directors investigate policies "that can only discredit the company and increase hostile relations with its employes and customers."

Stevens, which operates 89 plants in the United States, produces textiles for numerous consumer and commercial users and has had a number of big government supply contracts.

Probe Sought Of Contractors Use of Funds

Iron Workers President John H. Lyons has called for an investigation of management-administered "industry advancement funds" to determine whether any have been illegally tapped for political contributions used to bring pressure on President Ford to veto the construction situs picketing bill.

AFL-CIO President George Meany has asked a probe of newspaper reports that some building contractors sent unsigned checks to Ford's campaign committee—with the signatures to validate the checks promised if the site picketing bill were vetoed.

Lyons suggested that the virtually unregulated funds set up to promote various branches of the construction industry be looked into as a possible source of money "to buy a veto."

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, unions are barred from sharing control of such funds with employers. A bill to allow joint administration of promotion funds has been pending in Congress for more than a decade. It passed the House three times, but never came to a vote in the Senate.

Lyons, writing in the February issue of his union's magazine, termed Ford's veto of the bill he had promised to sign "disgraceful" and called for "every effort" to nominate the "strongest Democratic candidate . . . and turn the Republicans out of the White House."

LEGISLATIVE GOALS essential in achieving economic recovery through full employment programs were drafted by the Machinists and Auto Workers at a joint legislative conference in Washington. Addressing union representatives at the three-day meeting is IAM President Floyd E. Smith.

Labor Warns Change in Bank Rules Would Inflate Interest Rates, Prices

Increased competition for savings account dollars won't assure the balanced economic growth the nation needs, the AFL-CIO contended at House Banking Committee hearings.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger and Urban Affairs Director Henry Schechter were generally critical of a package of proposed changes in banking laws that would lessen the differences between savings institutions and commercial banks.

Savings institutions are principal sources of mortgage funds, and banks are the chief suppliers of business loans.

The proposals, drawn up as "discussion principles" for the subcommittee hearings, would also eliminate federal regulation of interest rates paid to depositors on savings over the next five years.

The AFL-CIO witnesses stressed that labor's primary concern is with the impact of monetary and credit policies on the nation's economic growth, housing and employment.

They renewed the AFL-CIO's convention call for Congress to direct the Federal Reserve to take actions that would bring about the expansion of money and credit at reasonable interest rates needed for healthy economic growth.

When tight money and high interest conditions are developing, they said, Congress should require allocation of credit for such high-priority purposes as housing, community facilities and essential capital investments.

Resources needed for these purposes, the AFL-CIO contended, shouldn't be diverted into such activities as land speculation, foreign subsidiaries or conglomerate takeovers.

Goldfinger and Schechter said the declared goal of the proposed changes—to strengthen financial institutions and increase competition among them — won't necessarily help the economy.

Competition that brings about higher interest rates on savings, they warned, will mean higher interest rates on mortgages and will price homes and apartments out of the reach of a large part of the population. And high interest rates generally, they noted, translate into higher prices for goods and services.

The proposals being considered by the House committee would include various subsidies for mortgages on housing built for ownership or rental by low-income and moderate-income families. But the AFL-CIO witnesses pointed out that "moderate-income" remained undefined and there would be a big area of uncovered housing construction that would be victimized by interest escalation.

Thus, the proposed subsidies would not prevent the periodic sharp fluctuations in homebuilding that the AFL-CIO termed key factors in the "two inflationary recessions since 1969."

As for the supposed benefits to small savers if interest rates paid by savings and loan associations were lifted, the AFL-CIO noted that high income families gain most from higher interest rates on their bank deposits because they are much more likely to have substantial savings.

They said low-income families would be worse off "because they have little or no saivngs but would have to pay higher interest rates reflected in prices."

Study Cites Cost Efficiency Of U.S. Labor

The value that American workers add to the goods they produce exceeds their earnings by a much greater margin than is true in other industrial nations, a New York securities firm disclosed in a recent study.

Reporting on the findings of Baker, Weeks & Co., the Wall Street Journal noted the study showed annual wages for a group of auto workers in a recent 12-month period averaged $13,243. However, the value of the work performed by them amounted to $20,138.

Earnings for groups of auto workers over the same period in West Germany came to $9,191 and in Britain, $5,601. The value of the work performed by the West German workers was estimated at $11,155, and for the British, $4,982.

Pittsburgh Teachers Ratify Strike Accord

Pittsburgh—Members of Local 400 of the American Federation of Teachers returned to their jobs after ratifying a new two and one-half year contract providing substantial wage increases and improved working conditions.

The pact, approved by a 2 to 1 vote margin, ended a strike that began last Dec. 1, one of the longest major walkouts in AFT history.

The new contract, covering 4,400 teachers and paraprofessionals, provides for a $400 across-the-board salary increase in April. Other increases will be given in increments throughout the life of the contract. The average teacher's raise is estimated at $3,555 over a 30-month period, with increases of 11.3 percent this year, 8.3 percent in 1977 and 5.1 percent in 1978.

One step has been eliminated from the salary schedule so that after 10 steps a teacher with a master's degree and 10 years of experience will earn the top scale of $20,300. Under the old contract that expired last Nov. 30, teachers' salaries ranged from $8,700 to $16,700 a year.

Paraprofessionals will receive salary increases in four steps providing $1,800 over the two and a half years. They now earn an average of $4,600 a year.

The agreement also increases life insurance coverage from $8,000 to $10,000 right away and to $15,000 by August 1978.

Class size, a major issue that delayed settlement, was set at 33 students per class with a 3-student leeway, maintaining an overall school average class size of 35. The school board had wanted a class size of 38 with a 5-student leeway.

The pact also mandates a joint union-school board review of policies relating to school discipline.

The size of the wage package was recommended by a five-member factfinding committee appointed by Common Pleas Court Judge Donald E. Ziegler who ordered the striking teachers back to work Jan. 3. When they continued to picket, Ziegler fined the local $25,000 plus $10,000 for each day the teachers stayed out.

Despite the settlement, Ziegler said he would uphold the fines now totaling $105,000. Albert Fondy, president of the AFT local, said the union would appeal the judge's decision and added he was "hopeful" about the outcome.

The 57-day old strike had heavy support from the labor movement, notably from the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union and Public Employee Departments.

A Wasteful Loophole

TWO BACK-TO-BACK recessions, continuing inflation, usurious interest rates and massive unemployment have cut into state and local tax revenues and sharply increased costs, creating large and growing shortages and backlogs in essential public services and facilities.

State and local governments have laid off workers, reduced hours and put freezes on personnel and wages. This has added to joblessness, reduced purchasing power and resulted in a sharp deterioration in public facilities and services. Education, public transportation, trash collection, police and fire protection, and other basic and essential services have been cut back.

Bond issues have been rejected by voters and by the money markets. Needed improvements and additions to public facilities have been postponed or cancelled, and the nation's largest city was pushed to the brink of total financial collapse.

The U.S. Treasury Dept. claims that the present exemption of interest on state and local sercurities from taxable income costs nearly $5 billion annually in lost federal revenue. Past Treasury studies have shown that approximately two-thirds of the tax loss goes to the benefit of state and local governments. The balance, currently over $1.5 billion annually, flows as tax benefits primarily to the wealthier individuals and the commercial banks which hold most of these bonds.

In other words, for every dollar in interest cost saved by local communities as a result of the federal tax exemption, the Treasury loses approximately $1.50 in revenue.

TREASURY STATISTICS reveal that 88 percent of the tax exemption benefits received by individuals go to taxpayers with reported incomes of $50,000 a year or over—a group representing the wealthiest 1.2 percent of the nation's taxpayers.

The Treasury's 1969 tax reform studies noted that tax-free income from state and local bonds was the second most important factor—the capital gains provision was the first—in reducing the taxes of those with incomes of over $100,000 per year.

Since the tax advantages go only to the wealthy, this tax-free interest erodes the equity of the tax structure.

As important, since the Treasury loses more than the state and local governments gain, the tax-exempt privilege is a wasteful, back-door method of providing essential aid to state and local governments.

Commercial banks are major holders of municipal securities. In times of tight money and high interest rates, like the present, banks reduce their purchases of municipal securities or dump them. This creates an erratic and unsure market for the bonds, forcing states and localities to pay higher and higher interest rates and increase their own debt service and tax burdens in order to sell their bonds. And more and more federal revenue is lost.

The AFL-CIO has long advocated measures to improve the ability of states and local governments to finance essential public investment needs. And we have long advocated enactment of a substantive program of tax justice.

We feel that by eliminating tax-exempt bonds and providing a federal interest rate subsidy, the Congress will be taking a significant step toward attainment of both those goals.

A Word Edgewise:

By John P. Roche

FROM SOME OF THE MAIL I receive, it is clear that readers—highly articulate ones—do want me expelled from Sunday School. And when I read various commentators—radical and conservative—and watch the news programs on television, I sometimes myself begin to wonder whether I live in and comment on the United States of America or am off in a dream world of my own.

Perhaps it is true that the fact I live in Greater Boston, far from those centers of enlightenment, Washington and New York, has left me out of touch. I just don't lunch with the right people, the opinion-molders and unerring readers of the public mind who know exactly what the American people really believe.

Maybe, but then I have one great resource on my side: public opinion polls. And, at a more subjective level, more than a quarter of a century's experience exploring and teaching American history and politics, with all the perspective that can provide. In short, I stand pat on the proposition that the American people have a combination of hard-mindedness and decency unique in the history of western man. They are capable of amazing altruism, but, once they become convinced the United States is being played for a sucker, they get hard as nails.

Right now they are in a hard phase—often wrongly defined as "conservative"—which began about 1966. The catalyst was the Vietnam war, but the response was almost universally misconstrued as a national conversion to pacifism. What actually occurred (and was verified in numerous polls which were ignored by our high theorists) was a profound disillusionment with our allies (where were the British, the French, and others who had so long relied on our protection?) and the largely unarticulated decision that we should either clobber Hanoi once and for all or call it a day. Why should lonely Americans slug it out and die for a supposedly collective cause?

The media turned this mental scenario on its head by attributing our disenchantment to the "kids" and their various Pentecostal activities, though in fact the average American would rather have decked a flag-burner than a Vietcong. After all, the flag-burners were "our own," and later, when various heart-rending pleas were made for "unconditional amnesty" for draft-dodgers because they had been "right" in avoiding an "obscene, immoral, imperialistic war," the reaction was a savage growl. Recall that, in 1968, 57 percent of the electorate voted against the liberal Democrat, Hubert Humphrey. The less said of 1972 the better.

Today the same misperceptions live on. Conservative commentators mutter darkly about the failure of the American spirit, the decline of morals and patriotism. I find this funny: I never considered the Americans who joined me in that great commune, the World War II Army, as models of morality, or—in a superficial sense—patriotism. (In our outfit, anyone who had a 1 in front of his serial number, indicating he volunteered, was forbidden to gripe.) The British considered the American Army to be in a permanent state of mutiny, but by God when the chips were down it performed. (The British never understood that Americans, like Australians—whom they considered even worse, are born with an anarchist chromosome.)

SIMILARLY, for over 20 years I have been sitting on a "scoop": A friend of mine who grew up down the block from Jack Kennedy in Bronxville, N.Y., told me years ago that as a kid the future president cheated at marbles. I deposit this one free on Pat Buchanan's doorstep, but predict it will be greeted with yawns. Kennedy may have had private sins, but Nixon's were public—thus the ideal solution was to put JFK in public life and retire Nixon to chaste privacy.

The move to expel me from Sunday School, however, comes from the end of the spectrum, from those who object to my "justifying" the "sins" of the CIA and FBI. I have justified no "sins," but have emphasized that they constituted a trivial segment of the work of those agencies; and that the American people want strong, effective intelligence and counterintelligence organizations.

Those who think we should have been utterly appalled by poisoned dart guns might check the best-seller lists over the past decade for works by James Bond, John Le Carre, and Len Deighton. The people want these outfits run properly—not demolished. Democratic candidates please take notice.

Pillar of Black Community:

66-Year Record of NAACP Underscores Its Role in Nation

By Bayard Rustin

SINCE 1909 the NAACP has been the most influential and important organization in the black community. The NAACP is currently in a financial crisis as a result of the combined effect of recession and inflation. This is then a good time to reflect on what the NAACP means to Americans, black and white. Precisely because it has been around for so long and has achieved so much, we sometimes forget just what it has accomplished in its 66 years.

The NAACP has had a profound impact on the very fabric of the life of every American. It is almost impossible to imagine how much more oppressive the lives of black Americans would be if it were not for the tireless and courageous efforts of the NAACP.

Recalling a few of the major triumphs of the NAACP is the best way to appreciate its importance:

1. Anti-lynching laws. Beginning in 1916 the NAACP campaigned vigorously for the enactment of federal anti-lynching laws. Although these measures were continually defeated by filibusters in the Senate, the NAACP was able to focus national and world attention on this tragedy. After more than 40 years anti-lynching laws were finally passed.

2. Voting rights. The struggle of the NAACP to enfranchise black Americans is as old as the association itself. It fought undaunted by the murder of many of its leaders across the South. The NAACP fought for many years in the courts to outlaw white primaries in the South, the poll tax and general registration barriers. The culmination was the enactment of the 1965 Voting Rights Act which enfranchised millions of blacks throughout the South and permanently altered the American political landscape.

3. Black political power. The NAACP understood better, practiced earlier, and achieved more black political power, than the firebrands who created the slogan in the 1960s. As early as 1930 Walter White, the national secretary, was able to engineer the defeat of the nomination of segregationist Judge John J. Parker to the Supreme Court. In 1948, the NAACP called a conference of black organizations to issue a "Declaration of Negro Voters." The efforts of the NAACP were successful from the re-election of President Truman to the increasing black caucus in Congress.

4. Housing. In 1924 the NAACP began a court battle against racially restrictive housing covenants. These covenants which bound homeowners not to sell to blacks were declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1948. The NAACP was crucial to the passage of the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

5. Integrating the federal government. The association started its effort to end segregation in the federal government in 1914. In 1941 Walter White and A. Philip Randolph of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters persuaded Franklin Roosevelt to issue Executive Order 8802 which barred discrimination in government and defense plant hiring.

6. Education. The 1954 Supreme Court decision overturning the separate but equal doctrine was undoubtedly the greatest achievement of the NAACP and one of the turning points in American history. It ended the legitimacy of segregation and signaled the opening of a new, intensified battle for full equality in every sphere of American life.

7. Civil rights. The civil rights legislation of the 1960s which firmly established the constitutional and legal rights of black Americans was in large part the result of the lobbying and political capabilities of the NAACP over a period of 60 or more long years.

THE NAACP HAS NEVER been content to rest on its record. Its continuous advocacy of the interests of black Americans has been its defining characteristic. With every victory, the NAACP has endeavored to make it permanent and has moved on to the next battle.

In large part this is because the NAACP has been guided by Roy Wilkins, who has led the NAACP through the most turbulent and divisive period in the history of black Americans. Through his wise leadership a major portion of the agenda for racial equality has been won.

The NAACP has many urgent tasks before it in the coming years. It remains the strength and pillar of the black community. It is my hope that thousands of Americans will respond to the needs of the NAACP.

'Flattest' Ever:

Ford's Legislative Program Needs Reshaping in Congress

THE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM that President Ford outlined in his State of the Union message is the "flattest" ever, and unless it is beefed up by Congress, it spells continuing stagnation of the economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said on Labor News Conference.

Biemiller scored the President's failure to lay out any effective job-creating proposals. He stressed that it is now up to Congress to dig in and shape programs in such areas as public service, housing and accelerated public works, even though Ford threatens a veto of such measures.

"We hope that Congress will succeed in passing bills over the President's vetoes," Biemiller declared, adding that the AFL-CIO is under no illusions about the difficulties it faces in a President who will probably "continue to veto—one after another," and continue the confrontation between the White House and Capitol Hill.

Biemiller said the President's scheme to give tax relief to certain industries where unemployment is high is simply "playing around with the old trickle-down theory that if he gives enough on top, some of it may come down" to working families.

He said the tax relief idea could also be unfair to some industries in areas where unemployment hasn't been so severe, that will find "their competitors getting all kinds of breaks from the government while they are not."

Turning to this year's elections, Biemiller said the problem isn't "big government," but "effective government," and the need for an Administration that will take "both old laws and new ideas and administer them without hesitation in the interests of the people and commit itself to a program of full employment."

That means a new Administration, Biemiller asserted. "We've just given up completely on the Ford Administration," he said. "The last straw was when he broke his word to us on the situs picketing bill," and "when anybody in public life breaks his public word, it is high time to have a complete break with that person."

Reporters questioning Biemiller on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Neil MacNeil of Time magazine and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

"THE BUSINESS of America is business."

If Calvin Coolidge hadn't said it first, some 50 years ago, President Ford could have used the line in his 1976 State of the Union address and budget request to Congress. But he did follow the theme, which shows that Republican presidents respect tradition.

America has been enduring the most prolonged and pervasive recession since the Great Depression. There are 8 million unemployed, another 3.5 million forced on part-time and still another 1.2 million too discouraged to seek work. Teenage unemployment hangs at 19 percent, with the rate for young blacks double that. The nation's great cities are rotting at the core. The housing shortage is scandalous. Health care is costly, inefficient and out of reach for many. Inflation continues to erode every family budget.

With all this, President Ford has sounded the call for retreat. He wants the federal government to do less and he wants big business and the business-dominated state governments to do more.

The President has delivered a State of the Union message and budget proposal which revives old myths. Looking backward, he sees a frugal and struggling citizenry who have progressed over 200 years because "we have been tested in adversity." The year 1975 may have been hard, but out of it came "a new realism" which restored "common sense, steadfastness and self-discipline." He observed that "Americans did not panic."

Well, a lot of people may have cause for panic when they look at Ford's understanding of how a modern economy and nationally integrated society works.

Millions of people may be out of work, Ford says, but "our kind of government cannot create that many jobs." In fact, the federal government created 4 million jobs in two months in the early years of the Great Depression. Today, jobless pay provides a cushion for most workers but nevertheless the Congress intends to push through programs to create several hundred thousand jobs.

Ford's approach would ask Congress to give breaks to business to finance plant expansion and new equipment purchases, but only in areas with over 7 percent jobless. In fact, over one-quarter of the nation's productive capacity now stands idle.

While the unemployed strengthen their character through adversity, Ford forecasts a gradual improvement. The national jobless rate averaged 8.5 percent in 1975 and the Administration sees it declining to 7.7 percent this year and 6.9 percent in 1977.

FORD SHOWED he had not forgotten other American folklore. For future generations, he would now change estate taxes so the family business and family farm would not have to be sold "to pay taxes." In fact, small business has a high rate of failure because it cannot withstand the ruthless competition of giant chains. Agribusiness and conglomerates have been plowing under the family farm for years, often with government subsidies.

Ford says America cannot afford national health insurance. So, to help the elderly and the poor, he favors "catastrophic" insurance. The real catastrophe is that 99 out of every 100 Medicare recipients would pay more, not less.

The basic trouble, says Ford, is that the people have been led to expect too much. America became too overconfident of its abilities.

"We tried to be a policeman abroad and an indulgent parent here at home," Ford told the nation. Ford's conservatism is consistent with his background. For 25 years, he represented a Grand Rapids, Mich., district populated by self-reliant and religious-minded Dutch-Americans. While Gerald Ford stood still, America underwent 25 years of dynamic and even traumatic changes.

Now President Ford is trying to push the pendulum of power back to states long dominated by business and rural interests. Ford has laid out a campaign strategy which apparently intends to attract contributions from business and exploit the discontents and resentments of a hardpressed middle class.

The heavily Democratic Congress will get first crack at Ford's proposals. The American people must wait until November to show that, unlike their President, they have confidence in America.

CONGRESS MUST reshape the programs outlined by President Ford in his State of the Union message to prevent a further stagnation of the economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Neil MacNeil of Time magazine.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS to expand employment programs and curb the job erosion caused by foreign imports are discussed by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.), center, and local union representatives of the Ladies' Garment Workers on Capitol Hill. They were part of the 300 ILGWU members participating in a three-day legislative conference and lobbying campaign in Washington.

President's Economic Message Rosy on Profits, Gloomy on Jobs

budget proposals are the following key assumptions for the economy's behavior in 1976:

- Unemployment will decline from the 8.5 percent average rate for 1975 to 7.7 percent, still leaving some 7.3 million persons who want to work without jobs.
- The rate of inflation should be about 6 percent, compared to the 1975 rise of 7 percent, as measured by the consumer price index. The cost of living last year was even higher, 8.7 percent, as measured by the government's gross national product price index, generally regarded as the broadest measure of inflation.
- Real GNP—the total value of all goods and services produced by the nation's workers—will be 6 to 6.5 percent higher than in 1975 when it declined 2 percent after falling 1.8 percent in 1974.
- Personal consumption should increase by 6 percent, compared with 3.9 percent in 1975.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger noted that the Administration's forecast shows "only very modest improvements in moving out of the deepest and longest recession since the 1930s." And while it has little real meaning for the economically deprived American worker "such very modest improvement is forecast to produce booming profits" for the corporate community.

"The forecast is a 32 percent a 16 percent increase in 1977," rise in profits in 1976, followed by Goldfinger said. The big profits would stem partly from anticipated sharp increases in productivity and wider profit margins, he explained.

The President's economic advisers said that while production has been rising steadily since last spring, the outlook for any dramatic reduction in joblessness in the near term is virtually nil.

"Even under the best of circumstances the return to full employment cannot realistically be accomplished this year or next," the CEA said.

Ford's advisers argued that the safest and surest route to full employment lies in policies aimed at a "moderate but sustained recovery" rather than "policies which attempt to engineer a very rapid return to full capacity."

Meanwhile, the new Congressional Budget Office released its five-year projection of fiscal years 1977 through 1981 that indicated the Administration's budget holddown would do relatively little to moderate inflation.

The agency also disputed the President's assertions that the recovery can continue vigorously through 1977 with the budget restraints he has proposed.

The CBO said the Administration's targets of a 5.7 percent growth rate in 1977 and a drop of eight-tenths of 1 percent in the unemployment rate would be attainable if 1977 budget outlays were between $420-$425 billion. Yet Ford has called for expenditures of only $394.2 billion in fiscal year 1977, which begins on Oct. 1, 1976.

In outlining his economic philosophy, Ford said:

"Increased capital formation is essential to meeting our long-term goals of full employment and non-inflationary growth. This means that business investment in plant and equipment as a share of gross national product must increase.

"We must also slow the growth of federal spending in the years immediately ahead, so that mounting claims by the federal government on our economic resources will not prevent an adequate flow of savings into capital investments."

Ford also dangled the prospect of a tax cut three years hence "if we continue in the years ahead to pursue the kind of budgetary restraint which I am recommending."

The CEA's 282-page report, which is required by the Employment Act of 1946 to indicate what progress the Executive Branch is making to assure growth and stable employment, disclosed a revision in the nation's unemployment figures for 1975.

The revised figures, attributed to "seasonal adjustment factors" including "some methodological changes," reported that joblessness peaked at 8.9 percent last May rather than 9.2 percent as previously announced. However, unemployment for the year remained unchanged at an average of 8.5 percent, and the rate for last December, 8.3 percent, stayed the same.

The council's projected 6 percent inflation rate for 1976 is based on assumptions of a 5 to 6 percent increase in unit labor costs and an 8 to 9 percent increase in wages.

"Unit labor costs actually ceased to rise in the first two quarters of the present recovery, as productivity gains matched the rise in compensation per hour," the CEA reported. "In 1976, however, somewhat faster growth in compensation per hour and slower productivity growth will push the rise in unit labor costs close to the inflation rate expected for the year."

Corrections on Congress Vote Listings

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation announced that tabulation errors in the "Report on Congress—1975" that appeared in the Jan. 24, 1976, issue of the AFL-CIO News resulted in incorrect vote listings for a number of congressmen and senators.

In House vote number 23 on the Farm Bill Veto Override, the following members of the New York delegation were listed incorrectly and have been changed to the vote indicated (R-Right or W-Wrong on the basis of the AFL-CIO's position): Richmond - R; Koch-W; Rangel-R; Abzug-W; Bingham-R; Peyser-W; Ottinger-R; Gilman-W; McHugh-R; Stratton-W.

In House vote number 17 on the Hatch Act, the following were listed incorrectly and have been changed to the vote indicated: Harris-R; Fisher-W.

In Senate vote number 16 on Civil Rights-Busing, the following were listed incorrectly and have been changed to the vote indicated: Sparkman (Ala.)-W; Biden (Del.)-W; Church (Ida.)-R; Hartke (Ind.)-W; Pearson (Kan.)-R; Huddleston (Ky.)-W; Muskie (Me.)-R; Beall (Md.)-W; Hart (Mich.)-A; Eagleton (Mo.)-W; Symington (Mo.)-W; McIntyre (N.H.)-R; Williams (N.J.)-A.

Also, Domenici (N.M.)-W; Bellmon (Okla.)-R; Packwood (Ore.)-R; Abourezk (S.D.) - R; McGovern (S.D.)-R; Bentsen (Tex.)-W; Moss (Utah)-R; Jackson (Wash.)-W; Magnuson (Wash.)-W; Nelson (Wis.)-R; Proxmire (Wis.)-W.

These corrections will be incorporated into future editions of Report on Congress—1975.

NMU's Raskin Retires, Thompson Fills Post

New York—Samuel Thompson was named publications and public relations director of the National Maritime Union to succeed Bernard Raskin, who retired after 20 years in the post.

Thompson, a former reporter with the Amsterdam News here, joined the NMU as a staff writer in 1955. He has been assistant editor of the NMU Pilot since 1958.

Raskin, who had been research director of the New York State CIO before coming to the NMU, said he will now operate a free lance communications service for unions and joint labor-management programs.

Musicians, College Body Settle Dispute

New York—The Musicians and the National Entertainment Conference, which runs a booking system for colleges and universities, have resolved their longstanding contractual differences with a new agreement.

AFM President Hal C. Davis and NEC Chairman Thomas E. Matthews jointly announced the new contract, and noted it would "usher in an era of cooperation" between the two organizations.

The agreement follows a long period of confrontation and litigation between the union and NEC. The dispute arose nearly six years ago over attempts to amend the union's standard contracts.

The new contract changes and improves language in the standard contract forms used by NEC schools and in booking AFM members. Matthews and Davis said the changes accommodate both sides and that "both organizations now look forward to a cordial and mutually beneficial relationship."

Up From Previous Year:

Pay Raises Average 7.8% In Major 1975 Settlements

Wage increases under major collective bargaining settlements negotiated in 1975 averaged 7.8 percent a year over the life of the contracts, slightly above the 7.3 percent averaged in 1974, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The measure excludes possible gains under cost-of-living escalator clauses. The finding stems from an analysis of 763 settlements involving 1,000 or more workers. They cover a total of 2.8 million workers primarily in the construction, railroad, apparel, and wholesale and retail trade industries.

BLS noted that the number of workers covered by 1975 settlements was somewhat higher than expected, partly because several contracts that expired in 1974 were not renegotiated until 1975.

The government's preliminary report also included these key findings:

● Contracts negotiated last year provided an average wage increase of 10.2 percent for the first year of the agreement, compared with 9.8 percent in 1974.

● In larger contracts, those covering 5,000 workers or more, wage and benefit gains combined averaged 11.2 percent for the first year and 8 percent annually over the life of the contract. This compares with 10.7 and 7.8 percent, respectively, in 1974.

● Contracts concluded last year had an average duration of 27.6 months, compared with 22.8 months when the same parties previously negotiated.

● First-year gains were greater than those deferred to subsequent years, and their size tended to increase as contract duration grew.

Second and third year adjustments and average adjustments over the life of the contract had no consistent relationship with contract duration, however, BLS noted.

The size of wage settlements apparently was influenced by the possibility of additional increases under cost-of-living escalator clauses, the government observed.

Contracts containing escalator clauses, covering 35 percent of the workers under major settlements concluded during the year, provided for annual wage adjustments averaging 7 percent. Contracts without escalator clauses provided for average annual increases of 8.2 percent, respectively, in 1974.

In contracts containing COL provisions settled during 1975, first-year gains thus far have averaged 13.3 percent, BLS said. The figure is obtained by adding cost-of-living adjustments to negotiated increases.

During 1975, new cost-of-living clauses were adopted in 92 settlements covering 692,000 workers, mostly in the railroad industry, BLS said. Escalator clauses now cover 59 percent, or 6 million, of all workers in major bargaining units.

In the manufacturing sector of the economy, wage increases averaged 9.9 percent in the first contract year and 8.1 percent annually over the life of the agreement, compared with 10.5 and 8 percent, respectively, in 1974.

Settlements in the construction industry averaged 8 percent for the first year and 7.4 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 11 and 9.6 percent for 1974.

In industries other than manufacutring, wage boosts averaged 10.4 percent in the first year and 7.7 percent a year over the life of the contract, compared with 10.5 and 8 percent, respectively, in 1974.

Abel Warns Job Lack Tearing America Apart

Atlanta—Ford Administration policies programmed to keep unemployment high for another five years "will tear apart the fabric of American society," Steelworkers President I. W. Abel warned.

Addressing a jobs conference during a three-day Martin Luther King, Jr., birthday observance, Abel called on Congress to give top priority consideration to labor's full employment goal.

Outlining AFL-CIO programs to put the nation's more than 8 million jobless back to work, Abel said it is essential that a full employment program be made the key element of national economic policy.

Abel was on hand to receive the first labor award presented by the Martin Luther King, Jr. Center for Social Change.

Mrs. Coretta Scott King, widow of the slain civil rights leader, said in presenting the award that the Administration's economic policies are undermining hard-won civil rights gains.

"What good is the legal right to sit in a restaurant if one cannot afford the price of its food?" she asked. "And what good is the promise of fair employment when there is no employment?"

"For Americans — black and white—the deliberate creation of high unemployment has meant nothing less than the denial of basic human rights to live as full-fledged members of the American system," Mrs. King declared.

Abel, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee, also warned that Nixon-Ford policies have motivated attacks on the seniority system, thereby threatening the labor-civil rights alliance.

"Job seniority and a union card are the only weapons workers have with which to defend their economic security and human dignity against the arbitrary and discriminatory acts of management," Abel observed.

He said there must be no retreat in the labor-civil rights campaign for jobs, and from equal opportunity and seniority.

Other labor officials addressing the conference included President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers, Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters.

State Sued for Cheating On Mental Patients' Pay

The Labor Dept. has filed suit against the State of California, its health and welfare agency, and its Department of Health for refusing to pay the minimum wage to working patients in 11 state-operated mental health hospitals.

Solicitor of Labor William J. Kilberg said the suit seeks to enjoin the defendants from further violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act's minimum wage provisions and to obtain back wages, with interest, for the underpaid workers.

Kilberg said the complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Sacramento, charges that the defendants have been violating the FLSA since Dec. 1, 1974.

From Dec. 1 to Dec. 31, 1974, the applicable minimum wage was $1.90 an hour; from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1975, it was $2 and beginning Jan. 1, 1976, it was $2.20.

State hospitals named in the complaint are in Stockton, Porterville, Costa Mesa, Pomona, San Jose, Camarillo, Patton, Atascadero, Norwalk, Eldridge, and Imola.

The suit is based on a 1973 decision (Souder v. Brennan) in which the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held that patient-workers are entitled to the same FLSA wage protection that was extended to regular employes of public and private care facilities in 1966.

The court said: "Economic reality is the test of employment (for purposes of the FLSA) and the reality is that many of the patient-workers perform work for which they are in no way handicapped and from which the institution derives full economic benefit. So long as the institution derives any consequential economic benefit the economic reality test would indicate an employment relationship rather than mere therapeutic exercise.

"To hold otherwise would be to make therapy the sole justification for thousands of positions as dishwashers, kitchen helpers, messengers and the like."

The law does provide for payment of subminimum wages, under special certificates issued by the department's Wage & Hour Division, to patient workers with impaired productivity.

New Solutions Proposed for Litter, Waste

Organized labor must "seek positive solutions to the twin problems of solid waste disposal and the depletion of valuable natural resources," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said as he expressed the federation's opposition to so-called "ban-the-can measures.

Biemiller, speaking at a lunch marking the 26th anniversary of the National Coordinating Committee of the Beverage Industry, noted that "the AFL-CIO has been among the strongest supporters of environmental legislation."

But, he stressed, "simplistic solutions" like the proposals to ban all disposable bottles and cans "cannot work in this complex society." What is needed, he said, "is a coordinated effort to eliminate litter, to preserve this nation's vital resources, and at the same time prevent the human pollution of unemployment. . . ."

One positive approach to the solid waste problem — 5 percent produced by cans and bottles and 95 percent from other sources—would be a coordinated resource recovery program, Biemiller said. The technology exists, he continued, "to turn waste into low pollution fuels, to make roads out of crushed glass, to reclaim cans and reuse them in a variety of ways."

Credit Union Audit

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employees Federal Credit Union was made as of Dec. 31, 1975. Members who do not receive their statements by Feb. 2, 1976, are asked to notify the Chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 701, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington D.C. 20006

February Schedule Set By Labor Studies Center

February will be the busiest month of the school year for the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center at Silver Spring, Md. Eight institutes, seminars and programs are scheduled at the 47-acre campus. The ninth will be on the campus of the University of California, Berkeley. The schedule:

Government Employees—The AFGE will conduct two staff conferences for its national vice presidents and national representatives. From 9 a.m., Monday, Feb. 2, through Friday, Feb. 6; and from 9 a.m., Monday, Feb. 23, through Friday, Feb. 27.

Railroaders—The United Transportation Union will sponsor another session of its institutes for general chairmen. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 1, through Friday, Feb. 13.

Professional Employees—The Council for Professional Employees will sponsor a conference on Women in the Technical Professions on Monday evening and Tuesday, Feb. 2 and 3.

Labor Law—An institute on labor's legal problems for full-time officers and staff members of AFL-CIO unions. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 8, through Friday, Feb. 13.

Noise—A special program for union officers and staff unions on the problems of occupational noise. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 15, to Wednesday noon, Feb. 18.

Public Employees—The State, County & Municipal Employees will conduct an institute on arbitration for council staff from 4 p.m., Sunday, Feb. 15, through Thursday, Feb. 19.

Letter Carriers—A teacher training program for national business agents and state directors of education of the Letter Carriers. From Monday, Feb. 16 through Friday, Feb. 19.

Postal Workers—A teacher training course for state directors of education of the Postal Workers. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 29, through Friday, Mar. 5.

February's off-campus institute will be for building trades business agents under the sponsorship of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Feb. 8, through Friday, Feb. 13, at the University of California, Berkeley.

More information about these and other programs at the Center may be obtained from Fred Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Phone 301/431-6400.

Second Woman Joins Rubber Workers Board

Cincinnati — Irene L. Tantillo, secretary of Rubber Workers Local 310 in Des Moines, Ia., has been appointed to the union's executive board. She is the second woman to join the board in past three months. filling the seat created by expansion of the board from 14 to 15 members.

URW President Peter Bommarito also announced the appointment to the board of Antone L. Campos, director of URW District 2. He replaces Francis J. Quinn, retired director of the district.

First Under New Law:

majority needed for passage in the state senate.

The appropriations bill was scheduled to come up for reconsideration in the senate Jan. 29. Unless it is approved, the ALRB plans to lay off by Feb. 6 all but 25 of its 175 employes that administer and enforce the labor law.

Under the agreements with Interharvest and Meyers, wage minimums will increase from $3.10 an hour in two 12.5 cent steps, next year and in 1978. For irrigators, wages will increase from $3.15 an hour to $3.40, and for tractor operators from $3.925 to $4.175.

In addition, the piece rate for lettuce will increase from 50 to 51 cents and for tomatoes from 31.5 cents to 33.5 cents a box.

The UFW also reported that the employers have agreed to pay an additional 35 cents an hour for overtime work, contribute 16.5 cents an hour per worker into the UFW medical plan, increase pension contributions from 10 cents to 15 cents an hour, and improve safety and health standards on the job.

The bill to provide emergency funds for the ALRB has the support of Gov. Edmund G. Brown, the UFW and the California AFL-CIO, but is opposed by a coalition of Republicans and farm belt Democrats.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the state federation, warned in letters to all members of the state legislature that "to cripple the farm labor law by budgetary indirection would simply return California farm labor relations to chaos."

Henning said that opposition to the legislation stems from attempts of "agribusiness interests to gut" the new law by demanding that a string of anti-union amendments be tacked on to the funding bill.

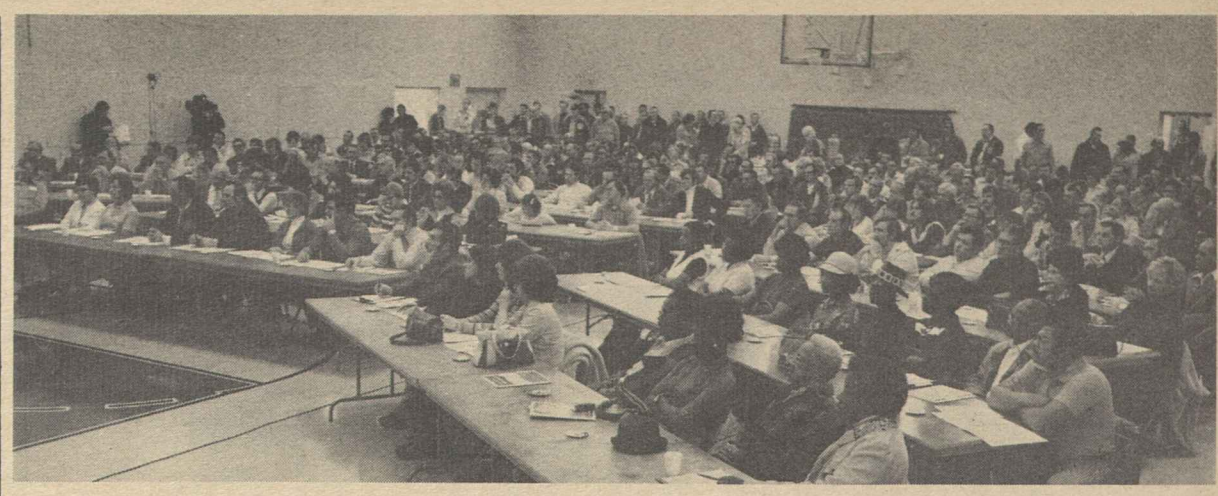
The ALRB went into operation Aug. 28 with an original budget of $1.3 million. That money was exhausted in the first two months and a $1.25 million loan from the state general fund is now nearly exhausted.

The additional appropriations were found necessary to handle the unexpectedly large number of elections, challenges and unfair labor practice complaints since the law went into effect.

Henning pointed out that the ALRB conducted more than 300 elections during its first 60 days of operations, compared with only 30 for the National Labor Relations Board during its first year of existence.

But because of the current lack of funds, the ALRB has already begun to cease many of its operations.

UFW President Cesar Chavez warned that the growers opposed to the supplemental funding are "bringing on themselves more strikes, boycotts and strife" by trying to strangle the labor law.



Chavez said that the law helped bring about stabilization of labor relations in the state's agricultural industry.

"The contracts are proof that the law is working," he pointed out, "and the legislature should move quickly to provide the board with the money it needs to bring peace and progress in the fields of California."

9-Cent COL Rise Due Steelworkers

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers announced that about 400,000 USWA members employed in the basic steel industry will receive a cost-of-living increase of 9 cents an hour Feb. 1. Another 36,300 USWA members in the container industry will get a comparable COL adjustment Feb. 15.

Earlier COL increases under USWA contracts with major basic steel and container companies totalled 83 cents since the 1974 agreements went into effect.

BARGAINING GOALS in this year's negotiations with General Electric and Westinghouse were discussed at 15 coast-to-coast rallies sponsored by the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE-W Unions. Some 4,000 delegates from the 13 CBC unions, representing 175,000 workers, turned out. These typical scenes are from Louisville, Ky., top, and Pittsfield, Mass., where Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, spoke. Negotiations with GE will open in late April and with Westinghouse two weeks later.

Usery Stresses Bargaining Role At Senate Confirmation Hearings

W. J. Usery, Jr., pledged to "support and defend the collective bargaining process," took a pragmatic approach to the issue of public employe strikes, and voiced skepticism about the usefulness of pay guidelines or jawboning.

After two hours of questioning, the Senate Labor Committee recommended by a 15-1 vote that the Senate confirm Usery as the nation's 15th Secretary of Labor and its third within a year.

During the confirmation hearings, Usery expressed personal and professional admiration for his predecessor, John T. Dunlop, who resigned after President Ford's veto of the construction site picketing and bargaining bill. Usery made clear that he shared Dunlop's support of the vetoed bill.

Nevada's conservative Republican senator, Paul Laxalt, an avowed enthusiast of "right-to-work" laws, cast the only vote against confirmation. Laxalt was particularly unhappy about a speech Usery had made in Utah to a state meeting of the Government Employees. Laxalt said it appeared that Usery thought government workers should have the right to strike.

To that and several similar questions, Usery reiterated that he has never "advocated" strikes by public workers but considers it essential to develop ways to resolve disputes without the need to strike.

Earlier, Usery told Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), that all workers must have "redress for their problems, hopefully without a strike."

As for the effectiveness of anti-strike laws, Usery noted that strikes have taken place despite such laws and it's hard to settle a strike when the leaders are in jail.

In another area, he said he thought farm workers should be covered by federal labor law "in some fashion" and that federal employes should be given bargaining rights by law instead of presidential executive order.

Under questioning by Laxalt, Usery said he is for repeal of the right-to-work Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act but he doesn't see it as an issue coming before Congress anytime soon.

Two liberal Republicans on the committee, Senators Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) and Richard S. Schweiker (Pa.), joined Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Randolph in praising Usery's record as director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, as a former assistant secretary of labor, and earlier as a Machinists' union representative on the Missile Sites Labor Commission.

At one point, after Usery appeared to be trying to avoid contradicting Laxalt, Javits cautioned him not to get "shackled" through an attempt to appease conservatives with commitments he might later regret. He noted that Laxalt's views on labor issues did not represent the majority views of Congress.

In his prepared statement to the committee, Usery promised that the Labor Dept. will "work in every possible way to stimulate job creation, to help relieve the hardships of those displaced from work, to help prepare those who seek employment and to help people find work."

He pledged diligent administration of the Pension Reform Act and workers' compensation programs. In reply to questions raised by Williams, Usery promised vigorous enforcement of the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law for federally-assisted construction.

Javits raised the question of whether Usery should continue as the President's special assistant on labor-management matters. In his statement, Usery said the President had asked him to coordinate his activities with the various mediation functions of government. But he will not be "involved in any way in the day-to-day operations" of the mediation service.

In response to questions, Usery expressed the hope that top-level labor-management-government cooperation could be revived in the construction industry.

He voiced "a deep and abiding faith" in economic democracy, declaring:

"I believe that it is essential to support and defend the collective bargaining process, recognizing the legal right of workers to withhold their labor, but at the same time working tirelessly to avoid conflict and to promote labor-management peace."

Congress Urged to End Tax Loophole on Bonds

The AFL-CIO urged the House Ways & Means Committee to eliminate the tax exemption on interest from state and local government bonds and to allow states and localities to issue taxable bonds with a federal interest rate subsidy.

In a statement filed with the committee, the federation pointed out that "for every dollar in interest cost saved by local communities as a result of the federal tax exemption, the Treasury loses approximately $1.50 in revenue."

It cited Treasury statistics showing that "88 percent of the tax exemption benefits received by individuals go to taxpayers with reported incomes of $50,000 a year or over—a group representing the wealthiest 1.2 percent of the nation's taxpayers."

"Since the Treasury loses more than the state and local governments gain, the tax-exempt privilege is a wasteful, back-door method of providing essential aid to state and local governments," the statement continued.

Making bonds taxable, the AFL-CIO said, "would substantially broaden the market for municipal bonds and thereby help financially pressed state and local governments. At the same time, such legislation would end one of the most glaring loopholes in the federal income tax structure.

"Such legislation must, however, include adequate and enforceable safeguards to assure that such subsidies will not be available on bonds issued by municipalities in order to provide investment funds for private corporations."

New Film Catalogue Issued by AFL-CIO

The AFL-CIO has issued a new edition of Films for Labor, the catalogue of 16mm sound films that can be rented from the Film Division of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

It includes a discussion of the use of films to "add a new dimension" to union programs and describes the federation's "film-a-month plan" as well as the procedure for single rentals.

The Films for Labor catalogue, Publication No. 22, can be purchased from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, NW, Washington, D.C. 20006. A single copy is 60 cents; bulk orders are $45 for 100.

Labor Presses Congress For Job-Creating Budget

CRITICAL RE-EXAMINATION of U.S. trade policies and administration of the 1974 Trade Act is needed to halt job losses caused by foreign imports, AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel told the Senate Finance Committee. Also presenting testimony were Ben Sharman, center, international affairs representative of the Machinists, and George Collins, assistant to President Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Job Losses Traced to Import Rise

America's industrial base and standard of living will continue to slip with the rising flood of imports unless Congress moves quickly to correct U.S. trade policies, union officials warned at congressional hearings.

AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel told the Senate Finance Committee that the Trade Act of 1974 has failed to halt the adverse impact of imports on the nation's economy and on U.S. jobs even with the favorable trade balance last year.

"The American economy is suffering damage from imports—actual and threatened—as other nations seek to export their recession here and erect barriers at home to protect their economies," Abel said.

At the same time, he noted, U.S. firms continue to export technology and operations abroad under co-production agreements to make goods to compete with U.S.-made products in American markets.

Abel, president of the Steelworkers, delivered the testimony at the committee's oversight hearings on U.S. trade policy and administration of the 1974 Trade Act as chairman of the Labor Policy Advisory Committee for Trade Negotiations. The committee also received testimony from President Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists and President Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Testifying on their behalf were Ben Sharman, IAM international affairs representative, and George Collins, assistant to the IUE president.

For those who take solace in the 1975 trade balance, Abel pointed out that the export-import figures do not take into account the jobs impact.

"Dollar trade statistics in themselves tell little about jobs," he said. "The number of workers seeking adjustment assistance from import injury reached 337,308 from April through December last year."

Yet, less than one-tenth of the workers that filed for assistance collected benefits even though 56,887 had been certified, Abel said. "Legal technicalities, inconsistent rulings, and varying interpretations of the law have held up certifications."

Even for those workers certified by the Labor Dept., additional determinations must be made by state employment services before they can collect benefits, he noted.

He charged that the Administration, U.S.-based multinational corporations and the media have

Ford Hit On Deficit Distortion

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to adopt a budget that will "put America back to work" instead of rubber-stamping the Ford Administration's recession-breeding spending ceilings.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed President Ford's proposed budget a "disaster" that would perpetuate high unemployment. He stressed that full employment "is the only way to balance the federal budget" and called on Congress to approve whatever level of spending is needed to get the economy moving.

Biemiller and AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger testified at House Budget Committee hearings—the first step in the complex procedure of rewriting the President's budget to congressional specifications. Tentative budget targets to be set by the committee will harden into firm spending ceilings during the fiscal year that begins next Oct. 1.

The AFL-CIO witnesses chided Congress for having gone along too often with Ford's "budget restraints" during the past year. Biemiller urged the committee not to be "so hypnotized or scared by the Ford rhetoric about the deficit that you fail to perceive the need for investing in the future of America."

He said the President's budget projection of slowly-declining unemployment that wouldn't drop below 5 percent until 1981 isn't good enough. In response to questions, Goldfinger said Congress should adopt policies aimed at bringing unemployment down to 3 percent within three years—a drop from the present 8 million jobless to 3 million.

The AFL-CIO testimony stressed

Employers Clip $65 Million:

Wage Law Cheating Climbs 19 Percent

The government reported a 19 percent increase in illegal underpayment of workers protected by federal wage and hour laws during the first half of fiscal year 1976, the period from July to December of last year.

Nearly $65.5 million in back wages was found due to 273,717 underpaid workers during the six-month period, compared to $55.1 million owed to 218,286 employes during the first half of fiscal 1975, the Labor Dept. said.

The findings were the result of investigations by compliance officers of the department's Wage & Hour Division.

Most of the chiseling by employers violated provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which sets minimum wage, overtime pay and child labor standards. A total of 148,568 workers were found to have been paid $22,741,111 less than required by the federal minimum wage, and 133,330 workers were owed $26,630,146 under the overtime provisions of the law.

"Two increases in the minimum wage since May 1, 1974, have had a significant impact on the growing number of violations," said Bernard E. DeLury, assistant secretary of labor for employment standards. "Because a third increase took effect Jan. 1, 1976, this trend is likely to continue."

Income restored to underpaid employes during the July to December period was up even more sharply than the number of underpayments, the government said. The $37.5 million restored to 211,517 workers compared to $27.9 million repaid to 173,520 workers in the same period a year earlier, an increase of 34 percent.

Reasons for the difference between amounts found due and amounts restored, the government said, are the refusal of employers to pay back wages in cases considered by the Labor Dept. to be unsuitable for litigation and a statute of limitations that limits recovery of back wages to two years prior to filing of a complaint against an employer.

Besides the FSLA, workers are

24.3 Million Living Below Poverty Line

A new report by the Census Bureau disclosed an increase of 1.3 million in the number of poor persons in the United States in 1974, the most recent year for which the government has compiled such statistics.

The increase in the number of persons classified as living in poverty—a 5.6 percent jump—reflected "the downturn in the economy and the substantial inflation" between 1973 and 1974, the Census Bureau said. It was the first increase in the number of poor in three years.

In a separate report, the bureau said that while median gross family income rose 7 percent between 1973 and 1974, it actually declined 4 percent when adjusted for the effects of inflation.

In the five years between 1969

Garment Union Pact Sets Industry Pattern

New York—A "landmark agreement," laying the groundwork for a possible future master contract on all women's and children's outerwear, was reached here between the Ladies' Garment Workers and the dressmaking industry.

The 40-month contract, negotiated shortly before a strike deadline, provides a 23 percent wage increase for hourly workers in four installments, establishes a new method of setting piece rates, and improves fringe benefits for some 55,000 workers in metropolitan New York and seven nearby states.

The agreement, which was scheduled for a ratification vote by ILGWU's Dressmakers' Joint Council as the AFL-CIO News went to press, involves the largest group of workers in the ladies' garment industry and is viewed by the union as a pattern for bargaining this spring in other apparel fields, including children's dresses, coats and suits and sportswear.

ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin, the union's chief negotiator in the talks, said he hopes to extend the new method of setting piece rates to the children's dress contract, which expires on Feb. 28, and to other

Fourth Quarter Gains Launch Profits Surge

Signs that a year of booming profits lies ahead for big business began to surface as a Wall Street Journal survey showed "a stronger-than-expected" turnabout in fourth-quarter 1975 earnings.

The Journal survey of 406 major corporations found profits during the October-to-December period rose 4.4 percent from a year earlier.

While the year-to-year increase in corporate profits appears relatively modest, the Journal said, the gain from the third quarter of 1975 was impressive.

"Overall fourth-quarter data won't be available for some time, but the Commerce Dept. estimates pretax earnings rose 49 percent from the third quarter, adjusted to exclude inventory profits," the Journal said. The government's official report on corporate earnings for the fourth quarter will not be released until next month.

The profits rise reported by the Journal is the only increase for any quarter last year. The first quarter of 1975 reflected a decline of 21 percent from the comparable 1974

Rubber Union Presents Goals To Big Four

Cincinnati—The Rubber Workers presented their bargaining goals to representatives of the Big Four tire companies at a meeting here, the first step in this year's negotiations on new contracts covering some 69,000 workers.

The goals, drawn up at a week-long meeting here, include an immediate "catch-up wage increase which would establish parity" between the rubber and auto industries.

URW President Peter Bommarito estimated that the immediate catch-up boost necessary to equal wages in the auto industry would amount to about $1.65 an hour for production workers and about $2 an hour for skilled tradesmen. He said cost-of-living increases for members of the Auto Workers later this year would make the difference that large.

"Immediate pay increases and future cost-of-living escalators are essential to our workers," Bommarito told newsmen. "If we do not get what we need, there is a very good possibility of a strike."

The URW policy committee, which drafted the goals, said the union also will seek a cost-of-living escalator clause. URW contracts currently do not contain such a provision.

Other objectives include additional wage boosts in the second and third years of a new agreement, if a multiyear contract is concluded. The union also will seek increased company contributions for pension benefits, sickness and accident leave, insurance and supplementary unemployment benefits.

Current three-year contracts with Goodyear, Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal expire Apr. 20. In addition, a three-year contract covering two plants of the General Tire & Rubber Co. in Akron expires May 15.

In 1973, when the contracts were previously negotiated, the union reached an agreement first with Goodyear, the largest of the four companies, and then Uniroyal, but had to strike Goodrich and Firestone before it was able to reach satisfactory settlements.

Across-the-table bargaining between the union and the Big Four is slated to start in March.

CONSUMER DELEGATES to the annual conference of Consumer Federation of America heard a keynote address by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), shown, left, as he was introduced by Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., a CFA vice president. Next to Clayman is CFA Executive Director Carol Foreman.

Senate Approves Funds For Day Care Centers

The Senate voted 65-24 approval of a labor-supported bill that would provide extra federal funds so that day care centers for children of low-income working parents can meet federal staffing standards.

The standards, required by a 1974 law, were issued by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare but have never been enforced because of the extra cost involved. Last year, Congress voted to postpone the effective date from Oct. 1, 1975, to Feb. 1, 1976, but the problem didn't go away.

Funds for child care services now come out of the same $2.5 billion a year that the federal government allocates to states for an assortment of social services under Title 20 of the Social Security Act. The states can use the money for whatever programs they choose—receiving 75 percent federal financing up to the limit of the allocation. Child care services under this program are provided by all states.

A House-passed bill would further delay imposition of the standards, giving states a last chance to bring their subsidized programs into compliance or cut back on child care services.

The Senate-passed bill would provide an additional $250 million-a-year subsidy that would be earmarked for achieving compliance with child care staffing standards. It would delay enforcement of the standards until June 30, but would provide $125 million in added funds for the balance of this fiscal year so that hiring of additional child care aides can begin promptly.

The entire funding provision has been a roadblock to a House-Senate conference agreement. The disagreement is linked to the congressional budget-ceiling procedures. While the Senate Budget Committee contends that the bill passed by the Senate falls within the budget allowances, the House Budget Committee maintains otherwise. As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the issue hadn't been resolved.

In the Senate, a key vote came on an attempt by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) to eliminate the staffing requirements.

The AFL-CIO expressed strong opposition to the Packwood amendment in a letter from Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller to all senators. He said it would be "a drastic and dangerous move backward."

The Packwood amendment, which had lost by only a 9-9 tie in the Senate Finance Committee, was soundly rejected, 54-37.

Under the Senate bill, co-sponsored by Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and Russell B. Long (D-La.), the added federal money would require only 20 percent matching from the states, instead of the usual 25 percent. It also includes a tax-credit provision that would encourage private day care centers to employ mothers who had been on welfare as aides to assist the professional staff. They could be included in meeting the adult-child standards.

Series on Police Wins Guild's Broun Award

Kent Pollock received the Newspaper Guild's 1975 Heywood Broun Award for a three-part series in the Philadelphia Inquirer documenting the spread of police brutality in the city.

The 35th Annual Broun Award, which includes a citation and a $1,000 prize, was announced at a luncheon of the Guild's executive board on the opening day of its winter meeting in Washington.

Pollock's entry was selected from a record 114 contest entries.

It was the second time in three years the award has gone to reporters for work published in the Philadelphia Inquirer. Donald L. Barlett and James B. Steele won the 1973 Broun Award for a series exposing uneven sentencing and discrimination by judges and prosecutors.

The judges said Pollock's work was selected "on the basis of Heywood Broun's traditional sympathy for the underdog—in this case the targets of Philadelphia police abuse—plus the reporter's initiative and his effort to correct a situation that was undermining people's confidence in the men who were supposed to protect them."

The judges, pointing to the "generally high quality" of entries in the contest for work published in 1975, said they "believe this reflected, in part at least, a trend among U.S. newspapers toward more in-depth reporting of critical social issues."

Judges were: George Beveridge, ombudsman for the Washington Star; Grant Dillman, United Press International vice president and manager of its Washington Bureau, and Ben Bagdikian, press critic and president of the Mellett Fund for a Free & Responsible Press. Thomas Lask, assistant cultural editor of the New York Times, was chairman of the 1975 award competition.

The Heywood Broun Award is made annually by the Guild for outstanding journalistic achievement in the spirit of Broun, the newspaper columnist who was the Guild's founding president.

Ford Position Attacked:

Consumer Assembly Pushes Agency Bill

Consumer leaders from across the country, at a meeting of the Consumer Federation of America, heard strong support for the proposed federal Agency for Consumer Advocacy from speaker after speaker—but not from Treasury Sec. William E. Simon, who appeared in behalf of President Ford.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said in a keynote address that creation of the agency is "the No. 1 priority for the nation's consumers."

Backing for the measure, now headed for a congressional conference committee, also was expressed by six candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination, former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, former Oklahoma Sen. Fred R. Harris, Arizona Rep. Morris K. Udall, Washington Sen. Henry M. Jackson, Texas Sen. Lloyd Bentsen and Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp.

The speakers appeared before CFA's annual Consumer Assembly. CFA is supported by the AFL-CIO.

Simon told the audience of 500 consumer leaders that Ford's proposals to make federal agencies more "responsive" through what he calls Consumer Representation Plans "are more meaningful than any new federal Agency for Consumer Advocacy." Ford has threatened to veto the bill to create the agency if it reaches his desk.

Another major speaker at the Consumer Assembly, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), strongly disagreed with the Administration's position.

"This legislation," he said, "strikes a good balance between the public's right to know about products or services which may endanger their health or safety or which may cause substantial economic injury, and the right of those complained against also to be heard.

"The voice and interests of consumers must be heard in fact, not just in theory."

Carol Foreman, executive director of Consumer Federation, which claims to represent about 30 million organized consumers, told the meeting that President Ford had for the second consecutive year turned down an invitation to appear at the assembly. Yet, she noted, he has found time to meet with representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and other industry leaders.

It may be that he thinks there's no money over here, or no votes," she said. "He's certainly right that there's no money. There may be no votes."

Speaking of the President's consumer platform, Simon said the Administration this year has three goals: to cut government spending, to reform the regulatory process, and to make the government more responsive to the consumer.

Humphrey declared that Americans are learning "a very bitter lesson" from the economic policies of the Nixon and Ford Administrations.

"By the end of this decade, recession alone will have cost our nation $1.5 trillion in goods never produced, services never provided, and income never found in anyone's paycheck," he said.

"More specifically, that represents a loss of over $7,000 for every man, woman and child in America today. A family of four will have lost, on the average, an incredible $28,000 in income—in buying power—as a result of this disastrous mismanagement."

Humphrey was introduced to the gathering by Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who is a vice president of CFA.

The meeting featured eight workshops designed to increase the effectiveness of consumer organizations and government consumer offices at the state and local levels.

On the final day of the three-day meeting, CFA presented a special award to Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) for his work on behalf of consumer rights during his tenure in the Senate. Hart is retiring this year.

At CFA's annual meeting following the assembly, Lee Richardson, former president of the Louisiana Consumers League, was elected president of the organization.

High Unemployment Grips 131 Job Centers

The Labor Dept. removed one major labor area from its list of job markets with "substantial" unemployment but added another to leave the number of such areas unchanged at 131 in January. In January 1975 the number was only 67.

South Bend, Ind., was taken off the list while the Davenport-Rock Island-Moline, Ill., area was added.

An area with substantial unemployment is one whose jobless rate is 6 percent or more, discounting seasonal factors, with the rate expected to continue for at least two more months at that level.

The number of such areas peaked at 135—out of a possible 150—last September after rising steadily for the previous 19 months.

The improved situation in South Bend was due mainly to increased employment in manufacturing industries, the Labor Dept. said. The shift of the Davenport-Rock Island-Moline area to the substantial unemployment category was largely caused by a significant employment drop in the primary metals industry.

Of the major job markets in the United States proper, Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich., has been on the substantial unemployment list longest—since June 1968. The area with the highest rate in the Labor Dept.'s latest survey was New Bedford, Mass., with 14.2 percent joblessness.

In addition to the larger labor areas, there were 1,046 smaller job centers classified as areas of substantial or persistent unemployment in January.

Under federal law, firms located in areas on the substantial unemployment list may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts, provided they agree to hire 25 percent of the new hires each month from among the disadvantaged residents of the area.

California Agency Stranded:

Farm Law Periled By Lack of Funds

Sacramento, Calif.—The state's Agricultural Labor Relations Board was virtually put out of business by the failure of the state legislature to provide the necessary funds to continue its operations for the rest of the fiscal year.

Leaders of a state senate fight to reconsider an emergency $3.8 million appropriations bill to carry the agency through the remainder of the current fiscal year gave up the battle when it became apparent there were not enough votes for passage.

Earlier the bill failed to get the necessary two-thirds vote required to clear the senate. A coalition of Republicans and farm-belt Democrats had opposed the measure, which had the support of Gov. Edmund G. Brown, the United Farm Workers and the California AFL-CIO.

The ALRB had indicated that unless the appropriations bill was passed it would have to lay off all but 25 of its 175 employes that administer the state's model farm labor law.

If no other way is found to fund the agency, state legislators here indicated the board might have to shut down until the new fiscal year begins on July 1.

Prior to the vote on the funding bill, John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the state AFL-CIO, warned that "to cripple the farm labor law by budgetary indirection would simply return California farm labor relations to chaos."

He charged that agribusiness interests were attempting to "gut" the new law by demanding that a string of anti-union amendments be tacked on to the funding bill.

In existence less than six months, the ALRB already has ceased many of its operations because of the slowdown of its cash flow.

UFW President Cesar Chavez warned growers that they are "bringing on themselves more strikes and boycotts and strife" by trying to "strangle" the historic farm labor law. The law, which went into effect last Aug. 28, spelled out the rights of California's 250,000 agricultural workers to bargain collectively through a union of their choice.

Since the law took effect, a tally by the ALRB shows that the UFW has won 55 percent of the more than 300 representation elections that have been held. The Teamsters have won 34 percent and other unions 5 percent. In the rest of the elections, workers chose no union.

State Sen. David A. Roberti, a Democrat from Los Angeles who led the fight for the emergency appropriations measure, said the real issue in the legislative battle over the funds was that "the growers and the Teamsters don't like the victories" being won by the Farm Workers.

Many staff workers for the ALRB have volunteered to continue to supervise secret-ballot representation elections without pay, but the agency's deputy general counsel, Jerrold Schaefer, said that legal problems such as employer insurance made it "unlikely that we could have volunteer employes conducting elections of the board."

FARM WORKERS RALLY outside the California state capitol in Sacramento in support of a $3.8 million emergency appropriation to finance the operations of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board for the remainder of current fiscal year. The legislation fell several votes short of the two-thirds majority needed for senate passage.

Dystrophy Group Re-Elects Unionists

New York—AFL-CIO President George Meany and several other labor officials were re-elected to leadership positions in the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

Re-elected corporate members of the association at the MDA's annual meeting were Meany, President Hal C. Davis of the Musicians, President James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks, President William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters, President Frederick O'Neal of the Actors & Artistes, President James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers, and Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to Meany.

Donahue, McClennan and O'Neal were also re-elected to the board of directors, and President Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America and President Frank E. Fitzsimmons of the Teamsters were re-elected vice presidents.

Senate Confirms Usery Nomination

The Senate voted 79-7 to confirm W. J. Usery, Jr., as Secretary of Labor, filling the vacancy left by the resignation of John T. Dunlop.

A hard-core of conservative Republicans voted against Usery's nomination, contending that he was "biased toward labor" because he declared his opposition to "right-to-work" laws and had endorsed the construction site picketing bill that President Ford vetoed.

Usery has been director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and earlier had been an assistant secretary of labor. He was a Machinists' representative before entering the government in 1969.

Court Ruling Compels Election Law Changes

Several versions of corrective legislation on federal election law were introduced as Congress began working against a 30-day clock set for it by the Supreme Court.

Congress was given that much time to restructure the enforcement procedure under a Jan. 30 Supreme Court decision that basically upheld the 1974 federal election reform law but struck down major provisions regarding its enforcement machinery, the Federal Election Commission.

The court ruled election spending is a form of "speech" protected by the First Amendment, and it ruled on ways such "speech" may and may not be curbed:

- The law's various limits on contributions—$1,000 per person per year in a presidential election, $5,000 per group in each election and no more than $100 in cash—were upheld, but limits on how much candidates may spend on their own behalf were struck down.

- Disclosure requirements under the 1974 law were upheld. It provides, for instance, that while an individual may give $1,000, donors of more than $100 must be identified in campaign reports.

- The use of federal funds in presidential elections was upheld, and when such funds are used, then overall spending limits are allowed.

But a presidential candidate could spend an unlimited amount of his own money if he rejected Treasury funds. For the 1976 presidential primaries, the overall limits remain in place for any candidate already receiving federal funds.

- Limits on expenditures "on behalf" of a candidate were struck down as a violation of free expression. Thus an individual could spend an unlimited amount to promote a candidate as long as there is no conferring with the candidate on how it's spent.

In all, the Supreme Court's decision ran 100 pages, with at least six justices supporting each major finding. But five dissenting opinions were also issued. The newest justice, John Paul Stevens, was not a member when oral arguments were heard in November and did not participate in the decision.

The need to restructure or revamp the Federal Election Commission stemmed from the court's decision that it is unconstitutional for the executive function of enforcement to be exercised by the FEC, since four of its six members were named by Congress.

Stouffer Quits Food Service At Labor Dept.

A week-long sitdown strike by newly organized food service workers at the Labor Dept. cafeteria ended with an agreement by Stouffer, Inc. to terminate its contract with the government prematurely and turn over cafeteria operations to another contractor.

Stouffer, which had operated the cafeteria under a contract with the General Services Administration since the new Labor Dept. building opened last year, will pull out Feb. 28.

Assistant Labor Sec. Fred G. Clark said that Stouffer has agreed to waive the normal 90-day period required on contract termination notices by agreeing to a 30-day phase-out.

Clark said that top officials of the Labor Dept. entered the discussions to help resolve the dispute after Stouffer refused to recognize Local 25 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees as the bargaining representative for the striking cafeteria workers.

Ronald Richardson, executive secretary-treasurer of the local, said the union has been assured the striking cafeteria workers would be hired by the new contractor.

He said the local would continue to pay them strike benefits until they are rehired, adding that benefits would also be increased from the current $50 a week.

Richardson praised the cooperation of members of the Government Employees working in the Labor Dept. building who have honored the boycott of the Stouffer cafeteria.

Garment Pact Sets Pattern For Industry

outerwear contracts that expire on June 1.

Chaikin said that under the new dressmakers' agreement a standard yield for pieceworkers has been set at about 25 percent above the guaranteed craft minimum. In addition, the piece rates will be set in each individual factory with worker participation, instead of by the present neutral piece-rate settlement bureau.

Chaikin also said the dress settlement had set the stage for a common termination date on May 31, 1979, for other contracts in the women's outerwear industry.

The settlement provides wage increases for hourly rated employes of 5 percent as of Feb. 2, another 5 percent on June 1, a 7 percent boost on June 6, 1977, and a 6 percent increase on June 5, 1978. The contract also includes a cost-of-living escalator clause.

Employer contributions for workers' pensions were increased from 5 to 6 percent of payroll while welfare fund contributions go up one-quarter of 1 percent now and another one-quarter of 1 percent in 20 months.

Workers also will receive an additional paid holiday, bringing the total number to 10 a year. In addition, the agreement provides improved procedures for contract enforcement.

Five major employer groups were involved in the negotiations, which opened last November. About half the workers covered by the settlement are employed in New York. The rest are in New Jersey, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Delaware, and Maryland.

Total of U.S. Poor Up By 1.3 Million in Year and 1974, the Bureau added, median family income increased only 1.2 percent — from $12,690 to $12,840—in terms of 1974 purchasing power.

The report on the poor showed that in 1974 there were 24.3 million Americans—12 percent of the nation's total population—below the poverty level. The poverty threshold for an urban family of four was $5,038 in 1974.

The threshold, which rose to $5,050 in 1975, is updated by the government each year to reflect changes in the annual average of the consumer price index.

Whites below the poverty level increased by 1.1 million, or 8 percent, between 1973 and 1974, the government said. The number of blacks in this category did not change significantly, it said.

"About 9 percent of white persons and 31 percent of black persons were below the poverty level in 1974," the Census Bureau said.

Of the 24.3 million Americans living in poverty in 1974, about 19.4 million were family members. The rest were unrelated individuals —persons living alone or with nonrelatives.

From 1969 to 1974, the Census Bureau noted, the number of poor fluctuated so that it was not significantly different at the end of that period.

"The majority of the poor in 1974 were still either black, of Spanish origin, elderly or in families headed by women," the bureau said.

The poverty rate in 1974 for families headed by women was 33 percent, compared to 6 percent for those headed by men.

The survey indicated that between 1973 and 1974 there was a 7 percent increase in the number of poor persons under 65 years of age, while the number of such persons 65 years and over did not change significantly.

About 2.6 million persons of Spanish origin—about 23 percent of their total—were below the low-income level in 1974, the government reported.

CONVENTIONS

The California AFL-CIO convention will be held Sept. 20-24, 1976, in Sacramento.

The Mississippi AFL-CIO convention will be held March 22-24, 1976, in Jackson.

The Florida AFL-CIO convention will be held Sept. 20-23, 1976, in Orlando.

The Missouri AFL-CIO convention will be held Sept. 19-22, 1976, in Kansas City.

A Disastrous Budget

THE ADMINISTRATION BUDGET endorses, extends and reinforces the policies of the past seven years—the very policies which brought this nation two back-to-back recessions, the highest interest rates since the Civil War, and the highest levels of unemployment since the Great Depression.

These policies have turned back the clock on social progress. They have played havoc with the budgets of the states and localities, generated immeasurable human hardship, and badly undermined confidence in the economy and government.

In short, these policies have failed miserably. The American people deserve better, not another dose of the medicine that made the economy sick.

The nation's economy needs leadership and programs to help create jobs. This committee must reject the President's disastrous blueprint for America and pave the way for congressional programs and funds adequate to the task.

The Administration forecasts an official unemployment rate for this calendar year of 7.7 percent and next year the forecast is 6.9 percent. Our economists view these forecasts as optimistic fantasy. Even the Administration's "projections" through 1981—that it claims are "consistent" with the budget restraints proposed—call for continuing trouble for American workers. Unemployment, according to the Administration's projections, would not drop below 5 percent of the labor force until some time in 1981.

For the first nine months of 1976, the President says: "Stand still." Starting Oct. 1, he says: "Retreat."

We do not subscribe to either proposition. We believe the Congress has already tolerated too much of the President's stand-stillism. We believe the Congress must countermand the "retreat" order and, instead, start America marching forward again.

THE ECONOMY remains weak, vulnerable and badly in need of continued and sustained economic stimulation. Anything less could topple it. The President's budget contains no such measures.

His budget is political game-playing. Between now and Sept. 30, 1976, he calls for a "don't rock the boat" approach. But starting Oct. 1, 1976—the beginning of the new fiscal year—his budget proposes cuts in programs and in the real level of federal spending.

The spending lid of $394.2 billion proposed by the Administration represents a dollar increase of 5.5 percent over fiscal 1976 levels. Yet, such an increase is less than the Administration's own forecasts of price boosts. Therefore, the real level of expenditures is less than current year levels.

In fact, the President's spending ceiling amounts to a $26 to $29 billion cutback in funds needed just to maintain current services, according to Joint Economic Committee and Congressional Budget Office staff estimates. And, most of the cuts are concentrated in programs related to education, employment, health and income security.

In terms of broad federal fiscal policy measures needed to pull the economy out of its present mess, the President's budget is a disaster.

A Word Edgewise:

Kissinger's Diplomatic Notions Based More on Faith than Fact

By John P. Roche

NO SANE AMERICAN can oppose efforts to achieve symmetrical strategic arms limitation with the Soviet Union (SALT), but where some of us differ strongly with Sec. of State Henry Kissinger is over his confusion of hard-boiled negotiations to avert nuclear war with detente. We are convinced, for example, that in the past Kissinger has made concessions on SALT in the full expectation that the Soviets would behave, or get their clients to behave, in Indochina, the Middle East and now Angola.

Indeed, if you go back and look at the original SALT negotiations and then at the hit-and-run session at Vladivostok, you discover an interesting pattern. When we have signed or initialed the agreements, we have issued unilateral statements underscoring our expectations about Soviet behavior. The Soviets have not publicly commented on their view of our expectations (though Brezhnev has probably regaled the Politburo with his reaction to this quaint American custom). They have simply made it clear they accept Kissinger's freedom of speech.

Thus arose the great dispute over Moscow's "cheating" on SALT. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that Moscow has been moving heaven and earth to attain nuclear superiority, but when you get out the original SALT documents you find contrived ambiguities. Then you realize that they have been "cheating" in terms of Kissinger's unilateral explanation of what these ambiguities really meant. Since Brezhnev did not repudiate these footnotes at the time, the presumption was made by Kissinger that silence indicated consent.

This novel diplomatic notion would have been treated with scorn by Professor Kissinger in a Harvard seminar, but only a few small-minded nay-sayers like "Scoop" Jackson, James Schlesinger and Paul Nitze have objected as the Chairman has peddled this absurdity around Washington.

Curiously, Kissinger allowed the Palestine Liberation Organization to be bootlegged into the United Nation's Security Council on precisely this gambit. Ambassador Pat Moynihan was instructed to treat the PLO's presence at the Middle East session as "procedural" (not subject to veto) on the grounds that the council can invite anybody in to make a speech. This is good law, but then Soviet spokesman Jacob Malik announced that, in the view of the USSR and others, the PLO was going to participate in the Security Council discussion. In other words, the USSR treated the PLO role as "substantive"—and got away with it. Our silence did constitute consent.

But Brezhnev simply plays by different rules, and we have nobody to blame but ourselves for our problems. As the old saying goes, "The first time you get taken for a ride, blame the other guy; the second time, kick yourself." Since Lenin's day the Communists have rejected Kissinger's beloved concept of "linkage," and there is no reason to believe that his persuasive charm is going to alter the character of the Politburo, particularly when those veteran ideological gangsters think they have a winner. I would love to see the KGB's "psychiatric profile" of Chairman Kissinger, a character who, no matter how many times you kick him, comes back for more. (When Kissinger announced in Moscow that Angola was on the detente agenda, Brezhnev quipped that the Secretary was free to discuss the question with his State Dept. aide, Helmut Sonnenfeld!)

"LINKAGE" JUST isn't on and never has been. Bolshevik theory makes a sharp distinction between formal state relations and subversive activities. I think it was the early Soviet Foreign Commissar Chicherin who observed wryly that one of a Bolshevik ambassador's tasks was to measure bourgeois leaders for Communist nooses.

Thus it was predictable that Brezhnev flatly refused to discuss Angola with Kissinger. Why should he? "Peaceful coexistence" (as Moscow calls detente) always had a provision excluding "wars of liberation" from the sunshine of mutual cooperation! They are simply barred from the detente agenda.

In short, by unilaterally ending the Cold War we have set ourselves up for some nasty shocks—the fall of Indochina, the Yom Kippur War, and the ongoing "liberation" of Angola by those Communist Gurkhas, the Cubans. Isn't it time the spell was broken and we came out of our trance? The Cold War, anyone?

Abel Testifies:

Job Losses Under Trade Act Bear Out Labor's Warnings

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel, chairman of the federation's Economic Policy Committee, before the Senate Finance Committee on administration of the 1974 Trade Act.

ORGANIZED LABOR did not support the 1974 Trade Act because we felt that in its form and in its administration, the trade problems that face America would not be resolved. We take no satisfaction from the fact, in our view, that we have been proven correct. We believe that the law is laden with shortcomings and fails to deal with major economic problems. Moreover, we believe also that the Administration has not carried out the spirit or the letter of the law in its implementation.

Organized labor deeply fears that the erosion of our nation's industrial base and the lowering of this nation's standard of living has not been halted or reversed since enactment of the Trade Act. As a consequence of the Trade Act, this erosion is likely to become more acute.

The American economy is suffering damage from imports—actual and threatened—as other nations seek to export their recessions here and erect barriers at home to protect their economies. U.S. firms are continuing to export their technology and operations abroad to serve their foreign markets and, in many instances, to produce for this market.

We find the Administration, U.S. multinational corporations and the nation's media showing little alarm about these problems. Instead, great solace is taken from reports that America's trade balance in 1975 had improved, that exports were greater than imports. However, the important export-import figures missing from these reports is the net gain or loss in jobs for the United States in its trade transactions.

U.S. export data showed considerable income from grain shipments and raw materials, both areas with few jobs and few well-paying positions. American exports also showed shipments of production machinery and the newest industrial technology to every corner of the globe, producing one-shot export jobs but exporting U.S. long-range jobs as foreign manufacturing facilities are set in place and overwhelm or displace U.S. products.

Dollar trade statistics in themselves tell little about jobs. The numbers of workers seeking adjustment assistance from import injury reached 337,308 from April through December last year. Moreover, the President's Economic Report tells us that last year's export-surplus is expected to decline all through 1976.

The statement of purposes of the 1974 Trade Act called for full employment, economic growth, fair trade, help for those injured by imports and new rules of international trade. The provisions Congress wrote into the law to carry out those purposes were aimed, we were told, at meeting the problems of the "new ball game" in international economics and politics. But, we see very little, if any, evidence of fair play or a new "ball game."

Organized labor is concerned about the massive prenegotiations concessions made by the Administration in reducing tariffs to zero on imports of 2,700 products which went into effect Jan. 1. These are imports from more than 100 nations and territories including such countries as Romania and Brazil, Mexico and Chile. Multinational corporation producers abroad will now intensify their exports to the U.S. from the lowest wage areas to wipe out more U.S. producers and American jobs. These losses will be felt by Americans at every skill and income level, every race, creed and color.

Organized labor is concerned over the administration of provisions to relieve unfair import injury. Under Title II, "swift and certain" retaliation against unfair trade practices is authorized. But the record of action to meet unfair dumping of foreign products or action to meet unfair subsidies of foreign nations has been disappointing.

The Treasury Dept. reports that only two out of 21 cases, finally decided last year, resulted in the application of countervailing duties by the United States to counter unfair subsidies. Treasury statistics do not include the many petitions, such as on steel subsidized by the European Economic Community, where the Treasury Dept. has decided not to investigate.

THE TRADE ACT promised "adjustment assistance" for American workers if they were injured or threatened by injury from imports. Obviously workers would prefer their jobs, but even this aid has not been forthcoming for most workers who petitioned for assistance.

From April through December 1975, petitions covering 337,308 workers were sent to the Labor Dept. Reports of positive findings of injury to groups of workers have been issued covering an estimated 56,887. Some of those 56,887 have collected adjustment assistance.

But more than the 337,308 workers who petitioned had their jobs displaced by import injury last year. And less than a tenth of the total number reported has collected anything at all up to this time. Legal technicalities, inconsistent rulings, and varying interpretations of the law have held up certifications in some cases.

Even after certification, the state employment services, already besieged by other unemployed workers, are required to make additional determinations before one dollar can be paid to U.S. workers whose jobs are lost as a result of import-injury. The belief that 56,887 certified workers have received adjustment assistance is therefore not correct.

Shanker Hits Ford Budget:

Teacher Strikes Fight Efforts To Cut Back School Standards

LOCAL SCHOOL BOARDS have forced a record number of strikes in the current school year as teachers try to hold hard-won gains that mean both better working conditions for them and better learning conditions for their students, President Albert Shanker of the Teachers said.

School managements are "acting as if they have just discovered that there is such a thing as collective bargaining," Shanker said, and instead of negotiating the issue of "whether the teacher will get a little more or a little less," they are demanding that long-standing contract items be rolled back or dropped.

"They want to increase class size; they want to take away holidays; they want to take away vacations; they want to take away sabbatical leaves; they want to take arbitration clauses from grievance procedures," Shanker asserted in an interview on Labor News Conference.

Shanker scored the shortsightedness of public officials in trying to find short-cut answers to their financial problems by cutting back on essential public services, including deep slashes in the education of children. He said that the budget President Ford sent to Congress, as it deals with the nation's educational system, appears to give the schools more help while actually giving them less.

The Ford budget, he charged, combines "sorcery, deceit and mirrors" to make it look like he is "doing something for us while really doing something to us."

Shanker said the labor movement in cities where strikes have occurred has supported the teachers' efforts to win fair and adequate contracts. He said the political, financial and moral support of local labor communities has also been the key to heading off or ending mass arrests, heavy fines and other harassments of striking teachers in a number of areas.

"MYTH: People get rich on welfare.

"Fact: Not one state grants welfare payments equal to the federal government's poverty threshold—which is unreasonably low anyway."

That's a sample of the kind of statements contained in a new study on the poor and hungry in the United States.

The study is called "Poverty Profile: 1975." It is subtitled: "Poverty in America—The statistics and the people who make up the poor in the world's most affluent nation."

It is not a political document. The study provides hard-fact arguments against the figure-juggling of the economic advisers of the Ford Administration.

"Poverty Profile" is the work of the Campaign for Human Development of the U.S. Catholic Conference. Its authors are Marilellen Procopio and Frederick J. Perella, Jr., education staff members of the campaign.

The government's most recent poverty threshold for a non-farm family of four was an annual income of $5,050. This breaks down to $1,262 per person a year. That allows $3.46 per person per day on which to "live." One-third of the budget is supposed to go for food. That amounts to $1.15 per person per day for food.

The study notes that the only diet possible at that figure, just barely, is the Agriculture Dept.'s "Thrift Food Plan"—"which is not considered by government officials or private health officials to be adequately nutritious for daily consumption."

Because of the terribly restrictive regulations, the study states, "welfare is a form of self-enforcing poverty. With it you cannot escape poverty; without it you cannot even live."

According to the government's figures, there were 24.3 million "poor" Americans in 1974. The study states that even a conservative estimate would show there are actually about 40 million poor.

THE STUDY TAKES an objective look at various government programs that are suposed to help the poor and concludes: "The general attitude of the federal government today toward all social welfare and development programs is one of laissez-faire and cutting back on spending." Certainly, there has been mismanagement and waste and it's convenient to blame the computers.

"But," says the study, "behind the machines are the people who devised the payment schedules and program in the first place."

And, for the many who did not qualify but got government checks anyway, there are "thousands of eligible people who did qualify (and) have been underpaid or completely forgotten, to a total of almost $36 million."

The study concludes: "Public assistance programs need drastic revision; a national health plan is mandatory; general unemployment at current rates cannot be tolerated."

"Society," says the study, "has not manifested a willingness to commit itself to reach out to the oppressed—neither in the government or private sectors—and the entire country is weaker for it."

For example: "If a realistic minimum wage were paid, some 39 percent of 40 million poor Americans—those living in 'working poor' families—would be lifted out of poverty."

For example: The "white poor" make up 56 percent of all poor Americans—about 13.7 million people, most of whom live in major metropolitan areas.

That knocks down one of the great myths about the poor that "most blacks are poor (69 percent are not poor by government standards)."

Those Americans who are worried about poverty in our "rich" nation ought to study "Poverty Profile" carefully and act upon the facts. It is available from the U.S. Catholic Conference, 1312 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

RECORD NUMBERS of school strikes were forced this year by school boards demanding deep slashes in union-won working conditions for teachers and learning conditions for students, President Albert Shanker, center, of the Teachers charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning Shanker were Donald Barnes, left, of Press Associates Inc. and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Votes on Funds Veto, Jobs Bill

The House supported labor's position on a Jan. 27 veto override, and on two key votes Jan. 29 on an unrelated public works bill.

Column 1 is the 310-113 vote to override President Ford's veto of appropriations for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Labor Dept., thus avoiding cutbacks in major social and health programs. Right votes (R) to override were cast by 261 Democrats and 49 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 21 Democrats and 92 Republicans.

Column 2 shows the 268-133 rejection of an attempt to drop anti-recession grants to cities and states from the public works jobs bill. Right votes against the amendment were cast by 224 Democrats and 44 Republicans. Voting wrong were 47 Democrats and 86 Republicans.

Column 3 is the 321-80 passage of the public works jobs bill, which is designed to employ about 600,000 persons in useful jobs. Voting right were 259 Democrats and 62 Republicans. Wrong votes against passage were cast by 13 Democrats and 67 Republicans.

Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—Absent and not paired. Numerals show districts; AL—at-large.

Despite Improvements Last Year:

State Social Insurance Laws Still Short of Federal Goals

States enacted a variety of laws affecting organized labor in 1975, but still fell far short of desirable standards, particularly in the area of social insurance.

The Labor Dept., in a series of articles in its Monthly Labor Review, notes for instance that in the area of workers' compensation "some states made substantial progress toward meeting federal standards, particularly in coverage, benefits and program administration, but none has fully complied as yet."

Close to 300 workers' compensation amendments were enacted last year by 49 state legislatures, the magazine reports. These changes followed 200 amendments enacted in 1974.

James R. O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, observed that 500 changes in the law in two years should have provided the nation's workforce with a decent workers' compensation system.

"However, big numbers do not always produce big results," O'Brien noted. "The large number of amendments actually reveals how much needs to be done to improve this program."

The various state legislatures also focused on other legislation, including minimum wage laws, bargaining for public employes, consumer protection and attempts to restrict labor.

The legislation ranged from California's new farm labor law to Colorado's uniform arbitration statute. The Labor Dept. reports there were nearly 900 labor laws enacted having to do with wages, equal employment opportunities for women and girls, and bargaining rights for public employes.

"Thirty-two of forty-five jurisdictions enacting labor legislation passed one or more of the wage laws: minimum wage, wage payment and wage collection, prevailing wages, wage garnishment or wage assignment," the government reports.

Other highlights of the Labor Dept. survey:

- With the enactment of a minimum wage law by Virginia, 43 states now provide such coverage. Seventeen states made amendments to keep pace with the federal Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) or made other substantive changes generally to strengthen minimum wage protection in 1975.
- As joblessness increased sharply in 1975, many states improved or extended unemployment insurance benefits as emergency federal legislation was enacted.

Delaware, Louisiana and North Dakota, for example, brought to 12 the number of states providing maximum benefits equal to two-thirds of statewide average weekly wages.

Three other states adopted a maximum benefit tied to the statewide average weekly wage, and four others increased the percentage used to yield a higher maximum weekly benefit.

- Among the 16 states concerning themselves with safeguards under wage payment and wage collection laws, two—Iowa and North Carolina—enacted laws for the first time. Some passed several important amendments to protect benefits of laid-off workers. Illinois, for example, approved measures to provide medical benefits, and Maine strengthened its severance pay provisions.
- Nine states amended their prevailing wage laws, which generally prescribe procedures for wage determinations on public projects.
- Seventeen of the 20 state laws on labor relations dealt with the collective bargaining rights of public employes. Seven of the laws were extensions of coverage for the first time to workers in state or local jobs or in specific occupations.
- Twenty states enacted laws dealing with occupational safety and over half made some type of amendment for improvements in the general safety law.
- Efforts continued to get the necessary number of states to ratify the proposed federal Equal Rights Amendment. North Dakota became the 34th state to join the list, ratifying the measure in 1975. Four more states must approve the amendment for it to become law.
- North Dakota enacted an effective no-fault auto insurance law in 1975, bringing the total number of states with such legislation to 16.
- At least 12 states passed laws concerning the practices of private employment agencies. Among the significant actions was the Montana law which, for the first time, fixes maximum agency fees for both temporary and permanent placements.

In the area of workers' compensation, progress was made in a number of states toward the goal of coverage for every employed person. The Labor Dept. points out in its survey that only three states—New Jersey, South Carolina and Texas—now permit coverage to be elective rather than compulsory. Colorado and Louisiana provided for mandatory coverage in 1975.

All state employes were extended workers' compensation coverage in Nevada and West Virginia. In Alabama and Illinois, coverage was extended to all but specified exceptions.

Yet, as the AFL-CIO's O'Brien notes, despite these extensions in coverage and other changes, not a single state today complies with all of the essential recommendations of the 1972 report of the National Commission on State Workers' Compensation Laws, which found the states lagging far behind proposed federal standards.

O'Brien points out, for example, that 41 states still deny coverage to farm workers; all 50 states deny coverage to domestic and casual workers, and 35 states have a maximum weekly benefit level below that recommended as adequate by the commission.

The AFL-CIO is seeking a benefit level equal to two-thirds of an individual's weekly pay up to a maximum of 200 percent of the state weekly wage.

In the area of unemployment insurance, 46 states increased their maximum weekly benefit amounts in 1975. Most of the changes resulted from legislation enacted in prior years that provided for the automatic adjustment of the weekly benefit amount to keep pace with average wages.

However, only three additional states took action last year to provide a maximum weekly benefit equal to two-thirds of the state average weekly wage. O'Brien notes that the number of states that now meet this benefit standard—recommended by every recent administration since Eisenhower's—is 12.

"If this level of progress continues," he observes, "we will be in the next century before all the states meet the benefit standard recommended as adequate as early as 1950."

The AFL-CIO's position on unemployment compensation benefits is that the level should equal two-thirds of an individual's weekly pay, up to 75 percent of the statewide average weekly wage.

Many states found it necessary to take steps in 1975 to improve the solvency of their state funds. These steps included raising the taxable wage base or increasing tax rates.

A number of states in financial difficulty had to borrow from the federal government to continue paying benefits throughout the year.

On the minus side, O'Brien points out, many states attempted to offset higher benefit payments and the need for improved financing by widening their disqualification procedures.

"In the absence of minimum federal standards, organized labor at the state level will have to contend with the persistent efforts of the opponents of unemployment insurance to undermine the system by manipulating the eligibility, qualifying and duration requirements of state laws to deprive workers of adequate benefits," he said.

JOSEPH POLLACK

Pollack New President Of Insurance Workers

The executive board of the Insurance Workers elected Joseph Pollack to succeed William A. Gillen as president.

Gillen, who had held the post since 1965, resigned to accept a position as an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

Pollack, 58, an IWIU vice president since 1961, is a former Prudential Insurance Co. agent who entered the industry after World War II. Selected to head the New York City local's program during a nationwide strike against Prudential in 1951, Pollack became president of the local a year later.

As an international vice president, he administered the union's contract with Prudential and headed IWIU bargaining committees in negotiations with the firm.

The board deferred filling the vice presidential vacancy created by Pollack's elevation, pending a referendum on a constitutional amendment to permit a reduction in the number of vice presidents from four to three. The referendum will be conducted in March.

Gillen, 57, joined the labor movement as a John Hancock insurance agent in 1948, rising through the ranks to become president of his local union in 1954.

The following year, he headed a successful slate of candidates for international office in the old CIO union, the Insurance Workers of America.

He was re-elected in 1957. Two years later, when the Insurance Workers of America merged with the former AFL's Insurance Agents International Union, Gillen became secretary-treasurer of the new Insurance Workers International Union of the AFL-CIO.

He served as secretary-treasurer of the IWIU until 1965 when he was elected president of the union. He was re-elected in 1967, 1969, 1971 and 1973.

Gillen is a vice president of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees, a member of the Industrial Union Dept.'s executive board, and a member of the federation's standing Committee on Organization.

Senate Override Vote On Labor-HEW Funds

The Senate on Jan. 28 voted 70-24 to override President Ford's veto of appropriations for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Labor Dept. The AFL-CIO had urged Congress to overturn the veto in order to prevent cutbacks in important social and health programs.

protected by the Equal Pay Act, which requires equal pay for men and women doing substantially the same work in the same establishment, and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, which protects workers between the ages of 40 and 65 from job discrimination based on age.

Violations of the Equal Pay Act cheated 14,131 workers out of some $11.5 million in the last half of 1975, the government said. This compared with underpayments of $14.9 million owed 15,258 workers a year earlier.

Compliance officers found a total of 1,113 workers were due $4.6 million as a result of violations of the age discrimination statute during the July-December period compared with 950 due $2.4 million in the year-earlier period.

To Bar Windfall Profits:

Compromise Sought On Gas Regulation

Congress moved closer to some form of deregulation of natural gas prices, with the inevitable cost increase to consumers depending on the final shape of the legislation.

A key 230-184 procedural vote enabled supporters of decontrol to shortcut the usual legislative procedure and act on a price deregulation bill that still was being considered in committee. The AFL-CIO opposed this move, but it carried with 175 Republicans and 102 Democrats voting for the rule while only 9 Republicans joined 178 Democrats in opposition.

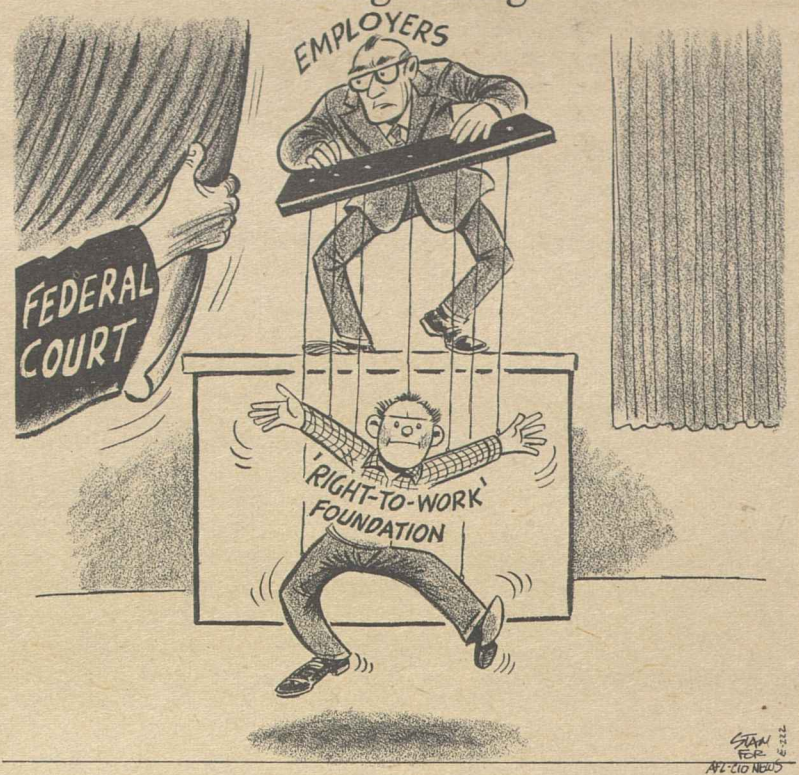
As the AFL-CIO News went to press, opponents of abrupt decontrol were trying to work out a compromise to meet some of the problems of the smaller gas producers without handing the big oil and gas companies windfall profits through unneeded price boosts that would be passed on to consumers.

The House bill then must be reconciled in conference with legislation the Senate passed last October, which would end price restrictions on natural gas from new onshore wells this April — a time when demand normally slackens and there would be less price pressure. It would hold off deregulation of offshore natural gas until 1981.

Both the House and Senate bills would continue price regulation of existing natural gas production—where an industry-oriented Federal Power Commission has already granted substantial price increases that have boosted consumer and industrial costs.

The Senate bill would have the effect of shifting most of the immediate cost increase of deregulation to industrial users through a requirement that the price-controlled "old" gas be earmarked for residential and small-user customers.

That would put the price increase burden largely on industry, although the cost rises would be reflected in prices of finished goods.



Both the House and Senate bills began as emergency measures to avert threatened natural gas shortages this winter that might force plants to close down and result in layoffs of workers. To avoid this risk, the original legislation would have let pipeline companies facing critical shortages buy gas at the higher, unregulated price that producers can charge for natural gas that is not sold across state lines.

In fact, as AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller noted in a letter to House members, recent studies have shown "that initial predictions by the Federal Power Commission and the Federal Energy Administration significantly overstated the severity and impact of natural gas shortages. Yet, proponents of still higher energy prices for the consumer have used unproven, overblown predictions of numerous plant shutdowns and resultant unemployment in their attempts to use this legislation as a vehicle for total deregulation."

Biemiller warned that "deregulation will cost consumers billions of dollars and most certainly undermine the now precarious health of our national economy."

Consumer groups have accused the big producers of having deliberately created shortages by holding back on output in expectation of bigger profits under deregulation, and diverting supplies into the unregulated interstate markets.

Pulling Strings

Labor Asks Congress To Tie Budget to Jobs

that the big budget deficits of recent years were the result of the nation's economic problems, not the cause of them. "If the economy were fully employed, there would be no deficit at all."

As for the contention that inflation is "the overriding economic evil" and was the result of government spending and deficits, Biemiller retorted:

"The inflation of recent years was not caused by deficits. The inflation of recent years was the result of galloping price increases for food, fuel and interest rates—all of which could have been controlled by the Administration, and weren't."

Biemiller pointed out that in terms of buying power, Ford's proposed budget is less than this fiscal year's level of spending. "And most of the cuts are concentrated in programs related to education, employment, health and income security."

He termed the Administration's proposed income tax cut, coupled as it is with reduced federal spending, "politically motivated" with its most damaging impact coming after the presidential election next November.

While the development of programs is the task of the legislative committees of Congress, Biemiller urged the Budget Committee to provide the resources for:

- Accelerated public works to create jobs through grants to local governments for needed construction and repairs.
- An expanded public service employment program.
- Extension of the individual income tax cuts.
- A fully-implemented government housing program "so that homebuilding can once again help to lead the national economy out of a recession."
- Federal aid to state and local governments hard hit by high unemployment.
- Federal funds for restoration of railroad tracks and roadbeds.
- Basic improvements in the unemployment insurance system.
- Federal health insurance, with universal coverage.
- A comprehensive energy independence policy.
- Creation of a new agency to provide loan guarantees and low-interest loans for preservation and creation of jobs in both the private and public sectors.
- Closing major loopholes in the tax structure.

To achieve full employment within three years, Biemiller said, "America must create some 70,000 jobs each and every week." He asked Congress to accept any temporary deficit that may be needed to achieve this as "an investment that will put America back to work and ultimately wipe out the deficit completely."

Labor Presses Toxic Material Controls Bill

The AFL-CIO called for enactment of the Toxic Substances Control Act "without any weakening amendments," declaring that the need for such legislation "grows with each passing day."

In a letter to members of the Senate Commerce Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller expressed organized labor's particular concern over "the alarming and growing incidence of occupationally-induced illnesses in America's workplaces. We can already discern the grim outlines of potential national health disaster among working people and their families."

The proposed legislation would give the Environmental Protection Agency the power to require testing of new and existing substances used in industrial processes. If EPA found the substances posed unreasonable risks to workers, it could order their production halted or limited, or require appropriate labeling warning of their danger.

Biemiller cited the kepone scandal as demonstrating the "tragic lack, among affected federal agencies, of data gathering, testing and coordinated exchanges of information with respect to health effects on workers." He said the control bill "would go far toward preventing such situations from arising in the future."

Biemiller pointed out that of some 13,000 materials identified as toxic, only three are covered by health standards issued by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

He scored the "familiar litany by the chemical giants that this legislation will cause exorbitant outlays of money for compliance," a charge that Biemiller said has been proved exaggerated by the Environmental Protection Agency and the General Accounting Office.

"These management claims only continue to illustrate that it regards dollars as more important than the well-being of workers and the protection of the environment," he concluded.

Job Losses, Erosion of Industry, Traced to Rising Flood of Imports

shown little concern for the problems caused by the U.S. trade policies. And, he noted, there is little evidence that the stated purposes of the trade act—full employment, economic growth, fair trade and aid for those injured by imports—are within reach.

A prime concern of organized labor is over the concessions granted by the Ford Administration to 100 countries in ending tariffs on 2,700 imported products.

"Multinational corporation producers abroad will now intensify their exports to the U.S. from the lowest wage areas to wipe out more U.S. producers and American jobs," Abel warned. "These losses will be felt by Americans at every skill and income level."

Jennings noted in his statement to the committee that IUE members are now being laid off in Bridgeport, Conn., because flashlights are coming into the country from Hong Kong under the "zero tariff" code.

Although the zero tariff provision is designed to help developing countries, Jennings said, "experience warns us that the multinational companies will rush to these areas to gain the combined advantage of low wages plus duty free entry into the United States."

Jennings said that sections of the act designed to protect the jobs of the electronic and electrical workers have yet to be invoked.

Smith charged that past failures to negotiate trade policies on a reciprocal basis had left the United States in a weak bargaining position. He said future multilateral discussions should reflect the concerns and interests of workers, since "they are the ones who will suffer the most if unwise decisions are made."

Smith urged that safeguards in the act should be fully implemented to protect job opportunities and industrial capability, particularly during periods of severe economic recession and high unemployment.

Abel pointed out that 29 percent of the nation's industrial capacity is idle and that one of every 10 workers was unemployed last year.

Although labor is aware that the trade act cannot be rewritten immediately to provide adequate protection for American industry and workers, Abel said U.S. firms could be discouraged from expanding production overseas through new tax legislation.

U.S.-based multinationals operating in foreign countries should be required to pay their fair share of U.S. taxes, he stressed, and called for provisions that would encourage plant expansion at home.

In parallel testimony before the House Subcommittee on International Economic Policy, the Clothing Workers cited the relationship between the drop in U.S. production of men's and boys' apparel and the increase in foreign imports.

The ACWA noted that cutbacks in domestic production have forced the closing of numerous U.S. plants and layoffs of thousands of workers since 1968. In 1975 alone, 103 plants were closed at a cost of 4,200 jobs.

ACWA Vice Presidents Howard D. Samuel and Harry Goldsmith urged Congress to devise a new approach to regulating trade so that U.S. workers can continue to produce for American markets.

"We only ask the opportunity to compete on a fair basis with merchandise produced overseas by workers who do not share in the success of their labors as American workers do," the ACWA stressed.

Woodworker's Editor Wayne Scott Retires

Portland, Ore.—Wayne A. Scott, editor of the Woodworker for the past 13 years, retired Dec. 31 because of poor health. Scott had been unable to continue full-time duties with the Woodworkers since a heart attack in September.

Dick Spohn, assistant coordinator of the union's research and education department, has been named acting editor of the semi-monthly newspaper.

4th Quarter Gains Launch Profits Surge

period as the economy was deep in the nation's most severe recession since World War II.

Pushing up fourth-quarter profits were high worker productivity, slower rises in labor costs and higher industrial production. Joblessness continues to run high, however, as corporations are reluctant to take back laid-off workers until they are more certain of the economic recovery, the Journal observed.

Meanwhile, the current quarter is showing every sign of continuing the earnings rebound, and "it will look especially good when measured against last year's disastrous results," the Journal said.

It quoted James L. Pate, assistant secretary of commerce, as estimating first-quarter 1976 profits will rise 60 percent above the year-earlier level. He predicts an increase for all of 1976 of about 30 percent.

In the Journal's survey, the auto industry turned in a solid performance compared with its poor showing a year ago. Nine auto and equipment companies showed an increase of 18.4 percent from year to year.

House Acts to Double Jobs In Public Service Program

Social Security, Medicare:

Ford Plan Burdens Low-Paid, Elderly

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to reject President Ford's proposal to raise the social security tax rate and his plan to make older Americans pay higher hospital and doctor bills.

Labor's counter-proposals were outlined by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman at hearings held by two subcommittees of the House Ways & Means Committee. Their thrust was that needed program improvements can be made without saddling lower-paid workers and the elderly with heavy additional costs.

Financing

The social security system's need for additional revenue can and should be met without putting the biggest burden on low- and middle-income workers, the AFL-CIO contended.

That's where the cost would fall under President Ford's proposal for a three-tenths of 1 percent rise in the payroll tax rate, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said.

He urged Congress, instead, to hold the tax rate at its present level but increase the wage base —the maximum annual earnings subject to the tax.

To bring the taxable wage base up to the original concept of the Social Security Act would require raising the ceiling to $28,000 a year. Seidman urged that this be done by steps over the next several years.

Raising the wage base would mean that only the highest paid workers would pay more in taxes, for which they would receive higher retirement benefits in the future.

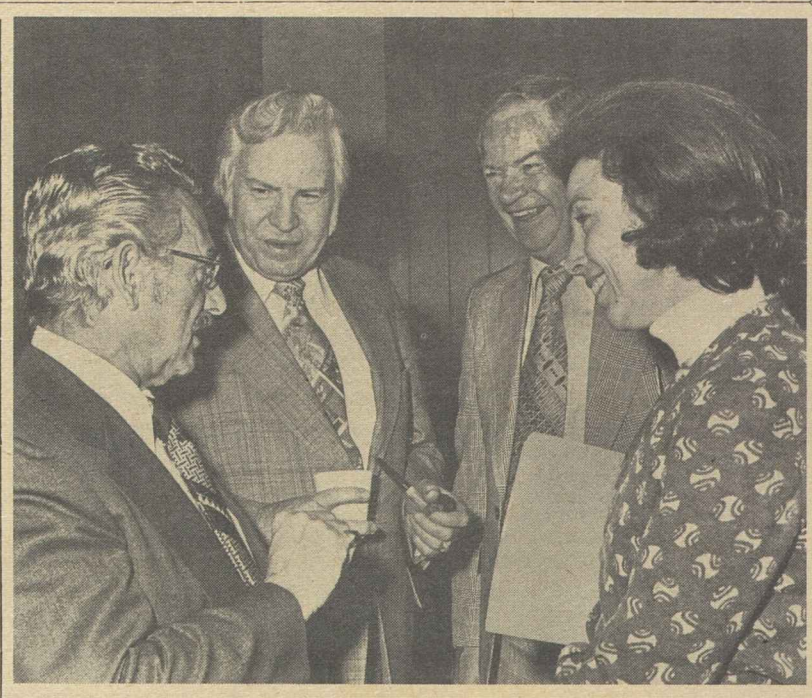
Medicare

President Ford invited Congress "to join with me in making improvements in programs serving the elderly," but the AFL-CIO made clear that it doesn't consider the President's Medicare proposals any "improvement."



Quite the contrary, Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified. "Under the guise of providing a new catastrophic health program for Medicare beneficiaries," Ford is seeking "major cutbacks in the existing program."

Seidman termed the President's proposals "a political maneuver" that would result in a "serious barrier to health care for the elderly."

He cautioned that older persons are less likely to seek early treatment of ailments if they have to pay the higher deductibles and co-insurance costs the President wants to impose. The result in many cases would be even greater costs later.

The elderly and disabled "do need protection against catastrophic costs," he said, but this should

NEW HOUSING REHABILITATION agreement between seven building trades unions and the National Housing Rehabilitation Association, could lead to the creation of thousands of new jobs. Appearing at the signing of the agreement with Carpenters President William Sidell, left, were two Cabinet members, W. J. Usery, Jr., sworn in this week as Secretary of Labor, and Carla A. Hills, Secretary of Housing & Urban Development. Behind Mrs. Hills is Charles T. Muntain, assistant to the HUD secretary for labor affairs. (Story, page 3.)

President's Phase-Out Rejected

The House voted 239-154 to expand the public service employment program instead of going along with President Ford's plan to phase it out.

It sent to the Senate a labor-supported bill that would finance up to 600,000 jobs by mid-year —nearly double the 320,000 public service jobs now funded by the federal government.

With unemployment still "at an intolerable level," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote House members before the vote, the jobs program is needed to enable unemployed workers "to become taxpayers instead of welfare recipients."

The House majority was undeterred by Administration optimism that the dip in the official unemployment rate last month showed that further job-creating measures aren't needed.

The bill's floor manager, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), reminded his colleagues, "We have to face the jobless men and women in our congressional districts."

He couldn't share the President's "exultation" in a 7.8 percent jobless rate and more than 7 million unemployed.

Public service employment is the most effective way to make a dent in unemployment, Daniels contended. "It helps people and it helps the community."

There was virtually no support for Ford's phase-out program, and House Republicans sought merely to substitute a continuation of the existing program to fund jobs with local and state governments.

Optimistic Claims Refuted:

'True' Jobless Rate Put at 10.6 Percent

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment in the United States last month was closer to 10.6 percent than the 7.8 percent officially reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the AFL-CIO declared.

While the government's report on jobs in January did show a modest improvement in overall employment, particularly in the non-farm sector of the economy, "a careful study of the full report indicates no justification for claims that there was a dramatic drop in unemployment," AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger said.

Several critical factors were not considered in arriving at the 7.8 percent rate, Goldfinger noted. For instance, he said, the report does not include the one million jobless persons who have become so discouraged they have stopped looking for work.

"Neither does it include the partial unemployment of part-time workers who want and need full-time work."

The number of persons forced to work part-time because full-time jobs were not available rose by 240,000 in January to 3.5 million, after having remained at about 3.3 million since last July, BLS reported.

When these and other factors are included, then "a more realistic measure of unemployment in January would be 10.6 percent," Goldfinger said.

He pointed out that there was increased unemployment among teenagers during the month, and new seasonal adjustment calculations, applied by BLS for the first time

U.S. Standards Pressed On Job-Injury Benefits

Strong federal legislation is the surest way U.S. workers can be compensated adequately and equitably for on-the-job injuries and illness because the states have failed to meet that obligation, the AFL-CIO told a Labor subcommittee of the House.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified that a bill introduced by Representatives Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) and Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) would be a key step toward setting minimum federal standards for workers' compensation benefits.

But Biemiller urged that certain sections of the Daniels-Perkins measure be strengthened to provide protections American workers have long needed.

Congress has ignored workers' compensation far too long, Biemiller stressed. "The result of this lack of federal leadership has led to the development of a haphazard, inadequate and inequitable system of social insurance to compensate the victims of work injury and disease."

The states were given three years by a federal commission to improve their workers' compensation programs, he noted. But when the deadline came last July, not one state had enacted legislation to comply with all the 19 basic recommendations of the commission.

Vote on Natural Gas Bars Total Decontrol

In a dramatic reversal, the House backed away from total deregulation of natural gas prices and adopted a labor-supported compromise that would cushion the impact on consumers.

It passed by a 205-201 vote that was not decided until the final seconds of the electronic rollcall a substitute proposed by Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa) for the total decontrol plan introduced by Rep. Robert C. Krueger (D-Tex.).

The Smith compromise would lift price controls from the smaller natural gas producers. But it would continue controls on the very largest producers and also regulate for the first time the prices they can charge for gas that does not cross state lines.

At the start of the three-day debate, it appeared that a decontrol bill at least as strong as the Senate passed last fall would be approved by the House. A 230-184 procedural vote that allowed a deregulation bill to be considered was regarded as a test of House sentiment.

'Bye for Now!'

Union Protests Heeded On Service Contracts

The Labor Dept. has dropped three proposed rules changes under the Service Contract Act which organized labor had charged would seriously undermine the law's worker safeguards.

When the changes were first proposed in April 1975, the AFL-CIO and several unions told Congress the new standards would have the effect of undercutting the intent of the law.

Passed in 1965 and amended in 1972, the Service Contract Act is designed to protect employes of companies providing services to the government much as the prevailing wage provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act protect workers on government-financed construction.

The Labor Dept.'s 1975 proposals, the unions said, would have paved the way for price-cutting in government service contracts by non-union providers.

Of the five new standards proposed, the Labor Dept. dropped the three most obnoxious outright and softened the remaining two—both involving deadlines on bids—enough to remove the danger of undermining wage structures.

The proposals which the Labor Dept. abandoned included:

● A change in the rules for "successor contracts," requiring that the previous wage standards be maintained "only where substantially the same service will be provided at the same place." The unions had said this would have meant that the lowest possible wage scale would automatically become the "prevailing" wage.

● Allowing employers with a collective bargaining contract to bid "solely on the basis of that agreement," opening the way for contractors paying the lowest possible scale.

● Imposing an early step in the bidding that would give low-wage contractors a competitive advantage. This "two-step" bidding procedure would have allowed the area with the lowest wages to become the standard against which all contractors would have to bid.

The two provisions which the Labor Dept. did promulgate both involve a "rule of 10 days," but both were changed enough since 1975 to remove union objections.

One set a timetable of notification on new wage rates so far in advance of the granting of the contract that subsequent wage increases would not be reflected in the life of the contract. That 10-day rule was changed from the time bids are asked to the date bids are awarded, thus reflecting wage gains won in the interim.

The other 10-day rule involved appeals to the Labor Dept. on whether wage standards are being met. That deadline is now dropped and the procedure is similar to the one used in Davis-Bacon.

This removed the objection of union representatives who had said that, as originally proposed, the new rule would force them to appeal everything to make sure they were protecting wage rates.

When organized labor first objected to the proposals in 1975, it was pointed out that the Labor Dept.'s own attorneys had advised that the new rules would violate the clear intent of Congress in the 1972 amendments.

Despite those objections, the new rules were still pushed by the Nixon-Ford Administration's Office of Management & Budget and by several agencies which regularly award such service contracts, including Defense and NASA.

Opposing the proposed changes, besides the AFL-CIO, were the Laborers, Service Employees, Transport Workers, Teamsters, National Maritime Union, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Teachers Win Pact to End Newark Strike

Newark, N.J. — The Newark Teachers Union ratified a new two and one-half year contract by a nearly unanimous vote, ending its week-long strike for higher wages and improved school conditions.

Meanwhile, federal mediators met with both sides in the month-long dispute involving two teachers' unions and the government of the U.S. Virgin Islands in an effort to resolve the impasse. The teachers have been on strike since Jan. 8.

In Newark, the 4,000 members of Teachers Local 481 returned to their jobs after agreeing to a contract that would pay a new teacher with a bachelor's degree $9,741 starting July 1. Under the old pact, teachers started at $9,460.

The minimum salary will rise to $10,131 on July 1, 1977. Top scale will rise from $15,140 under the old contract to $15,929 on July 1 and to $16,901 next year.

Among other provisions, the settlement calls for implementation of a labor-history curriculum in September, keeps class size at 30 pupils, and makes salaries payable over 12 months rather than 10 months as in the old pact.

In Computerized Checkout System:

Labor-Consumer Coalition Fights Move to Hide Prices

A battle is shaping up between the food industry and the combined forces of the labor and consumer movements over the industry's adoption of a Universal Product Code and computerized checkout system that would obscure the price of individual items in a supermarket.

Computerized checkstands are already proliferating in the nation's supermarkets, Walter L. Davis, special assistant to the president of the Retail Clerks, observes in an article in the American Federationist.

"Neither the consumer nor labor movements opposes the electronic checkout," Davis notes in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine. "What they do oppose is taking the prices off the packages and that's what the legislative struggle in both the states and Congress will be about in coming months."

The Universal Product Code—a small symbol of black-and-white lines on an individual food item—is already on some 60 to 65 percent of all products in the average supermarket, Davis points out.

The lines on the symbol, which may be as small as 1.5 square inches, are able to generate 10 trillion individual, distinct, machine-readable numbers. When a grocery-store checker pulls a UPC-marked product across a computerized scanner, the symbol is translated in a milli-second into a product price and flashed onto the register.

The big supermarket chains claim there is less waiting time at the checkout counter because of the speed of the automated scanner and computer. They also claim fewer errors in price ringups, and point to the advantage of a detailed sales receipt. Other industry claims for the system are savings to the consumer because of lower labor costs and ease in cashing checks.

But these claims are disputed by the Retail Clerks and a wide range of other organizations.

As to the claim of less waiting time at the checkout counter, Davis comments: "It's possible, but it's more probable that some supermarkets will substantially reduce the number of checkout lanes when switching to the new system, thus forcing the food shopper to wait just as long as before."

Fewer errors in price ringups depend upon an accurate feed of price information to the computer, and there's no guarantee against such price changes being made with promptness.

Similarly the industry claims that the sales receipt available under the new system will contain minute detail of everything purchased. But, Davis observes, a survey by the Retail Clerks of some of the nation's supermarkets where the new system is in effect found that the receipt was not available in all systems, and where it was the brand name, size and quantity of the product were not included, leaving the consumer little of real value for budgeting or consumer shopping.

But the removal of prices from individual items is potentially the most harmful element of the new checkout system—and the prime cause of consumer concern, Davis stresses. Price marking is essential to comparison shopping for one thing, he contends, and price changes can be made with impunity unless there is mandatory price marking legislation.

"There's also no guarantee that the supermarkets can faithfully see to it that the price tag is accurate," Davis notes. "The industry as a whole has a notoriously poor reputation for its ability to maintain shelf prices properly."

Removing prices from packages will be particularly hard on the elderly, the National Council of Senior Citizens points out. Other groups opposing removal of prices are the NAACP, the Consumer Federation of America and the National Consumers Congress. The AFL-CIO adopted a resolution strongly endorsing mandatory price marking at its 1975 convention.

Already, four states—California, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island—have passed mandatory price marking legislation and the Consumer Federation of America expects that at least nine other major industrial states will pass similar legislation by the end of this summer.

"Hopes are high in many other states, where the issue is relatively new and virtually no stores with computerized checkstands have surfaced," Davis observes.

RCIA President James T. Housewright says labor is working hard to get mandatory price marking legislation passed at all levels of government. He told a Senate subcommittee considering such legislation his union supports it because "our people are union members and consumers. We have a very serious obligation to represent them on both counts."

Tom McBride Dies at 61, Longtime Labor Editor

Tom Moore McBride, an editor of Daily Labor Report for the Bureau of National Affairs, died of a brain tumor at Washington Hospital Center Feb. 7. He was 61.

Before joining BNA, McBride for a number of years had been editor of the State, County & Municipal Employees' publication, the Public Employee. Earlier, he worked for other union publications and was an information officer with the Labor Dept.

Wage-Price Council Scored on Plan To Spur Commercial Blood Banks

The AFL-CIO took sharp issue with the Ford Administration's Council on Wage & Price Stability over its recommendation for more commercialization in the collection and distribution of human blood.

The council's recommendation came in response to proposed Food & Drug Administration regulations that would require labels distinguishing between blood donated by volunteers and blood provided by paid donors. The council said it generally approved the labeling but called for competitiveness between the voluntary and commercial systems.

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Community Services, suggested that the council was giving "aid and comfort to the commercial blood interests—thereby frustrating recent efforts by the federal establishment, including the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, to develop a national, rational voluntary blood system."

The council, headed by Treasury Sec. Wililam E. Simon, is responsible for keeping track of inflationary pressures in the economy and for assessing the inflationary impact of proposed government actions.

While acknowledging the higher incidence of serum hepatitis associated with the use of commercial blood from paid donors, the council contended that increased commercialism might alleviate shortages of blood and blood products.

"The council offers an opinion that our public policies toward blood would be improved substantially if it were recognized that blood is a product that is not very different from other consumer goods," the agency noted in a statement.

In a letter to Simon, Perlis asked, "Does the council mean such consumer goods as hearts, kidneys and corneas? Or does the council mean such consumer goods as yachts, limousines and summer places?

"Aside from the fact that blood is human tissue and not just another 'consumer product,' how hard-boiled, hard-headed and hard-nosed must one become to achieve distinction in our bureaucracy?"

Besides distinguishing between the source of the blood, the new FDA regulations would require labels warning that blood from paid individuals is associated with a higher risk of hepatitis than blood from volunteers.

In submitting the AFL-CIO's comments on the proposed FDA rules, Perlis noted that the federation's Executive Council adopted a resolution in 1971 calling for a system of mandatory labeling of blood as either "low risk" or "high risk," depending on whether its source was voluntary or commercial.

"We see no reasons—five years later—why proposals should be altered," Perlis said. "Of course, labeling would not be necessary if the selling of blood by paid donors were abolished and an all-voluntary, nonprofit system were substituted.

"Until such a non-commercial system is achieved, every commercial unit of blood should be marked 'dangerous.' "

SEIU's Largest Local Elects John J. Sweeney

New York—John J. Sweeney has been elected president of Service Employees Local 32B to succeed Arthur L. Harckham who retired. Harckham headed the local for the past four years.

Sweeney has been secretary-treasurer of the 45,000-member local, the largest in the SEIU, since 1973. Earlier, he served as contract director and executive assistant to the president of the local.

To Rehabilitate Cities:

7 Craft Unions Sign Housing Agreement

Seven AFL-CIO building and construction trades unions have entered into an agreement with the National Housing Rehabilitation Association that could lead to the creation of thousands of new jobs and boost housing in many of the nation's urban centers this year.

The agreement, which provides that all work will be carried out under terms set by local collective bargaining, was announced at the headquarters of the Carpenters where a signing ceremony took place Feb. 5.

A statement of principles issued by the parties makes clear that the agreement applies to residential rehabilitation projects intended primarily for occupancy by families with low and moderate incomes.

The pact specifies that "there will be provided additional employment opportunities for the signatory labor organizations, and an increasing number of employment opportunities for minorities."

The agreement stipulates that, because of the economics involved in residential rehabilitation, jurisdictional rules and work practices which otherwise would apply to commercial construction will be eliminated and that efforts will be made to develop an appropriate schedule of wage rates.

"In return, every effort will be made by management toward the limitation of costs and, likewise, profits shall be kept at a reasonable level."

Unions involved in the agreement are the Carpenters, the Laborers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Painters, Bricklayers, Cement Masons and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The members of the National Housing Rehabilitation Association constitute the bulk of the major builders and developers of rehabilitated housing in the United States.

Carpenters President William Sidell, presiding at the signing ceremony, deplored the low quality of workmanship in much of the remodeling and rehabilitation work currently being performed.

"There is too much shabby housing in this country and too much unskilled labor trying to keep it together," he said.

Primary goals of the agreement are to provide decent housing at reasonable cost for all Americans, restore deteriorating housing, and utilize and preserve the present housing inventory along with the national investment in streets, sewer systems, transportation systems, schools and public safety systems, and municipal governmental systems.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., welcomed the plan and praised the role organized labor will play in the rehabilitation work.

"The implementation of this agreement will insure that construction in this part of the industry is of high quality, that rehabilitation work is done properly, and that the consumer and the government both receive fair value," he said.

W. J. Usery, Jr., the newly confirmed Secretary of Labor, attended the signing of the agreement and hailed the housing rehabilitation plan for its potential in creating needed jobs in the construction industry.

Carla A. Hills, Secretary of Housing & Urban Development, who strongly supported the plan, noted that "in this era of very scarce resources it is important that we use all the housing stock we have."

Mrs. Hills said she hoped the plan would help to revitalize the nation's inner cities. She pointed out that much of the housing now covered by HUD rental subsidies will serve as a focal point for the rehabilitation work.

CLOTHING WORKERS Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman and Vice President Howard Samuel announce the union's resumption of its nationwide boycott of imported men's and boys' clothing. Sheinkman, left at head of table, told a Washington news conference imports have cost the ACWA nearly 60,000 jobs since 1969.

Clothing Workers Renew Drive To Curb Job-Destroying Imports

The Clothing Workers, frustrated by the continuing flood of imported men's and boys' clothing into the United States, has resumed its campaign to persuade American consumers to shun the foreign-made apparel.

The union charged at a Washington news conference that imports from low-wage countries have cost its members nearly 60,000 jobs over the past five years.

"The Trade Act of 1974 is not an answer to the problems of our workers," ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman told newsmen. "It is not resulting in an orderly flow of trade, as it was supposed to do. We're finding major disruptions."

Under the 1974 Trade Act, workers laid off due to increased imports may petition the Labor Dept. for "adjustment assistance." Such aid may include cash benefits, training, testing, counseling, job placement, job search grants and relocation allowances.

While the ACWA has sought relief under the law's provisions, the benefits — when granted — have been of little help to its members thrown out of work in a high cost-of-living economy, Sheinkman said.

He cited figures showing that imports of suits jumped almost 70 percent in the first 10 months of 1975 over the same period of 1974. Sport coat imports were up 4.5 percent, trousers 37.7 percent, and shirts 7.1 percent over the same period. And these increases have occurred, he observed, "despite the recession and reduced consumption of apparel products."

ACWA's consumer campaign similar to the one it mounted in 1974, will amount to a "massive coast-to-coast campaign to call attention to the fact that workers are being laid off because of imports," Sheinkman said. Workers and community leaders in a number of major U.S. cities will picket major stores selling imported clothing. The appeal will be directed to union members and consumers generally to buy men's and boys' apparel with an ACWA label and to avoid imports, particularly from Korea, the largest producer of men's clothing imported into the United States.

The campaign will include a major consumer educational program of newspaper, ads, marches, rallies and union meetings, Sheinkman said.

He also reported that the union is considering ways to make the Amalgamated label more visible to identify U.S.-made clothing, possibly by attaching it to a tag or ticket on the outside of the garment.

ACWA Vice President Howard D. Samuel, in charge of the campaign, told newsmen that employment in men's tailored clothes—suits and coats—is down 45,000 from about 120,000 since 1969, largely due to imports.

In the shirt industry, about 10,000 ACWA members have lost their jobs due to imports since 1969, he said.

Both Sheinkman and Samuel were highly critical of the government's foreign trade policy. They said international agreements providing for quotas on imports of some 150 different categories of soft goods "need to be looked at and the ceilings lowered."

"The ceilings have been established at such high levels that in many cases they are of no value as restraints," they said.

"What is needed is for our negotiators to go back to the bargaining table with our trading partners, particularly Taiwan, Korea and Hong Kong, and let them know that in a number of cases the agreements are not fulfilling the function they were supposed to fulfill—to avoid disruption and unemployment in the U.S. textile-apparel industry."

Sheinkman said that of 37,000 workers in the ACWA seeking adjustment assistance benefits under the 1974 Trade Act last October, 13,000 workers in 46 plants were certified for benefits. Another 8,000 in 47 plants were denied aid, while the applications of the rest have not yet been decided.

Sheinkman said that the ACWA had gone into the "adjustment assistance arena" on a "very reluctant basis" because it felt it had to take every step to help its members. "But now we know for sure that this is not the answer to rising imports of clothing," he said.

He charged that in a number of the denials of benefits, the Labor Dept.'s investigation was inadequate. And when benefits are granted, he said, they "usually amount to a few hundred dollars . . . and represent no major help to people without jobs."

Teachers in N.Y. State Vote to End NEA Tie

Albany, N.Y.—Members of the New York State United Teachers have voted overwhelmingly in favor of disaffiliation from the National Education Association.

Officials of the NYSUT hailed the outcome of the membership poll as a reaffirmation of the 217,000-member organization's commitment to teacher unity in the state. About 72 percent of the ballots cast in the poll approved the disaffiliation action recommended by the NYSUT board of directors.

The vote tabulation conducted by the American Arbitration Association showed 72,317 favoring disaffiliation and 28,572 opposed. More than 101,000 ballots were tabulated.

The NYSUT was formed over the opposition of the NEA national leadership in 1972 with the merger of the AFL-CIO affiliated United Federation of Teachers and the NEA's New York State Teachers Association.

NYSUT President Thomas Y. Hobart, Jr., said that the better than 2½-to-1 margin of support for the board's position came despite a $1 million media campaign by the NEA aimed at blocking the action.

Official action on the recommendation to withdraw from the NEA will be taken by the NYSUT representative assembly, the organization's highest governing body, when it meets in March.

Hobart said the "wishes of the membership are now very clear" with 72 percent of the voting members rejecting the costly NEA campaign and supporting the board. Hobart was president of the state NEA affiliate before the marger.

Since the 1972 merger, a widening policy dispute has severely strained relations between the NEA and the NYSUT. The New York State unity group has charged that although its members pay more than $5 million in dues annually to the NEA, the national organization not only has failed to support the state group, but has even subverted its programs.

In a recent newsletter, Hobart accused the NEA of escalating its attacks "into a full-scale war" by opening a separate organizing campaign in New York State "whether the NYSUT likes it or not."

Because of the widening conflicts, Hobart said that NEA President John Ryor threatened to expel the NYSUT within the next five years.

Michigan Labor Assails Plan to 'Steal' Ohio Jobs

Lansing, Mich. — The Michigan AFL-CIO has assailed a campaign by the state's Dept. of Commerce to have Ohio firms relocate their plants in Michigan to take advantage of tax breaks without regard to the impact this would have on the jobs of Ohio workers.

In a letter to state officials and legislative leaders, Michigan AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall expressed "vigorous opposition against the stealing of jobs under the banner of expansion."

"We greatly resent the use of our tax money in this type of blatant and callous attempt to get employers to shun their responsibilities in one state and move to another where their tax burdens will be forgiven," Marshall declared.

Marshall's letter was in response to an advertisement in a recent edition of the Wall Street Journal "dedicated to the businessman from Ohio whose property taxes are due next month." It cited potential tax savings on plant improvements in Michigan.

Marshall said the ad violates assurances the state federation received that the new Michigan expansion laws would never be used to steal jobs.

He also sent a message to the Ohio AFL-CIO, addressed as an open letter to Ohio workers, apologizing for the advertisement.

"We have repeatedly opposed the practice of workers' tax dollars in one state being used to steal jobs in another," he said. "Ohio employers should stay in Ohio and meet their tax responsibilities just as Michigan employers should meet theirs."

Organized labor is not opposed to economic expansion and growth, but not at the expense of "our brothers and sisters in Ohio or any other state," Marshall stressed. He added:

"Both Michigan and Ohio workers know what happens when the lure of slightly greater profits prompts a company to jump across the border to another state. We both have seen the suffering and waste of those who are left behind."

Michigan can survive without taking the jobs of Ohio workers, just as Ohio can get by without stealing Michigan's jobs, Marshall said in calling for workers throughout the nation to reject the "insane practice" of pitting one state against another for jobs.

Financing Social Security

WHEN FIRST ENACTED, the social security program covered the full earnings of 97 percent of covered workers. It would take a wage base in excess of $28,000 to cover the same proportion today. The wage base should be raised to this amount in a series of steps in the next few years. The higher wage base will mean higher benefits for those affected since these higher amounts will increase their average wage on which benefits are based. The new maximum should then continue to be adjusted automatically as wages rise, as is provided for in present law.

In addition, the employer should pay social security taxes on his entire payroll. The wage base is necessary to determine the employe contribution and the average wage on which benefits are based but it plays no role in the employer's tax. An employer's responsibility for the welfare of his employes should be based on his total payroll not just a portion of each worker's earnings. Employes must pay federal income tax on their contributions to social security but employers deduct their tax as a business expense. These factors should be taken into account and the employer share appropriately increased.

Our recommendations would raise substantial additional revenues and would resolve the short run financing problem. But they would not eliminate the projected long term deficit and, at the same time, make possible needed program improvements. Additional funds for these purposes should come from general tax revenues.

We urge a gradually increasing contribution to the social security trust funds from general revenues until it covers one-third of the program's costs. The AFL-CIO believes this would be an effective and just way to introduce the principle of progressive taxation into the social security system.

GENERAL REVENUES are a source which most other countries tap. Many European countries, in addition to payments from employers and employes, assign general revenues to the social insurance system. In fact, some, notably Sweden and Britain, utilize general tax sources to finance a major portion of their social insurance costs. Among the nations of the world, governmental participation in sharing social insurance costs is the general rule and reliance on payroll taxes, as in the United States, is the exception.

But what is less well known is that a general revenue contribution to social security has long been contemplated in the United States. The 1934 Committee on Economic Security, the group which drafted the original Social Security Act, predicted the system would need general revenue financing by 1965. Almost every Social Security Advisory Council since has recommended general revenue financing.

Actually, it is no longer a question whether the social security system should use general revenue financing; it already does to a limited degree. The only question is whether it should be extended.

At the time of its enactment, Medicare covered 3 million older people not otherwise entitled to social security benefits. This cost is paid from general treasury funds.

The special benefits to persons age 72 and over who are ineligible for regular social security benefits are largely paid from general revenues.

In short, the Congress already has made general revenue financing available for certain aspects of social security and it should be gradually increased until it covers one-third of the cost of the program.

Unpredictable Voters Key To Massachusetts Politics

By John P. Roche

IT SEEMS AT TIMES as though there is not a streetcorner in Boston, Worcester, Springfield or Northampton unoccupied by a Democratic presidential candidate in our Mar. 2 primary. They seem to be shuttling back and forth between here and New Hampshire and, because Boston's radio and television stations and papers have regional coverage, it is almost impossible to escape the noise. (I almost wrecked the car the other day reaching to tune out Ronnie Reagan, who suddenly oozed in between music.)

As a close observer of Massachusetts politics over the past 20 years, let me devote this column to free advice for primary candidates who are not aware of our strange customs.

For starters, it is preposterous to say that Massachusetts is a "liberal" state, that is, in any concrete ideological sense. The McGovern success in 1972 is hardly a litmus test of liberalism; one has to investigate the source of his victory. On the basis of careful statistical analysis with which I won't bore you, I submit that McGovern's majority was based on old-fashioned isolationism plus the student vote (half of his margin came from two congressional districts heavily populated with collegians).

The blue-collar population is composed of what I call "continental patriots": they signed off that - - - - - - war, but were prepared to clobber flag-burners.

This is the kind of inconsistency that bothers intellectuals who like to put behavior into nice neat categories "radical," "liberal," "conservative"—and who are often hired by politicians to provide a "profile" of the electorate. The other day on a talk show I heard an indignant citizen bellow: "Anybody who believes in abortion should be taken out and shot." Does he fit into the "Right to Life" compartment?

Then there is our provincial version of "radical chic" that seems particularly strong among professionals in the suburbs. They have an endless supply of causes at arm's length. But if you want to get lynched at one of their receptions, adopt my line that there should be busing from Boston to the suburbs, that the great wall of affluence should be penetrated.

All of a sudden, they start talking about the virtues of "community," the "neighborhood school," and those other values which in the (maybe more profane) mouths of South Bostonians are considered "racist."

Another good way to go up the rope in the suburbs is to advocate low-income housing. Again you have the odd feeling that everybody in town's ancestors came over on the Mayflower, that bringing in "outsiders" would spoil three centuries of togetherness.

If you give this a horselaugh, noting, say, that the O'Briens, Roches, de Lucas, or Goldbergs lost to the Mayflower by a number of boat-lengths, they come up with the fail-safe position: Conservation! Trees and "open spaces" appear to have considerably better standing than the poor.

TO MOVE THE SCENE to working-class areas, the first thing a candidate should know is that getting jobs (we have an unemployment rate roughly double the national average) is considered far more important than saving butterflies from atmospheric pollution. Nobody here wants any foreign policy except "distrust foreigners," and they are not interested in Ed Muskie's passion for "fiscal responsibility."

Moreover, there is no point in collecting a bunch of local Democratic magnates, shining them up, and expecting them to deliver. There is not a Democratic politician in this Commonwealth who could deliver the mail; Ted Kennedy will be in the Senate indefinitely, but he has no coat-tails (as was the case with John Kennedy in state elections). And what is true of Kennedy is obviously more true of state senators, state reps, mayors, aldermen and congressmen.

To conclude, my Democratic friends, come and by all means spend, spend, spend—our economy needs it. But if you have a battle plan based on our "liberalism," throw it away—you may, as I have, learn to love this zany, unpredictable political universe. Good luck!

How to Buy:

'Get-Rich-Quick' Promotions Exposed as Costly Come-Ons

By Sidney Margolius

EVER WONDER WHAT all those "business opportunity" and "make big money" classified ads really aim to sell you? Could you, too, earn $25,000, $50,000 even $100,000 a year?

At the behest of a reader we wondered, too. What we learned recently from answering dozens of such ads is that they usually are come-ons for expensive books, franchises and distributorships.

Especially startling is the persistence and variety of distributorship promotions even after such widespread fiascos as those of Glenn Turner with his Koscot cosmetics and "Dare to Be Great" investment schemes. The second-generation promotions currently operating or recently exposed by the authorities often involve stereo tapes, auto and electrical products, battery additives, and motivational courses.

The motivational courses are an especially ironic promotion in which moderate-income or unemployed people try to sell each other recorded lectures on how to be successful. In one example, California Attorney General Evelle Younger recently got the so-called Personnel Institute to agree not to make "misleading statements" to induce investors to put out $3,480 to become "regional dircetors." Younger said the firm led investors to believe they would earn substantial sums by selling the courses and getting others to invest.

The Federal Trade Commission got a consent order barring Consolidated International Tool & Oil, Inc. and Globe Marketing & Services, Inc., from using false earnings claims to sell distributorships for auto and electrical products, recording tapes and other products. The complaint said these firms had advertised such claims as "$800 per month part time, $2,000 per month full time."

Wholesalers of DynaGlaze and Astrashield auto polish also have been prohibited from claims that salesmen can expect to earn $50,000 a year, and that these polishes will "protect and beautify an auto finish for years."

One of the most persistent promoters recently drew one of the longest prison sentences on record for mail fraud. Archie K. Babson got 25 years for perpetrating various schemes. In the latest, he sold investments in a plan to place racks for distribution of travel-guide advertising material. Investors were promised incomes of $150 to $2,000 a week. One woman took out a second mortgage on her home to invest $11,900.

Previously Babson had been convicted of mail fraud in connection with his promotion of United Jets School. It sold correspondence courses purportedly to train technicians and mechanics for the jet aircraft industry.

The losses to would-be small investors in the many distributorship promotions of recent years run into hundred of millions of dollars. Federal and some state authorities were slow to stop these raids even after newspaper exposés. The FTC recently admitted that "it is regrettably clear that responsible authorities, including this commission, have acted far too slowly to protect consumers from the manipulations of respondents and others like them."

The Koscot promotion and Glen Turner's "Dare to Be Great" motivational courses alone took $44 million from consumers. The human toll was staggering: money borrowed, jobs quit, homes mortgaged and even bankruptcy "for some who dared to be great." Koscot now is in bankruptcy reorganization, and Turner and his partners claim to be broke. So there's little hope for restitution to the innocent investors, the FTC reports.

The FTC, as well as the publications that accept classified ads without checking, also could do some breast-beating about the nature of many "Business Opportunities" ads. One promising a free book on "900 Successful, Little One-Man Businesses" turned out to be a pitch for a $15 book sold by several other purported business "counselors."

Part-time inventors should note a complaint by the FTC alleging deceptive acts by Idea Research & Development, Inc., of Texas. The FTC says that few, if any, of the firm's clients have their ideas or inventions evaluated by qualified persons, or get legal protection, or have their ideas produced. A proposed order would bar the firm from accepting compensation except as a percentage of royalties. The charge is that the firm induced clients to pay fees of $750 to $1,200 for "virtually worthless" contracts.

ONE OF THE MOST ACTIVE promoters operates both a "business institute" and a "credit research center." The "institute" offers for $12 a set of mail-order ads selling products like wigs to buyers who "are waiting to make you rich!" The "credit research center" promotes a "debt survival kit" for $12. The kit claims to explain how to get out of debt by using an "almost-secret" federal law which "will shield you from your bills."

It is true that there is a federal law called Chapter 13 or the Wage-Earner Plan. But while it can protect your assets, it does require you to pay your debts, over a three-year period. If you need to, you can learn about how the plan works from the clerk at the federal court in your district or from books available without charge at your library.

Of course, the "credit research institute" also tells you how to "disappear completely and become a new person," and "how to create work records, degrees, diplomas, etc."

Before Disasters:

Advanced Planning Pressed To Upgrade Air Traffic Safety

STRONGER LEADERSHIP from both the Administration and Congress is needed to assure that the U.S. air traffic control system remains the best in the world, President John J. Leyden of the Air Traffic Controllers declared.

Steps to upgrade air traffic controls too often come after a disaster as the Federal Aviation Administration and the Dept. of Transportation react to congressional and public pressures, he noted.

Leyden urged government agencies to put more emphasis on advance planning and application of new technology, to keep closer pace with the growing demands on the system that come with steadily increasing aviation activity and new types of aircraft.

Leyden said on Labor News Conference that introduction of the British-French Concorde into the United States will pose new and special problems in air traffic control, but that the 17,000 highly skilled and experienced professionals represented by PATCO are solidly committed to meeting those challenges. He said that he believes the American SST is "a superior version."

Questioned about the union's efforts to upgrade the salaries and working conditions in PATCO's jurisdiction, Leyden said that even with gains made since 1969 "an independent study body appointed by the President made a finding that the worst labor relations in the entire federal structure were between FAA and its personnel."

"We're still in the Neanderthal Age, as far as recognizing the pressures and problems of controllers' jobs," he asserted. He pointed out that while U.S. controllers work a 40-hour week, the standard in Canada is 32 hours and 30 hours in France—and that both countries "have less complex traffic, less stress" than is the case here.

Turning to the area of federal pay levels for controllers, Leyden pointed out that "the senior air controller at the most complex facility in the United States—Chicago O'Hare—who handles 2,100 operations a day," is paid only $25,000 a year. "If we're talking about payment for responsibilities, we've got a long way to go," he declared.

AMERICA'S LOVE AFFAIR with her railroads has been a rocky one.

When the steam locomotive was introduced to the restless, pioneering American people of the 1840s, it was a case of love at first sight.

Easterners were expanding their boundaries, pushing West through rough, largely unsettled country. And their affection for the rugged, smoke-belching steam locomotive grew as the railroads pushed westward along with them.

In the 1920s, the romance between America and her railroads developed into a solid, practical marriage. At that time there were some 20,000 thriving intercity passenger trains. Today, there are only 250.

America's trains helped open up the West and created huge industrial cities in the Midwest where there had been only prairie towns. They helped build the giant coal and steel industries and in the process created employment far beyond its own industry.

Now, America's romance with her railroads has swung full circle. The big question today, as America celebrates her bicentennial anniversary, is: Can this marriage be saved?

There are many who are working toward that end. Foremost among them are the rail unions, with the full support of organized labor. In recent years these forces have been joined by a growing number of citizen groups who see improved and more competitive rail passenger service as serving a critical dual purpose: a more economic mode of commercial travel and a means of cutting down on pollution.

DURING THIS DECADE, seven of the nation's major railroads along the heavily traveled northeast corridor declared bankruptcy. This forced the federal government into a more prominent overseer's role than it had been playing in the nation's rail industry.

A quasi-governmental organization called Conrail was set up to restructure and administer these railroads. In its report on the economic implications, the U.S. Railway Association, federal agency, noted that the bankruptcy railroads making up Conrail "are essential to the 17-state region and its interrelationship with the national economy."

The Conrail region, the report went on to say, accounts for over half of the nation's economic activity; over 60 percent of the nation's durable goods manufacturing, and over 50 percent of non-durable goods manufacturing. The report warned:

"If these railroads were shut down, the maximum impact would run from New England to Indiana. The bankrupts handle 75 percent of traffic in a majority of multi-zones studied by DOT (Dept. of Transportation) in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland. . . ."

Steps have been taken by the federal government to help revitalize the nation's rail systems—both Amtrak and Conrail are seen as good beginnings—but the rail unions believe much more is needed to truly put the industry back on the right track.

They see the President's rail budget as "totally unrealistic." The Administration proposes to allow Amtrak, which runs most trains along the busy northeast corridor, operating grants of $378 million—at least $51 million short of what is needed just to retain all present routes.

Congressional hearings are under way now that could determine which routes will be cut, which will be left. Amtrak management warns that the present budget level could result in ending service on as many as 20 routes.

But many see a ray of hope for revitalization of the rail system. Congress recently approved—and the President signed into law—an omnibus rail bill that touches many of the trouble spots of the industry.

The act provides $6.4 billion for Conrail and Amtrak for track improvements, equipment purchases and retention of low-density lines that had been scheduled for abandonment.

STRONGER LEADERSHIP from the Administration and Congress is essential to maintain the U.S. air traffic control system as the best in the world, Air Traffic Controllers President John F. Leyden, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Indy Badwar, left, of the Federal Times and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcalls on Natural Gas Deregulation

There were two key votes when the House considered natural gas price deregulation—favored by gas and oil producers, but opposed by labor and consumer groups.

Column I is a 230-184 procedural vote on Feb. 3 that allowed the decontrol bill to be considered as a substitute for temporary legislation to alleviate shortages. The AFL-CIO view is that the 128 Republicans and 102 Democrats voting for the rule to allow House consideration of natural gas decontrol were wrong (W). Right votes (R) were cast by 175 Democrats and 9 Republicans.

Column II shows the 205-201 vote on Feb. 5 for a labor-supported substitute, by Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa), which stopped decontrol by strengthening regulation of the biggest gas producers. Voting right were 192 Democrats and 13 Republicans. Wrong votes were cast by 117 Republicans and 84 Democrats.

Optimistic Claims Refuted:

in January, "distorted" the officially reported decline in joblessness.

While the January decline of five-tenths of 1 percent in the official jobless rate was more than had been anticipated, the 7.8 percent rate was still higher than the peak rates in any of the four previous recessions.

During the 1970-71 downturn, the rate never climbed above 6.1 percent, while in the 1960-61 recession, it never got higher than 7.1 percent. In 1958, the jobless rate went as high as 7.5 percent while in 1954 it rose as high as 6.1 percent.

In determining the official jobless rate, the government counts part-time workers as fully-employed. Thus, the effect is to lower the overall rate.

"A truer measure would count half of this group as unemployed," Goldfinger said. "They are, in fact, partially-unemployed and their families suffer the consequences of reduced paychecks.

"A realistic measure of unemployment would not claim those forced to work part-time because full-time jobs were not available as 'fully-employed'."

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said last month's improvement in non-farm employment was largely due to job-creation programs passed by Congress.

But, he warned, President Ford may use the decline in the official unemployment rate to justify a veto of the public works bill. Passed overwhelmingly by Congress, the bill would create nearly 600,000 badly-needed jobs.

Biemiller also noted that the January jobs figures "show that the Congress was right in insisting on an extension of anti-recession tax cuts, which the President initially vetoed. Without these tax cuts, the economy would have lost $1 billion in job-generating purchasing power in January."

Total employment last month rose by 800,000, after adjustment for seasonal fluctuations. At 86.2 million, the employment level was 2.1 million above the recession low of last March, and very close to the pre-recession peak reached in July 1974, BLS said.

The labor force grew by 360,000 to 93.5 million in January, with all of the increase occurring among women and teenagers, the government said.

The number of jobless persons dropped by 450,000 to 7.3 million, the largest one-month decline since December 1959 when the nation was beginning to pull out of the 1958 recession.

For the second consecutive month, the drop in unemployment occurred entirely among those who had lost their last job, BLS said. The government said 78.1 million nonfarm workers were on company payrolls in January, an increase of 1.8 million since the June 1975 low.

Among major labor force groups, adult men showed the greatest improvement. Their jobless rate declined from 6.6 to 5.8 percent from December to January. The rate for adult women moved down over the month from 8 to 7.5 percent. For household heads, the rate dropped from 5.7 to 5.1 percent.

Joblessness among teenagers rose three-tenths of 1 percent to 19.9 percent in January, however. The jobless rate for black teenagers was 34.6 percent, only slightly improved from the 35.2 percent of the previous month. Their rate a year earlier was 39.5 percent.

Joblessness among white-collar workers was virtually unchanged at 4.7 percent last month, but the unemployment rate for blue-collar workers fell to 9.4 percent from 10.7 percent in December.

The average duration of unemployment held at nearly 17 weeks while the number of "hard-core" unemployed—those out of work 27 weeks or longer—was little changed at a record level of 1.6 million.

Study Sees Ford Budget Bringing 'Endless Woes'

The $395 billion federal budget for fiscal year 1977 proposed by President Ford, coupled with the monetary policies of the Federal Reserve Board under Arthur Burns, add up to "a prescription for endless woes," the Conference on Economic Progress declared in a new study.

The study, "Toward Full Employment Within Three Years," charges that if the Administration's economic policies are continued, real gross national product, in 1975 dollars, would be more than $1.1 trillion lower during the years 1976-1980 than if full employment and full production were restored by the end of 1978 and maintained.

Prepared by Leon Keyserling, conference president and a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Truman, the study defines full employment as 3 percent of the workforce. It proposes a 10-point program to achieve its full-economy objectives.

To restore "reasonably full" employment and full production by the end of 1978, the analysis observes, civilian employment needs to be up 11.1 percent, or 9.4 million workers, three years from now.

"This would reduce full-time unemployment as officially reported (in 1975) from 8.5 percent, or 7.9 million workers, to 3 percent, or 2.9 million workers," the study notes.

Over the same three-year period, it adds, total GNP, measured in 1975 dollars, needs to rise 31.5 percent, or $464 billion.

Consumer spending needs to rise 22.2 percent; gross private domestic investment needs to expand 77 percent; government outlays at all levels for goods and services should be increased 33.8 percent, and "investment in residential structures, of key significance to the whole economy," needs to grow 155 percent.

Among its recommendations, the study proposes that federal spending for fiscal year 1977 be lifted to about $419 billion and to about $498 billion in calendar year 1980.

Also, the Federal Reserve Board should be brought more closely under the direction of the President and Congress, the analysis asserts. The growth rate in the money supply should be kept adequate to support a full economy, and much lower interest rates must prevail.

Worldwide Joblessness Up Sharply

Geneva — World joblessness is on the rise, the International Labor Organization reported, with a massive increase of 6 million noted among the major industrial countries during the period from September 1974 to September 1975.

The ILO's Bureau of Statistics here said unemployment in 18 European countries, plus the United States, Canada, Japan, Australia and New Zealand, spiraled to 17.1 million over the 12 months, representing 5.2 percent of the world's workforce.

Both the 12-month increase and the total number of people without work were the highest recorded in the past 40 years, the bureau observed.

The United Nations agency reported that more than half the 6 million increase in unemployment in the 12 months to September 1975 occurred in Europe. Over 1.1 million of the jobless were in western Europe, with 1 million in southern Europe and over 900,000 in northern Europe.

For the United States and Canada, the increase amounted to nearly 2.5 million. Japan, Australia and New Zealand accounted for about 400,000.

"If one takes account of the number of dependent family members usually supported by the average worker," the ILO said, "the number of persons directly affected by unemployment in September 1975 increases by 23.3 million to a total of about 40.4 million.

"This represents an increase of about 14.1 million compared with September 1974."

The ILO's estimates are based on data supplied by national authorities in Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia.

The ILO is preparing for a world conference on unemployment and poverty in June, and is closely following jobless trends among industrial nations and in the developing world.

House Votes to Expand Public Jobs Program

The GOP substitute was beaten on a 226-125 vote.

As passed by the House, the bill would add a new program of temporary jobs on projects sponsored by private, non-profit community groups. This could cover a range of activities, from neighborhood clean-up campaigns to fixing up a day-care center or building bicycle trails.

Some changes were made in the existing public service employment given to re-establishing the jobs of essential public health and safety employes who are laid off for genuine budget reasons. It would also ease some of the restrictions on wages and allow some highly-skilled jobs to be filled on a part-time basis that would preserve established hourly rates for such jobs without exceeding the $12,000-a-year salary ceiling.

The House vote was 23 short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to override a presidential veto, but its supporters were hopeful that the bill will gain additional backing as it moves through the Senate and then to a House-Senate conference committee.

One source of controversy that might be soothed over before final congressional action is a rural-urban clash over the bill's formula for allocation of funds. An attempt to spread funds over a wider area lost on a 206-189 vote.

The estimated price tag for the legislation—if Congress should appropriate the full amount authorized—is $5.9 billion over a 20-month period.

The additional money that would be needed for the current fiscal year is within the congressional budget ceiling.

In a related area, the White House confirmed that the President will veto the $6 billion, 600,000-job Public Works Employment Act that both the House and Senate passed by one-sided margins. The veto was expected momentarily as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The House has tentatively scheduled an attempt to override for Feb. 19, after Congress returns from a recess that ran through the Washington's Birthday holiday.

Marine Engineers Renew Call to Split Oil Giants

President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers renewed the union's call for the break-up of U.S. oil companies, which he charged are making more on partial ownership of the foreign oil they produce than they made with full ownership.

Testifying before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly subcommittee, Calhoon said divestiture by the oil companies of some of their activities could:

- "Break the cozy relationship between the multinational oil companies and OPEC (the oil producing countries), because these companies will no longer be able to provide a complete network for transporting and distributing oil to the market place.
- "Induce greater competition for the production of foreign oil, and thus help to lower world oil prices.
- "Weaken the unity of OPEC by encouraging the production countries to seek out the best possible arrangements for producing, transporting and distributing their oil.
- "Go far toward eliminating the evils of transfer pricing, thus providing an additional benefit to consumers."

Calhoon noted that "the oil companies have not fared badly under participation agreements." These require the companies to turn over part of the oil they produce to the government of the country in which it is produced. Then, the companies buy back the oil at high prices.

The oil companies, Calhoon said, "are able to more than triple their per-barrel profits from foreign oil; with the help of the foreign tax credits, they are able to earn more profits on their 40 percent interest in oil then they were earning on a 100 percent interest five years ago."

Calhoon also warned that the oil companies are trying to nullify congressional action which last year tried to restrict their use of foreign tax credits.

Federal Standards Pressed:

State Failures Cited On Job-Injury Laws

"The failure of the states to modernize this basic and essential system of social insurance makes enactment of federal legislation establishing minimum federal standards for workers' compensation an urgent necessity," Biemiller said.

In outlining organized labor's proposals to improve various provisions of the Daniels-Perkins bill, Biemiller stressed the need for uniformity from state to state.

The section that would permit a state to determine which injury or illness is compensable is unsatisfactory and inequitable, he said.

While job-related heart disease and asbestosis are compensable in some states, they are not in others, he noted. Hearing loss is also treated differently from state to state.

To correct these kinds of inequities in state programs, Biemiller urged that the legislation be amended to assure that all occupational injuries, disease and deaths are compensable.

The lack of uniformity in compensable injuries is of particular concern to the Air Line Pilots, who also presented testimony before the subcommittee. The ALPA noted that confusion often results when a pilot lives in one state, resides temporarily in another because of his job, while his airline is based in another state—and all three states are far away from the state, country or international waters where the injury occurred.

Biemiller called on Congress to establish as minimum standards the provisions of one section of the bill that would guarantee that victims of occupational accidents and disease be entitled to 14 basic benefits under the compensation system.

These entitlements, he noted, relate to medical care, rehabilitation, weekly benefit amounts, choice of physician, time limits, and other features to provide adequate compensation.

These basic benefits were included in legislation introduced in the House and Senate in 1974 which the AFL-CIO supported, Biemiller noted, "and we favor their enactment now whether they are termed entitlements or minimum standards."

Additional amendments proposed by Biemiller include authority for the Secretary of Labor to promulgate occupational disease standards based on government job health studies, and the payment of attorney fees to all individuals licensed to represent claimants.

Fire Fighters Back Bill on Burn Research

Legislation to establish centers for specialized treatment and research into burns was given a strong endorsement by the Fire Fighters at House hearings.

IAFF President William H. McClennan noted that professional fire fighters, although subject to many job hazards, are seldom themselves victims of burns.

But he told the Health & Envrionment subcommittee that "we see the many people who do get burned: men, women, little children in their homes or cars, and workers in industry."

Each year, he said, about 50,000 persons are burned seriously enough to require medical treatment.

The legislation the union endorsed would provide 12 "burn facilities" around the country and also finance 24 burn units in existing general hospitals.

Ford's Medicare Plan Scored on Higher Fees

be in addition to existing coverage and not a substitute.

Only one out of 300 elderly persons hospitalized under Medicare would benefit from the President's "catastrophic" illness plan, Seidman said. The other 299 would pay more.

Medicare now covers only about 38 percent of the health care costs of the elderly, Seidman said. "Apparently, the President thinks this is too much and wants to reduce it even further."

In addition to raising the cost of hospitalization to the elderly, Ford's plan would raise the deductible for the supplemental medical insurance program, which pays doctors' bills, from $60 to $77, with a further automatic increase every time social security benefits go up.

This would reduce the amount paid out by about $100 million in the next fiscal year—an amount that the elderly who experience illness will have to absorb out of their low incomes, Seidman stressed.

As for proposed limits on future rate increases by hospitals and doctors, Seidman agreed that there is a real need for cost controls. But he said the Administration plan would not prevent doctors from billing patients for amounts not paid by Medicare nor hospitals from shifting charges to non-Medicare patients.

As a needed "first step toward negotiated fee schedules," Seidman asked that it be made mandatory for physicians to accept assignment of bills to Medicare without the option of direct billing of patients.

America needs "a comprehensive, compulsory health insurance program for the whole population," and the AFL-CIO-supported Health Security bill "offers the best means for providing good health care for all age groups."

But pending this, Seidman said, priority should be given to the health needs of the aged and disabled—those under the Medicare program. To improve Medicare now, he called for:

- Combining the hospital care (Part A) and the medical care (Part B) into a single program, dropping the present premiums for Part B. The government should then make a general revenue contribution to the trust fund equal to at least one-half the cost of the combined program.
- Including prescription drug costs under Medicare to reduce the financial burden on the elderly.
- Reducing the long waiting period now required before disabled persons under 65 can come under Medicare.
- Including persons who retire before 65 and are eligible for social security benefits.

Ford's Medicare proposals were also sharply criticized by Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, who also testified before the Ways & Means subcommittee on health.

Cruikshank warned that Ford's plan would make out-of-pocket hospitalization costs so great that an older person would plead with his doctor to keep him out of the hospital.

As for the President's proposal to limit the increase in Medicare reimbursement to doctors, Cruikshank said this would merely cause more physicians to use the direct billing approach. Thus, the patient would have to pay out of his own pocket whatever part of the doctor bill Medicare did not cover.

Crafts Analyze 94th Congress Voting Record

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has issued a voting record analysis of the 94th Congress as a first step in a commitment "to stick by our friends and actively oppose our enemies."

The study, released here during the department's executive council session, lists 13 key House and Senate votes on issues of special importance to the building trades. It includes such measures as construction site picketing and bargaining, jobs programs, safety and funding of major programs.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine termed the voting record "an educational and a political tool." He said that "for the first time, we have a document based solely on building trades positions, by which we can see who are our friends and our enemies."

Georgine suggested that members of construction unions hold each representative and senator accountable, asking: "Did he vote with us on crucial issues, or did he desert us?"

The tally identified 11 senators and 51 House members with no "wrong" votes on the key issues. It showed 12 senators and 30 House members with either no "right" votes or only one such vote.

The executive council also had on its agenda consideration of energy-related problems, and held a breakfast meeting with Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller.

Elected vice presidents to fill vacancies on the council were President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers and President Angelo Fosco of the Laborers.

Natural Gas Vote Rejects Full Decontrol

Union and consumer groups didn't give up and helped build up support for the Smith compromise.

The climax was a vote that had the electronic scoreboard in the House showing first one side and then the other side ahead. Seconds before the gavel signalled the end of the voting period, the count was tied at 196-196.

Natural gas prices are regulated by the Federal Power Commission, a body considered sympathetic to the industry and on record as favoring deregulation.

The FPC has approved substantial rate increases in recent years—and consumer and industrial utility bills have reflected the price hikes.

But the industry has contended that the profit levels aren't enough to induce the added exploration and development needed to bring in new natural gas wells. Without price decontrol, its spokesmen warned, America faces a natural gas shortage that could force factories to close and homes to go without heat.

In fact, the predicted natural gas shortage did not develop and consumer groups charged that shortages and fears of shortages were being deliberately fostered so as to bring about decontrol and a profit windfall.

A House-Senate conference would normally seek to reconcile the House-passed bill with the decontrol measure adopted by the Senate. But some decontrol advocates were reportedly seeking to block a conference in the hope of tilting the House majority back to support of ending all natural gas price restrictions.

Congress Urged to Turn Down Rise in Social Security Tax Rate

But raising the tax rate, as the President has asked, would mean that workers earning less than the present $15,300 ceiling would pay most of the money needed to avoid depleting the Social Security Trust Fund.

Seidman stressed that raising the wage base instead of the tax rate would make the social security tax less regressive and would provide about the same amount of revenue.

In addition, he urged, employers should pay social security taxes on their entire payroll, not just the amount on which workers are taxed. He noted that the social security tax can be deducted by employers as a business expense, but workers are taxed just as if they had received the money in their paychecks.

But while these steps would meet the short-term financial problems of the social security system, Seidman cautioned that "they would not eliminate the projected long-term deficit and, at the same time, make possible needed program improvements."

To accomplish this, he urged, additional funds should come from general tax revenues.

Labor's program, he told the Ways & Means subcommittee on social security, calls for a gradual injection of general revenues until it covers one-third of the total cost. "The AFL-CIO believes this would be an effective and just way to introduce the principle of progressive taxation into the social security system."

Further, Seidman noted, the need for general revenue contributions was anticipated by the panel that drew up the original Social Security Act in 1934 and has been recommended by "almost every Social Security Advisory Council since then."

The AFL-CIO also took "strong exception" to Ford's proposal to end the student dependent benefit, which enables surviving children to continue drawing benefits to age 22 if they are enrolled in a full-time education or training program. Otherwise benefits end at age 18.

On the positive side, the AFL-CIO asked Congress to:

- Amend the law to provide cost-of-living adjustments in benefits every six months, instead of annually, whenever the consumer price index rises 3 percent or more.
- Change the definition of disability "so that any disabled worker after 50 or 55 who is unable to handle his usual occupation would be entitled to social security disability benefits." Presently, Seidman noted, the strict definition of disability requires that a worker be unable to perform any job, no matter how unrelated to his usual work.
- Increase the number of "drop-out years" of low earnings that lower the average pay on which social security benefits are computed. At present only the five lowest years can be dropped. Seidman said this works a hardship on "older workers who are victims of plant shutdowns, technological unemployment or ill health."
- Allow retirement benefits without reduction because of age for "workers who have had a long-term attachment to the labor force and who are unemployed for two full years after age 55."

These needed improvements, Seidman stressed, can be achieved only by adding general revenues to the payroll tax that now finances the program.

Council Maps Major Drive For Full Employment Act

POLICY STATEMENTS detailing labor's programs to achieve a full-employment economy and other vital social needs are reviewed at the AFL-CIO Executive Council's mid-winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. From left are Federation Vice President Murray H. Finley, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, President George Meany and Vice President I. W. Abel.

Hits Ford's Policies As 'Trickle-Down'

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Legislation to translate the promise of full employment into reality is the top priority objective of the labor movement, the AFL-CIO Executive Council asserted.

It called on Congress to begin immediately to develop a full employment program based on a nine-point guide developed by the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee. Establishing a full employment economy, the council said, will require the committed effort of all segments of society "but it must start with the government."

The full employment policy statement highlighted the opening days of the council's mid-winter meeting at the Americana hotel here dealing with a wide variety of economic, social and political issues facing the country.

In other statements the council tied the campaign for full employment to the new budget process in Congress, the President's veto of the public works bill and the need for assistance for the long-term unemployed. It also laid out policies in the critical areas of health, social security, energy, controls on natural gas, child care and public employe pensions.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told a press conference that the federation is planning to have a comprehensive full employment bill ready next month in conjunction with a coalition of groups working toward the same goal and that the measure would seek to "really implement the Employment Act of 1946 which was passed 30 years ago."

In its statement, the council observed that full employment policy is in direct conflict with the classic "trickle-down" theory of economics represented by the Nixon-Ford Administrations. This policy is easily identified by its benchmarks of low wages, recurring recessions, broad gaps between the haves and have-nots, the council said. Full employment, in contrast, is identified by general prosperity, full production and a balanced economy, the statement pointed out.

The council noted that the 1975 AFL-CIO convention empowered the Economic Policy Committee to study full employment proposals and determine the elements essential to achieve a workable Full Employment Act that would translate "into action" the promise of the Employment Act of 1946. The council reviewed and approved the guide adopted by the committee which includes:

- Job opportunities at decent wages for all able to work and seeking work so that the unemployed at any time would be only those who are temporarily jobless.

Narrow Senate Vote:

Veto of Jobs Bill Sustained In 'Tragic Loss' for Nation

By David L. Perlman

The Senate's failure to override President Ford's veto of the job-creating public works bill is "a tragic loss" for unemployed workers, their communities and the nation's economy, the AFL-CIO said.

A 63-35 vote in the Senate fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to overturn the veto. The bill that Ford killed would have funded 600,000 jobs over the next two years and helped money-strapped cities and states ride out the recession.

Shortly before the Senate vote, the House had overridden the veto by a one-sided 319-98 margin. But it was in the Senate that White House lobbyists applied the strongest pressure on Republicans.

"The President may consider this a victory," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said after the Senate's failure to override. "We consider it a major loss for America."

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO "will make sure our members know who voted to help the President's political desires and those who voted to help put America back to work."

Both the House and Senate roll-calls on the veto override will be printed in the next issue of the AFL-CIO News.

Ford had complained in his veto message that the bill's $6.1 billion price tag was "unreasonably high"—the same excuse he has repeatedly used to veto other job bills. Ford argued also that the nation should rely on the private sector to create jobs.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had termed Ford's veto "politically inspired" and "obviously designed to placate the right wing of his party."

It called on Congress to overturn the veto and "provide the nation with the economic leadership it deserves and which it will never receive from this President."

Labor Prods for Action On Health Security Plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on Congress to reject President Ford's "collection of gimmicks" and start moving on a comprehensive health security bill.

Ford "reneged on his promise to introduce a national health security program," the council said, but that is no reason for Congress to defer action.

Besides, any program acceptable to Ford "would be profit insurance for doctors, hospitals and insurance companies, not health insurance for the people."

The issue is likely to be decided next Election Day, the Executive Council suggested. It voiced confidence that "the American people will elect those candidates committed to national health security and reject those who cater to the combined lobby of organized medicine and the private insurance companies."

The council statement said the health proposals outlined in Ford's State of the Union message amounted to "a collection of gimmicks" that will neither improve the health of the American people nor protect them from soaring medical costs.

To pay for a "limited catastrophic insurance program" under Medicare, Ford wants "to gut the basic

Administration Assailed For Neglect of Children

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO scored the Ford Administration for its lack of concern for the welfare of the nation's children, charging it with inadequately funding some programs and mismanaging others.

"The health and welfare of America's children is of paramount concern to working people who want to make life better for all children," the Executive Council declared.

It recommended establishment of a single federal agency with sufficient authority and funding to coordinate and direct the nation's child health and welfare programs.

Other council recommendations included the following:

- Enlargement and improvement of existing programs serving children's health care needs until National Health Security is enacted. This should include expansion of mass innoculation programs for preschool and school children against communicable diseases such as polio and measles.

Administration Policies Assailed For Neglect of Children's Needs

● Expansion of mental health programs for children including effective help to those who are victims of alcoholism and drug abuse.

● A federal commitment to adequate nutrition levels for all children, proper education of handicapped children, and quality programs for early childhood development and day-care facilities for all children who need them.

● Provision of child welfare services designed to increase family stability and prevent child abuse and neglect and juvenile delinquency.

● A national adoption information exchange system to match families with adoptable children, especially older, handicapped and minority children who have the most difficulty in being placed in foster homes.

● Emphasis within the juvenile justice system of rehabilitative measures in settings suitable for both the child and the community.

● Adequate financial support programs for all families in need, geared to strengthening family life and helping parents to provide for the basic needs of their children.

Payment levels under public assistance programs for families with children are far too low to provide even a subsistence standard of living, the school lunch and breakfast programs are threatened by budget cutbacks, and the food stamp program has been so gutted that millions of needy families, including millions of children, would be cut off, the council charged.

It said it was "distressed" by such conditions as the following:

● The infant mortality rate in the United States, which is higher than that in 16 other nations.

● The millions of American children who are receiving little or no health care.

● The increasing number of working parents who are having difficulty obtaining adequate child-care.

● The four million handicapped children who are denied educational opportunities to develop as productive adults.

● Ill-equipped, understaffed institutions for delinquent children who are there for reasons of mental retardation or emotional disturbances, or to await adoption or foster placement.

● An alarming increase in child abuse.

In addition, the council noted, poverty hinders children from achieving normal development since they are deprived of decent food, clothing and shelter. Poor children are handicapped by lack of educational opportunity and, in the case of black and other minority children, by discrimination.

"Indeed, poverty can destroy the family life so essential to proper child development," the council declared.

A number of programs have been created to protect the health and welfare of children, the council observed, but most of these programs lack adequate funding and do not reach many of the children most in need.

Furthermore, the council said, responsibility for these programs is scattered throughout the federal government, and the Ford Administration has assigned them a very low priority. The Administration would further weaken child health and welfare programs by shifting responsibility for most programs to the states, providing block grants with little federal regulation, "which would further undermine these programs," the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative attempts to correct problems confronting children have failed "because of inadequate funding, improper administration or sheer neglect," the council said, offering examples.

The Juvenile Justice & Delinquency Act, the first comprehensive federal effort to deal with juvenile delinquency by developing community programs for youths, received only about $25 million — one-third of its requested financing — even though juvenile crime costs society $12 billion every year.

The Special Supplemental Food Program to Women, Infants & Children was enacted to provide adequate nutrition for low-income, pregnant and nursing women and for eligible children under the age of four. But, the council noted, it was never implemented by the Agriculture Dept. until a class action suit was initiated and further legislation forced action.

"The program has reached only a tiny fraction of the 4.6 million eligible women and children, and it would suffer further funding reductions under the Administration's proposed block grant plan," the council said.

UFW Backed in Battle To Save California Law

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A "diehard coalition" of growers, conservatives and Teamster leaders is engaging in "legislative blackmail" in the California legislature in a new attempt to weaken and destroy the Farm Workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Unless this "despicable effort" by the enemies of free collective bargaining is defeated, the council said, the alternative is an "inevitable return to economic warfare with all its consequences."

The blackmail involves blocking an emergency apropriation for the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board to enable it to continue functioning. The coalition, the council charged, blocked the funds within a two-thirds vote requirement unless changes in the law were voted that would essentially "gut the act."

The council noted that Gov. Jerry Brown of California "has correctly refused to pay this blackmail price "and as a result the board has been forced to sharply curtail its activities and "the machinery of the act has ground to a halt."

The new crisis has arisen at the very time the UFW and a number of growers, individually and in groups, have reached final stages of productive negotiations, the council said. "Destruction of the state agency as an operating entity is impeding the successful resolution of those negotiations."

Additionally, the council said, "large numbers of agricultural workers "are being disenfranchised" in the lettuce and asparagus growing areas where elections were anticipated.

The council called on the California labor movement, fair-minded growers and the concerned citizens of the state as well as members of the legislature "to see to it that this dispicable effort of the enemies of free collective bargaining for farm workers is defeated."

The council strongly reaffirmed its support for the UFW as the "legitimate union of farm workers" and said the AFL-CIO will continue its "concerted efforts to help them win the right to free collective bargaining."

System Basically Sound:

Upgrading Proposed For Social Security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO defended the social security system against "malicious" right-wing attacks, but said improvements should be made in both financing and benefits.

An Executive Council statement detailed labor's program to correct a temporary imbalance in the Social Security Trust Fund—without imposing the higher payroll tax rate that President Ford has sought.

It also reiterated the AFL-CIO's call for a permanent government contribution from general tax revenues to supplement the payroll tax imposed on workers and their employers.

The statement amplified many of the points AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman had made a week earlier in testimony before a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

It called for raising the taxable wage base—the amount of wages subject to the social security payroll tax—from $15,200 to $28,000 in a series of steps. Those who would have to pay more into the fund would also be earning a higher retirement benefit for the future. The council also said employers should be taxed on their full payroll, with no wage limit.

The Executive Council acknowledged that a "poorly drafted" provision added in 1972 was cause for legitimate concern as to the fiscal soundness of the program. Through incorporation of a cost-of-living formula into the future benefit schedule, it could result, by sometime in the next century, in benefits exceeding wages at the time of retirement.

The law should be corrected, the council said, "while insuring that future benefits of workers will keep pace with their wages."

On the need to bring general revenue into the fund "until at least one-third of the program is financed in this manner," the council noted that most of the world's industrialized nations use such general revenue financing.

Special problems of older workers were explored in the council statement. Proposals included:

● A less stringent disability test for workers 55 and over "that recognizes that older disabled workers who lose their jobs have virtually no chance to obtain employment in a new occupation."

● Early retirement at age 60, without regard to sex, at less than the present full actuarial reduction in benefits. Also, workers unemployed for two years after age 55 should be entitled to benefits as if they had reached the minimum age of eligibility for retirement benefits.

Another council proposal, to allow more drop-out years of low or no earnings in computing social security benefits was termed "particularly helpful to women who withdraw from the labor force during child-bearing and child-rearing years."

The Executive Council said the social security law "should be amended to eliminate, where practical, all separate reference to men and women." It said this would assure equal treatment "and would mean improved benefits for men as well as woman. It would not involve a major cost increase."

The council noted that the social security program was originally shaped in accord with the then-prevailing social patterns — "men were largely the breadwinners and it was foreseen that women for the most part were to receive benefits as wives or widows."

But since then, "participation in the labor force by married women rose dramatically" and the law now needs updating.

Statistical Gimmick Cited In Jobless Rate Decline

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO charged that statistical "gimmickry" by the Bureau of Labor Statistics distorted the officially reported decline in the nation's jobless rate last month, creating the appearance of a sharp drop in unemployment.

"It is now generally accepted that the Labor Dept.'s official report on unemployment in January—down from 8.3 to 7.8 percent—was exaggerated by a statistical aberration," the federation's Dept. of Research said in a memorandum to the Executive Council.

The distortion resulted from BLS's routine annual revision of seasonally adjusted monthly jobless rates for 1975 plus its new procedure—introduced in January—for seasonally adjusting teenage unemployment, the memorandum said.

In reporting the January figures, BLS acknowledged that last year's seasonally adjusted figures "were revised to a much greater extent than in prior years" because of the sharp increase in joblessness in 1975.

The AFL-CIO's economists noted that if BLS's seasonal adjustment formula had remained the same as last year's, the officially reported unemployment figures for the month probably would have been down about half as much as reported.

"In other words, the unemployment decline in January was a modest decline—reflecting the slow improvements in the economy since last spring," the memorandum observed. "The decline was neither dramatic nor substantial—only the new seasonal adjustment formula made it look that way."

Full Employment Act Set as Top Goal

Council Spurs Drive to Counter Ford's 'Trickle-Down' Policies

- Reduction of the unemployment rate to 3 percent of the labor force and programs to keep it from increasing beyond that level.
- Requiring the Federal Reserve Board to justify to the President and Congress its policies on interest rates, the money supply and availability of credit.
- A public employment program to provide jobs if regular channels fail to keep unemployment below 3 percent, with the additional jobs available at prevailing rates of pay but in no case less than the federal minimum wage.
- Understanding by Congress that "an obsession with budget deficits" ignores the benefits of a full employment economy.
- Requiring the President to submit economic targets for full employment as well as specific programs to achieve the objective, with the President's goals and policies to be reviewed by a general consultative body as well as by Congress.

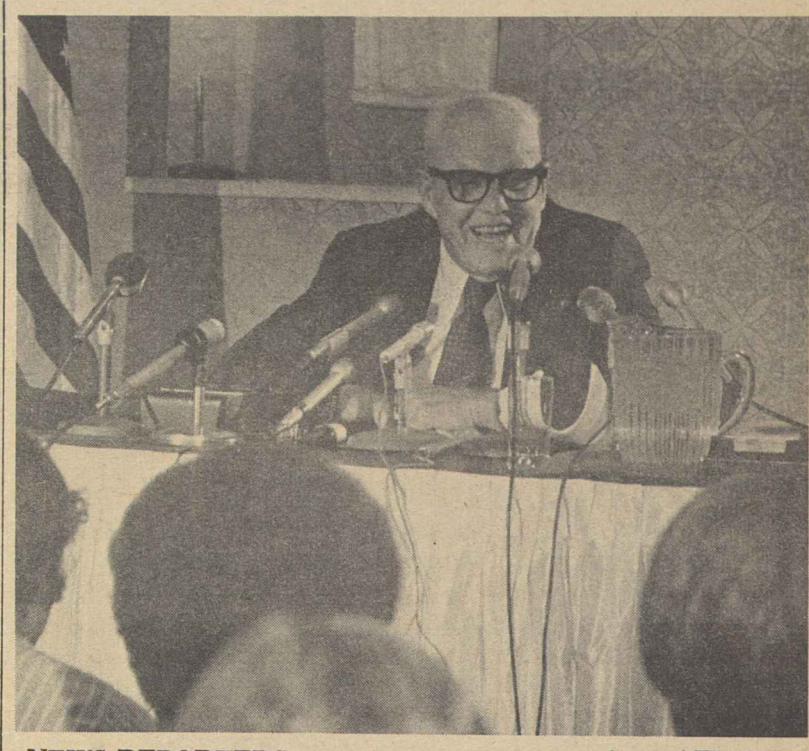
The council warned that "continued reliance on the discredited trickle-down theory can only mean continuing deficits, continuing high unemployment, continuing hardship, continuing recession."

At his press conferences Meany, asked to comment on President Ford's characterization of the vetoed public works bill as an election year pork barrel, said the President favors pork-barrel bills for large corporations but that "he is completely without compassion as far as the little people of this country are concerned. He is concerned with big corporations. . . ."

Asked to compare Ford and GOP Presidential Candidate Ronald Reagan, Meany said they are both products of Republican conservatism but on some things "Reagan is far more to the right." But, he added, "Ford's far enough to the right for us to make a judgment, and we don't have to compare him with Reagan."

Meany reaffirmed the federation's position against involvement by the AFL-CIO in selection of major party convention delegates, but noted that "we are encouraging anybody and everybody connected with the federation and national unions to get as many trade union delegates at the Democratic National Convention as we can get."

Discussing a number of questions with reporters on various Democratic presidential candidates, Meany made it clear there are presently no favored candidates and that the federation will make its decision after the conventions. But he stressed his opposition to Alabama Gov. George Wallace, saying his nomination would be "a disaster."



He told reporters that Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., spoke briefly to the council and that the council members wished him luck. Meany noted that there isn't "any relationship" with the Administration. He said he was still a member of the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee but that there are no plans for any meetings. The committee, he said, is presently in a state of "suspended animation."

On 1976 contract negotiations the AFL-CIO president said that the unions appear to be preparing to try and make up in wage gains "for what they have lost due to inflation," but that in a number of cases the emphasis will be on job security.

Meany said in reply to a question on Angola that what happened in that African country "was a result of our silly policy called detente" which he said allows the Soviet Union to do pretty much as it pleases and is essentially a policy of "unilateral concession" to the USSR.

He said that trade union movements in many countries have used double standards in judging dictatorships—"they look upon dictatorships as being very reprehensible except if they are Communist dictatorships—then there's a very, very strange silence."

At its opening session, the council adopted a series of resolutions memorializing council member Peter Fosco and former council member David Sullivan and recording appreciation for the services of former vice presidents, now retired, Richard F. Walsh, Lee W. Minton, Louis Stulberg and Alexander J. Rohan.

NEWS REPORTERS got a humorous response from AFL-CIO President George Meany as he fielded questions during a press conference at the Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Congress Urged to Key Budget Policy to Jobs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress must use its new budget process to provide the funds to put America back to work rather than bowing to Administration concern with budget deficits, the AFL-CIO warned.

When the new process was first tried last year, the federation's Executive Council said in a statement, "Congress focused its attention on the wrong issue," the size of the deficit rather than the need of the nation for full employment.

The council emphasized that the "new congressional budget process is complicated, strict and will require strong, concerted legislative action by organized labor" to meet the full employment goal. It said the congressional budget timetable "means there will be legislative fights involving organized labor" on seven different dates starting with Mar. 15 and running through Oct. 1.

Labor-backed measures, the statement pointed out, must be included in proposals submitted to the House and Senate Budget Committees by the legislative committees by Mar. 15 "in order to have the best chance of inclusion in the budget resolution. Bills reported by legislative committees after May 15 can be acted upon only if they receive an emergency waiver.

"The AFL-CIO calls upon all its affiliates to pay close attention to the new budget process to make sure that all needed legislation meets the required timetables and can become enacted into law following the authorizing, appropriating and Budget Act procedures," the council declared.

The council stressed that once the determinations are made—the revenues to be raised, monies to be spent for needed programs and the resulting federal deficit—"they become binding on Congress." It added that there are now "three critical steps" in the enactment of needed federal programs, that the budget process has been added to the long-established requirements of authorizing and appropriating legislation.

The statement called on Congress also to "continually weigh and review" the budget process to make it more flexible and more effective in meeting the "changing economic needs of the nation."

Labor Launches Boycott Of Russell Stover Candy

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Executive Council has asked union members and the public not to buy Russell Stover brand candy and confections until the company ends "a consistent pattern of anti-union and illegal activity."

The boycott was launched by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers in what the AFL-CIO termed "a last resort effort to bring the Russell Stover management's labor relations into the 20th Century."

Russell Stover's anti-union activities date back more than 10 years, the council said. Its resolution cited these current examples:

"By a very large majority, Russell Stover workers in Lincoln, Neb., voted to be represented by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the union was certified by the National Labor Relations Board despite numerous delaying tactics by the company. To date, the company has failed to offer the workers an acceptable contract.

"Most recently, the union narrowly lost an NLRB election at the Montrose, Colo., plant of Russell Stover after the company committed unfair labor practices during the election. The NLRB so found and ordered the company to pay back wages plus interest.

"Additionally, the company attempted to force supervisors to determine the union sympathies of workers and has refused to comply with an NLRB order to reinstate a supervisor fired for refusing to obey this illegal order."

In endorsing the boycott, the Executive Council asked AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies to help the Bakery & Confectionery Workers inform the public of the issues involved. And it asked the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and the labor press "to prominently publicize this boycott."

Senior Citizens Score Ford Plan

President Ford's proposal to substitute catastrophic insurance for part of the basic hospital and doctor bill coverage now provided under Medicare was termed "a cruel hoax" by the National Council of Senior Citizens.

NCSC President Nelson H. Cruikshank termed Ford's proposal "a clear example of an insurance policy you shouldn't buy without reading the fine print."

Attempt to Deregulate Natural Gas Assailed as 'Ripoff' of Consumers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Natural gas shortages can be avoided without a "devastating" price increase, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council asked Congress to reject attempts to deregulate natural gas prices, which it termed "an unconscionable attempt to rip off the American consumer."

It conceded that demand for natural gas is outstripping supplies, but it said the gap could be closed by actions that would include:

- Banning the use of natural gas as a boiler fuel in new industrial plants.
- Providing for the orderly conversion of power plants using natural gas to an alternate fuel.
- Allocating natural gas so that no geographical area would suffer undue hardship, with preference to residential, farm and small business users.
- Regulating natural gas prices in one-state markets as well as when gas is sold across state lines.
- Requiring all producers holding leases on federal lands to produce at full capacity or forfeit their leases. There have been indications that some producers have been holding back on gas production in the expectation of windfall profits through deregulation.

The council statement warned that the inflationary impact of deregulation would be comparable to the impact of the fivefold increase in oil prices since the 1973 Arab embargo. It noted that natural gas constitutes one-third of the total energy consumed in the United States, and a Library of Congress study estimates that deregulation would cost consumers $5.4 billion the first year and more in subsequent years.

Nearly 26 years ago, President Truman vetoed a bill to deregulate natural gas prices, and the Executive Council termed his veto message "just as applicable today."

A few large producers own the bulk of natural gas reserves, Truman had noted. Because of the nature of the industry, purchasers of natural gas can't easily move from one producer to another in search of lower prices. Thus, there is no effective competition, Truman said.

Truman's 1950 veto message said continued price regulation is needed to avoid "large windfall profits to gas producers, at the expense of consumers, with no benefit to the nation in terms of additional exploration and production."

In Congress, the Senate has passed a bill that would deregulate natural gas prices from "new" wells. The House, instead, passed a labor-supported measure that would continue controls on the largest firms who produce the bulk of the nation's natural gas but lift restrictions on smaller producers.

CWA Asks Talks On Job Phaseout

The Communications Workers called for immediate negotiations with the Western Electric Co. to protect the jobs of nearly 3,000 workers in New York and North Carolina threatened by the company's planned phaseout of what it terms "excess plant capacity."

Western Electric, the manufacturing arm of the Bell telephone system, plans to end its operations in Buffalo, N.Y., and in Greensboro, N.C. CWA represents some 2,000 workers in the New York unit and close to 900 at the North Carolina location.

"All of these jobs must be protected at all costs," CWA President Glenn E. Watts declared. "Every effort will be made to guarantee that not a single person will have to face the ultimate tragedy of layoff as a result of this initial plant-closing decision."

The Full Employment Need

AMERICA in this election year is confronted by a clearcut choice in competing economic philosophies.

On the one hand is the classic "trickle-down" theory, represented by the economic policies of the Nixon-Ford Administrations, which is based on more wealth for the few and hardship and even poverty for the many. It is easily identified by its benchmarks—low wages, recurring recessions, broad gaps between the haves and the have-nots and the simplistic view that every person determines his or her own economic destiny.

This theory, which has been practiced for seven years now, has brought back-to-back recessions, the highest deficits in peacetime, the highest unemployment since the Depression, the highest interest rates since the Civil War and raging inflation. It has not worked; it can not work; it will not work.

On the other hand, there is the philosophy that underlies full employment. It is one of general prosperity, full production, a balanced economy and a government with a social conscience.

Full employment is the only economic policy that makes any sense. It is the only economic policy we in the labor movement support.

The 1975 AFL-CIO convention empowered the Economic Policy Committee to study full employment proposals pending in the Congress and to determine those elements that are essential to an achievable and workable Full Employment Act—one that translates the promise of the Employment Act of 1946 into action.

FULL EMPLOYMENT—a job opportunity at a decent wage for each person able and seeking work—is an economic necessity for America. From jobs come the wages that generate mass purchasing power. A job is a key measure of a person's place in society—whether as a full-fledged participant or on the outside looking in. Work is the source of individual fulfillment. It is positive, constructive activity.

There is no lack of a will to work in America; there is only a lack of jobs.

Establishing a full employment economy will require the committed effort of all segments of society, but it must start with the government. There is no single program, no single key to full employment.

That is why Congress must begin immediately to develop a full employment program. The way to finally cut the deficit substantially is to put America back to work. Continued reliance on the discredited "trickle-down" theory can only mean continuing deficits, continuing high unemployment, continuing hardship, continuing recession.

The Congress must reject the negative thinking of the Ford Administration and begin action on a positive approach for America—full employment.

'Enough Is Enough!'

A Word Edgewise:

Massive Soviet Arms Build-Up Points to Move on Yugoslavia

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE TWO WAYS of looking at the massive Soviet build-up of nuclear and conventional arms both in eastern Europe and central Asia.

The first is that the Politburo collects tank divisions (49), motorized divisions (110) and airborne troopers (7) the way I collect postage stamps. Maybe once a week, when they get a few hours free, Chairman Brezhnev, Admiral Gorshkov and Marshal Grechko get out their album and lovingly turn the pages from 40,000 tanks to 12,000 SAMs and on to 1,618 ICBMs, winding up with the two Kiev-class carriers presently under construction. This notion is not without a certain naive charm—indeed, a significant number of senators and representatives seem to be under its spell.

However, if you look at this incredible array of hardware with any historical perspective, you suspect it has been accumulated with a definite purpose. Leaving aside the nuclear strategic stockpile for the moment, what, for example, is the value of seven divisions of paratroops? (The United States has one airborne and one airmobile, though ours have roughly double the complement of the Soviets.)

The obvious answer—which almost got a practical demonstration during the 1973 Yom Kippur War—is that they provide a fast intervention force anywhere in Europe or the Middle East. (Our two mobile divisions are parked remotely in the United States)

Then look at the conventional deployment in central and eastern Europe (as stated in the International Institute of Strategic Studies latest authoritative analysis of the "Military Balance: 1975-76"). Leaving out the Soviet forces in the eastern area of that nation, there are 31 divisions (14 tankers) sitting around in East Germany, Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Why? A remedy for unemployment?

If you add the forces in the European section of the USSR, there are an additional 63 divisions (22 tankers). The United States has a grand total of roughly 16 divisions, numerically perhaps the equivalent of 30 Soviet-sized units; ours are scattered around the world from Korea to western Europe.

What precisely is the point of this Soviet exercise in immense conventional overkill? At this point we should slot in the tremendous growth over the past decade of Russian strategic nuclear armament, clearly designed to neutralize the United States in the event of a conventional war in Europe. Particularly if that war is not aimed at our NATO allies, but at another target: the Balkans. After all, when you come right down to it, who is prepared to trade Chicago or New York for Belgrade or Tirana (Albania)?

Which leads us to the fact that Marshal Tito is 84, and the Albanian leadership is rapidly approaching old age. Albania is one of those Communist deep-freezes, like North Korea, but it is plain that the two men who have brutally run that small nation—Enver Hoxha and Mehmet Shehu—are worried: They have been running annual party purges for the last three years. (Both are allegedly ill, and you can sense the hermetic atmosphere from the fact that boss Hoxha has not been out of the country since 1961.)

The Albanians have some reason for concern: back in 1947, when Yugoslavia was a militant Stalinist stronghold, Milovan Djilas asked Stalin what to do about those obstreperous Albanians. Stalin replied genially, "Invade!"

BUT YUGOSLAVIA is the big prize, and there is no reason to believe that Chairman Brezhnev does not believe it the duty of the Soviet Union to liberate it from "right-wing revisionism" when the time is ripe. (Albania would simply be a white chip picked up with the blues.)

As the Czechoslovak invasion of 1968 demonstrated, they are masters of the blitzkrieg: Within a week there were more Russian troops in that unfortunate nation than we put into Vietnam in 10 years.

By the time somebody got an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council into session, there would be 4,000 tanks, a half-million men, and full aircover dominating Yugoslavia, and a couple of paratroop divisions would be sitting in Tirana.

This would, of course, be accompanied by the usual political warfare smokescreen: Pro-Soviet Yugoslav exiles would proclaim themselves the legitimate government and ask for Soviet support. Chinese support for Albania could be discounted (there are another 43 Soviet divisions guarding the Sino-Soviet border). What can we do? Pray, perhaps, that Tito lives a thousand years?

Economic Stimulus Needed:

Congress Urged to Key Budget To Full Employment Programs

The following statement was adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 17, 1976, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE SECOND SESSION of the 94th Congress will bring the first full implementation of the Congressional Budget & Impoundment Control Act of 1974. This new process and the priorities it establishes are of vital concern to America's working men and women.

Under this new act, Congress determines its own federal budget for the fiscal year—revenues to be raised, monies to be spent for needed programs, and the resulting federal deficit. Once these determinations are made, they become binding on the Congress.

Unfortunately, last year when the process was first tried, Congress focused its attention on the wrong issue. Bowing to Administration pressure, it concentrated on the size of the deficit rather than on the needs of the nation—economic, educational, social, national defense and full employment.

Given the depressed state of the economy, the $74.1 billion deficit limit approved by the Congress late last year made the budget totally inadequate to meet the nation's needs. With unemployment high, it makes no sense to hold down spending in an effort to reduce the deficit. What is needed is sufficient economic stimulus to put America back to work, so that a full employment economy will produce additional revenues while lowering costs of unemployment.

As the AFL-CIO has repeatedly pointed out, it costs America billions to keep millions unemployed. For each 1 percent drop in unemployment, the federal government gains $16 billion—$14 billion in tax revenue and $2 billion in lower social costs.

Congress has now had one year of experience with the new budget act. It is time to utilize the act to promote federal policies and programs aimed at restoring a full employment economy. It is up to the budget committees to propose, and Congress to enact, a budget resolution providing the funds necessary to put America back to work. This would demonstrate to the nation that full employment is the country's first priority.

The new congressional budget process is complicated, strict and will require strong, concerted legislative action by organized labor to meet our goals of full employment, expanded production and a balanced economy.

The congressional timetable means there will be legislative fights involving organized labor on each of these dates:

Mar. 15, when all committees must submit estimates and views on proposed legislation to the budget committees.

Apr. 15, when the budget committees report their first resolutions based on proposals received from other committees as well as other data.

May 15, when legislative committees must report bills within their jurisdiction and Congress must complete action on the first budget resolution.

The seventh day after Labor Day, when Congress must complete action on all bills providing budget authority and entitlements.

Sept. 15, when congressional action on the second budget resolution must be completed.

Sept. 25, when Congress must act on any reconciliation resolution implementing the second budget resolution.

Oct. 1, which is the start of the new fiscal year.

THIS TIMETABLE makes it clear that there are now three critical steps in the enactment of needed federal programs. The budget process has been added to the long-established requirements of authorizing and appropriating legislation.

Labor-backed measures must be included in proposals submitted to the budget committees by the legislative committees by Mar. 15 in order to have the best chance of inclusion in the budget resolution. In addition, bills must be reported by the legislative committees by May 15, otherwise they can only be acted upon if they receive an emergency waiver.

The AFL-CIO calls upon all its affiliates to pay close attention to the new budget process to make sure that all needed legislation meets the required timetables and can become enacted into law following the authorizing, appropriating, and budget act procedures.

The AFL-CIO also calls upon the Congress to continually weigh and review its budget processes to make them more flexible, more effective and more responsive to the changing economic needs of the nation.

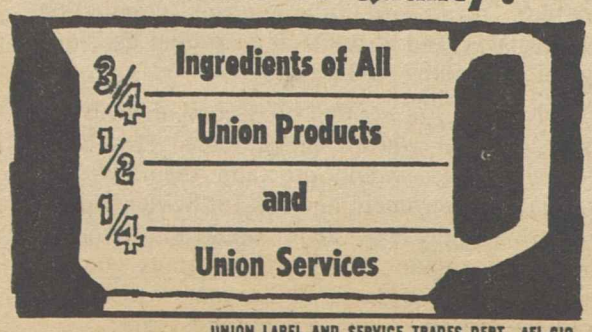
Higher Medicare Fees:

Ford's Social Insurance Plan Scored as Setback for Elderly

ELDERLY AND DISABLED Americans would suffer a major setback if President Ford succeeds in pushing through his social security and Medicare changes, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged.

Seidman said it's impossible to square the Ford-backed measures with the President's claim that "he owes a very deep debt of gratitude to all older Americans" and that his plan offers them "significant improvements in the quality of life."

The social insurance expert said on Labor News Conference that the Medicare changes would add from $55 to $70 a year to what the average Medicare-covered person, old or disabled, now has to pay for that protection, "and they are now paying a lot for their Medicare."



Noting that the President would trade off so-called catastrophic insurance for higher fees for short-term care, Seidman said the President's plan would be "taking more out of their pockets than he's proposing to give them" in the form of improved benefits. In addition, he noted, the President urges "unrealistic limits on Medicare payments to hospitals and physicians" that will do nothing at all to hold down the fees they actually charge their patients.

"We are in favor of rational programs to control physican and hospital costs," Seidman declared, not the kind of so-called controls Ford wants, which would "take it out of the hides of the very people that the programs are supposed to help."

Turning to social security cash benefits, Seidman stressed that the higher tax rates that Ford wants are not linked to any improvement of benefits. He pointed out that although the President urges full cost of living increases on social security benefits in the coming years, that is "what the law requires" now. In fact, he said, "The only person who has ever proposed not paying the cost of living increases" since it became part of the law "was President Ford," and that he was forced to retreat from that position after "a very justified howl of protest from the elderly, from organized labor and from everybody else who was looking for justice for the elderly, for disabled people and for the other beneficiaries of social security."

Reporters questioning Seidman on Labor News Conference were Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

CORPORATIONS, business firms of all types and sizes, and the fat cats—burned by the Watergate scandals of 1972—are moving back into the game of politics.

Thanks to the Supreme Court and the Federal Election Commission, organized business and rich contributors can put their money power to work in a legal and respectable way.

Congress passed the 1974 campaign finance law against a background of public shock and anger over the corruption and excesses of the Nixon Administration. Private contributions to Nixon's reelection campaign financed the June 1972 break-in at the Watergate headquarters of the Democratic National Committee. Other campaign abuses included the diversion of contributions to Nixon's personal use. Illegal contributions from corporations and individuals in exchange for favors and non-enforcement of laws were numerous.

The Supreme Court, in reviewing the 1974 law, attempted to balance free speech rights guaranteed by the First Amendment with the government's need to deal with Watergate-style corruption stemming from big campaign contributions.

In its landmark ruling, the court rewrote the rules of political campaigns in a way that satisfied no one completely.

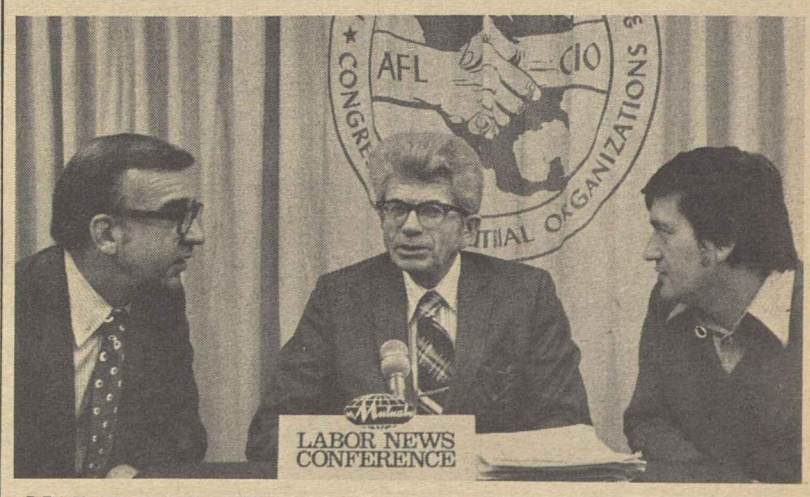
The court upheld certain health reforms such as the public financing of presidential primary and general election campaigns. It upheld the "sunshine" provision requiring strict reporting and disclosure of campagn contributions and expenditures. It upheld the provision which set limits on how much individuals and political committees may give directly to candidates.

However, the court struck down limits on spending "on behalf" of a candidate as an unconstitutional abridgment of free speech. This means that Clement Stone, for example, the Chicago insurance executive who gave $2 million to Nixon in 1972, can resume his spending without limit to advocate the election or defeat of candidates for federal office. While Stone is limited to $1,000 in direct contributions to a candidate, he can spend as much as he wants on his own for radio, TV, billboards, etc.

IT WAS AN FEC OPINION on a Sun Oil Co. political action committee last November that spawned hundreds of business-controlled political committees.

The 4-2 opinion, which has organized labor and several members of Congress in a stew, said that companies could use their own funds to set up committees to collect money not only from stockholders but from employes—and use a paycheck deduction to do it.

Once registered with the FEC for six months, a single committee can give up to $5,000 per candidate for each election.



Thus the initial impact of this new apparatus of hundreds of corporation and business political action committees will begin to be felt about mid-1976. The full impact is expected by the 1978 congressional elections unless Congress amends the law to prohibit employer solicitation of employes.

Labor people feel that the real pressure will be exerted on middle management personnel, whose promotions and "team" attitudes will be evaluated in terms of their contributions.

At any rate, the FEC and the court have paved the way for the sizable and systematic flow of money to conservative-oriented candidates. A Dow Chemical spokesman has made it clear that Dow's contributions would go "to free enterprise candidates." A U.S. Chamber of Commerce spokesman sees the money going "to elect a compatible philosophy."

All this will operate behind such high-sounding names as Quaker Oats Public Interest Committee, McDonnell-Douglas Good Government Fund, the Budd Citizenship Committee and hundreds of others.

The crowning touch, perhaps, comes at a company that has bribed foreign government officials with millions of dollars to win airplane contracts. It is the Lockheed Good Government Committee.

MAJOR SETBACKS are sure to hit elderly and disabled Americans if President Ford succeeds in persuading Congress to adopt his social security and Medicare changes, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Brazda, left of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

PUBLIC RELATIONS and publications problems of local unions are explored by affiliate representatives of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. at Bal Harbour, Fla. Addressing the meeting is Michael C. Grace, department public relations director.

Expedited Arbitration Plan Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO urged affiliated unions to incorporate an expedited approach to arbitration in their collective bargaining agreements as a proven method of solving the mounting problems connected with arbitration.

The Executive Council approved the resolution on arbitration referred to it from the 1975 convention as well as two other referred resolutions dealing with Panama Canal Zone problems.

The council acted on 21 of the 41 resolutions referred by the San Francisco convention, holding 20 for further study and later action. At its meeting here it approved recommendations by a subcommittee of Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice Presidents Martin J. Ward, Glenn E. Watts and George Hardy to adopt three resolutions, nonconcur on 11 and that no action was necessary on seven others.

The arbitration resolution noted that employers are more and more willing to force cases to arbitration where union treasuries can be weakened and depleted, that the costs of arbitration are mounting and "are plainly excessive" and that there is a great deal of undue delay.

The use of expedited procedures for those cases reaching arbitration is working and has been successfully pioneered by the Steelworkers to achieve quick decision at a minimum of cost, without lawyers, briefs, court reporters or transcripts.

The resolution called for an exchange of experiences and a pooling of information among unions to help incorporate the approach in a greater number of contracts so that basic arbitration can be retained as a useful tool.

The Canal Zone resolutions supported the construction of a Third Lock Plan as spelled out in legislation before Congress and called for specific recommendations to be included in the Canal Zone treaty based on an AFL-CIO committee study of a few years ago.

Among the resolutions in which the council voted to non-concur were ones urging a ban on meetings in states that had not ratified the Equal Rights Amendment, a presidential succession amendment, involvement of the AFL-CIO in the internal affairs of political parties and changes in methods of selecting members of the council and providing for minority representation.

Support for Soviet Jews Pledged by U.S. Labor

Brussels—The AFL-CIO, condemning the Soviet Union for trying to "turn back the clock on human rights," declared its solidarity with the World Congress on Soviet Jewry in mobilizing world opinion on behalf of the long-suffering Jews in the Soviet Union.

"The rights we join you in demanding for Soviet Jews we also demand for all other people everywhere," declared Irving Brown, the federation's European representative, in an address here at the second world meeting of the congress.

"They are human rights. They are trade union rights," Brown said. "They are the lifeblood of our own movement's existence. They are not to be compromised in the name of any ideology."

Brown noted that Jews seeking to leave the USSR are regularly harassed and intimidated. In recent months, he said, there has been at least one trial a month designed to frighten Jews who want to emigrate.

"These policies are not merely the extension of the ancient curse of a total system which is designed to maintain the totalitarian power of the Communist Party."

The Communists cannot coexist with a decent respect for human rights, Brown said. In this sense, he noted, the cause of Soviet Jewry cannot be separated from the cause of an Andrei Sakharov, the former Russian nuclear physicist who is one of the staunchest defenders of human rights in the USSR. Soviet leaders denied him permission last December to go to Oslo to accept the 1975 Nobel Peace prize.

"If a Soviet citizen as world-renowned as he cannot leave his country to accept the Nobel prize," Brown asked, "then what rights does any Soviet Jew have that the authorities are bound to respect?"

Brown stressed that the plight of Soviet Jews is linked with "the unheard, unspoken aspirations of millions of Russian workers who are denied trade union protection against the exploitation of their commissars."

For all of these victims of the Soviet system, Brown said, "the ultimate hope lies not in a beneficent change of heart in the Communist leadership but rather in a stronger commitment on the part of the free world to democratic values and in a determination to defend these values."

Pension Plan Protection Pushed in Public Sector

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Effective and appropriate protection for the pension rights of state and local government workers should be enacted by Congress as quickly as possible, the AFL-CIO declared.

The Executive Council said the first step must be speedy completion of a congressionally authorized study of public employe pension plans to lay the groundwork for new legislation. The study was set up under the 1974 pension law.

At that time, the council pointed out, the Congress rejected proposals to cover retirement systems of state and local governments on the ground that the financial stability and strength of these governments made the protection unnecessary. "Recent developments," the council noted, "have made readily apparent the fallacy of this argument."

Pension plans of state and local governments are "badly in need of reform," the council said, because of past underfunding and pay-as-you-go financing. These governments "have too often tolerated flagrant abuses of fiduciary responsibility and unauthorized use of pension funds," the council said.

Contrary to "widespread myth," the council added, "most public employe pension plans are not generous in benefits, vesting and other provisions and have not contributed to the financial crisis of state and local governments."

It said that the average monthly benefit for all state and local government employes was only $223 in 1972, that more than 90 percent of public employes make pension contributions and pay for a large portion of their retirement benefits contrasted to 10 percent in private pension plans, and that public employe fringe benefits lag behind private industry.

"Blaming public employes for financial troubles in a frequent cop-out for public administrators. Public employes did not create the often inefficient, costly, fragmented structure of state and local governments; nor are they responsible for the underfunding of pension systems," the statement noted.

Public employes need pension protection on reporting and disclosure, fiduciary responsibility, participation and vesting, funding and plan termination insurance, the council declared.

'No Solutions':

Public Employes Hit Ford Budget Crunch

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Ford Administration's proposed budget poses an economic threat to all public employes and a continuing financial crunch for state and local governments, the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. declared.

The department's executive board meeting here said that the President's fiscal year 1977 budget "presents no solutions" to the problems of recession and unemployment especially as they affect local governments and public workers.

Unemployment rates for public employes "are at record highs," the PED statement said, "exceeding by one-third the previous record high in 1950." It added that inflation has seriously eroded the "already meager living standards of public employes."

Along with the effects on workers in state, local and federal governments, the Ford budget would "severely affect the quality of services provided" by the various governments, it added.

"The PED and its affiliates will strongly urge Congress to reject President Ford's economic program and implement the fiscal and monetary policies needed to create a general turn-around in the American economy," the statement said. The department will press for employment protections for public workers, expansion of public service employment programs, long-term federal assistance to financially troubled state and local governments and opposition to Administration attempts to deny federal workers full pay raises provided by present law.

The day following the meeting the top officers of the State, County & Municipal Employees wrote PED President William H. McClennan that the union was withdrawing from the department. They charged that because of the "domination of the department by private sector unions, the lack of leadership and the department's inability to develop and carry out a coherent program . . . that participation in the Public Employee Dept. has become a waste of time and money."

The letter dated Feb. 15, 1976, signed by AFSCME President Jerry Wurf and Sec.-Treas. William Lucy, said the union intended "to continue speaking out within the AFL-CIO for a better understanding of and stronger commitment to meeting the needs of public employes in the U.S."

McClennan, president of the Fire Fighters, who received the AFSCME letter a few moments before holding a scheduled press conference to discuss the PED meeting, told reporters that the department had voted on Feb. 14 to find AFSCME in noncompliance with the constitution for failure to pay full per capita on its membership and that the union would be suspended in 10 days unless it came into compliance. Of the 24 unions represented at the meeting, McClennan said, Lucy for AFSCME abstained and there was one no vote.

McClennan said that since September 1975 AFSCME had reduced its per capita payments to the department from about $13,000 to $2,000 a month. Per capita is based on 2 cents per member per month for public employe members, and AFSCME decided to pay on 100,000 members instead of the almost 700,000 it has, McClennan said.

He noted that he and Clyde Webber, PED treasurer and president of the Government Employees, talked earlier with Wurf about the reduction and the AFSCME president said that "prudence dictated" that $2,000 a month was all they should pay. The question did not come before the PED until the executive board meeting here.

McClennan said it was a good meeting with extensive discussion keyed to the need for a closer relationship among the various members of the department on public relations and publications in dealing with difficult problems of state, local and federal workers. He said the department was in good shape financially with the membership now at about 1.8 million with AFSCME out. Prior to the withdrawal the department had 2.5 million members.

He said the department's budget was based on the probability that AFSCME would pull out.

The department had also issued a statement supporting as a "sensible solution" to problems of the postal service legislation proposed by Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) to finance 10 percent of the Postal Service operating budget from general revenues for three years while a committee of qualified experts investigates all aspects of Postal Service operations and finances and recommends appropriate congressional action.

The PED statement also voiced opposition to the elimination of services now performed by the Postal Service in favor of performance of those services by private carriers; refusal of the Administration to permit continuation of Postal Service subsidies in the budget, and the Postal Service's "repressive manpower programs."

The department announced the affiliation of the Chemical Workers Union, bringing the number of unions affiliated to 29.

Ford Rebuffed On 'Impact' Aid

The House blocked President Ford's plan to cancel $243 million in funds for "impacted" school districts, where many students come from families of federal employes or the military.

Ford asked Congress to rescind the appropriation, but was turned down. A Republican-sponsored amendment to cancel $97 million of that amount was defeated, 267-134.

Label Trades Expand Board By Four Seats

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has named four new vice presidents to its board.

The new officers are Henry Segal, secretary-treasurer of the Paperworkers; Rene Rondou, president of the Tobacco Workers; John Mara, president of the Boot & Shoe Workers, and Eugene Glover, secretary-treasurer of the Machinists.

The addition of four new spots on the board—bringing the total number of vice presidents to 11—was authorized at the department's convention in San Francisco last October. The new officers were named at the department's meeting here and will hold office until the next convention in 1977.

To Halt Decline:

Maritime Unions Push Plan To Revitalize U.S. Shipping

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A nine-point program to stimulate the growth of the U.S. merchant marine and overcome the "retreat and decline" of 1975 was adopted by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

The MTD executive board, with Department President Paul Hall presiding, said in adopting the "minimum objectives," that the implementation of the program outlined in the Merchant Marine Act of 1970 "has largely come to a halt."

Last year there were 44 fewer merchant vessels flying the U.S. flag and actively engaged in ocean commerce than in 1974. President Ford's veto of the Energy Transportation Security Act accelerated the decline in merchant marine activity and without an equitable national cargo policy "it is not likely that the declining trend of 1975 will be reversed," the MTD board said.

The statement pointed out that the Russians have captured a significant share of U.S. liner trade in the Pacific "and are emerging as a serious competitor in the North Atlantic trade and other routes." The board also warned of a substantial downturn in shipbuilding activity.

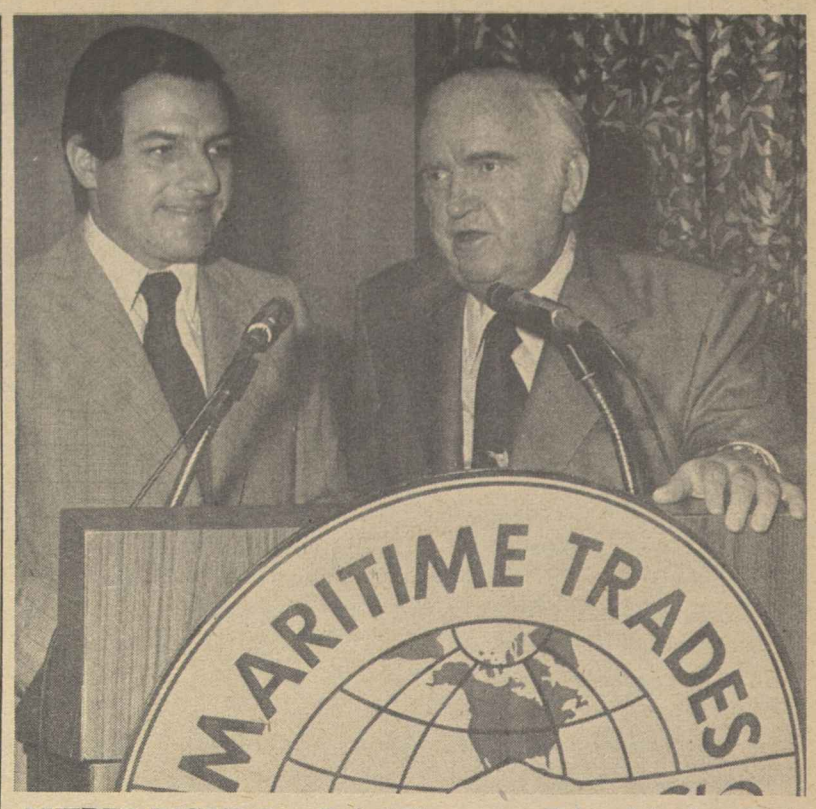
The nine-point program presented to the board by Department Administrator O. William Moody, Jr., calls for:

- Creation of a single agency or an Office of Maritime Affairs in the White House to deal with the problems of the industry.
- Enactment of oil cargo preference legislation.
- Development of a national cargo policy to provide for extension of cargo preference legislation.
- Strengthening of the Jones Act to apply it to the Virgin Islands.
- Taxing in full the income of runaway ships and an investment tax credit for ships built with capital construction funds.
- Legislation to apply the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to U.S.-owned foreign-flag ships.
- Outlawing the predatory practices of Soviet and other state-owned fleets.
- Requiring the U.S. Navy to contract for its noncombatant support services from the privately owned U.S. merchant marine fleet.
- Development of a policy position in both major political parties to guarantee a strong and operating merchant marine.

In other actions the board called again for maintenance of Public Health Service hospitals and warned of a new move by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to enlist local health agencies in its campaign to close the hospitals.

It urged also repeal of Section 807 of the U.S. trade law so that "the jobs of thousands of Americans can be protected against the predatory effects of low-cost imported products assembled by low-wage foreign workers and peddled to American consumers at profiteer-level high prices."

In a report on developing energy resources, the department stressed the need for the forming a quasi-government energy development corporation to find new sources of energy. The national security need for such a move is clear, the MTD said, and the government corporation "could determine the development priorities and allocate products as the nation's needs required."



Another report traced the current trend in multilateral trade negotiations and concluded that the "prospects are dim in this round of trade negotiations for any progress toward diminishing unemployment and easing the plight of the American worker."

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger told the board that the Trade Act of 1974 had failed to prevent the export of jobs or to make whole American workers injured by imports and discussed in detail various sections of the act and their effects on American industry and workers. On the "good news" side he said that more economists and academicians are beginning to support the labor movement's position on trade as the evidence mounts of the growing danger of the multinationals and foreign investment policies.

Gov. Rafael Hernandez-Colon of Puerto Rico described the economic plight of the island, where the unemployment rate hit 20 percent last May, and the role of U.S. trade policy in aggravating the situation.

He said that competition from Taiwan, North Korea, Haiti, Hong Kong and Spain "has sapped our once vibrant textile industry and is destroying our shoe and leather industry. This policy of exportation of jobs is particularly costly to Puerto Rico. . . ."

He warned that the United States "must not pursue a policy which will improverish Puerto Rico and many areas of the mainland for quick profits for multinational corporations."

PUERTO RICO'S Gov. Rafael Hernandez-Colon, left, described the impact of the 20 percent unemployment rate on the island's economy at the Maritime Trades Dept. meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. He was introduced by MTD President Paul Hall.

ILO Moves to Update Safety Code for Docks

Geneva — A worldwide strategy to protect the safety and health of dock workers was charted at an eight-day meeting of experts assembled by the International Labor Organization.

The nine experts, drawn from trade union, industry and government ranks, found an "urgent need" to update the 1932 convention binding ILO member states to take accident - prevention measures in dock work.

In addition to outlining the scope of the projected new convention the experts redrafted the ILO's 1958 Code of Practice on Safety & Health in Dock Work to meet the technological developments that have radically changed cargo handling.

President Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen said the program is designed to meet new safety requirements "demanded by the sophisticated machinery now being introduced on the docks and in the warehouses."

Gleason, Charles H. Fitzgibbon, secretary of the Australian Waterside Workers Federation, and Thomas Cronin, a national secretary of Britain's Transport & General Workers Union, represented all longshoremen at the meeting of experts.

"We worked with the next 10 to 15 years in mind," Gleason said of the paragraph-by-paragraph revision of the code that serves as a guide for governments, trade unions and employers in their efforts to make the docks healthier and safer places to work.

"It will mainly benefit the developing countries," Gleason continued, "as they turn to the new cargo handling equipment. In this way it will promote uniformity in the safety and health regulations throughout the world—one of our main aims."

In the report on their work to the ILO Governing Body, the experts said that when amending and adding to the code they had given particular attention to such new developments as containerization and roll-on/roll-off operations.

But they also noted that many provisions of the old code remained valid because a large amount of some types of cargo is still handled by methods that have been long used.

The discussion on the code made clear that the 1932 convention must be revised to meet the safety requirements of new technology, the experts said. The frequency and nautre of the examinations and tests of cargo-handling machinery and gear are among the requirements to be stipulated in the convention, they stressed.

The meeting agreed that "primary responsibility for applying the prescribed measures for enusring adequate levels of safety and health lay with the employers."

Wholesale Price Index Unchanged Over Month

Lower prices for farm products and processed foods and feeds offset increases in the prices of industrial commodities in January, leaving the government's wholesale price index unchanged over the month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The January index remained at 179.4 percent of its 1967 base, or 4.4 percent higher than a year earlier, BLS said. This meant that a representative sample of wholesale prices has risen from $100 in 1967 to $179.40 today.

Since last October, wholesale prices have shown little change. The all-commodities wholesale price index was unchanged in November, after rising 1.8 percent in October. In December, the index dropped a slight four-tenths of 1 percent.

BLS reported that a drop of 1.8 percent in farm and wholesale food prices for the month offset a rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in the prices of manufactured goods. Prices declined 2.8 percent for farm products and 1.5 percent for processed foods and feeds.

The decline in prices of agriculture-related commodities continued a downward trend that began last November.

The four-tenths of 1 percent rise in prices of industrial commodities compared with an increase of six-tenths of 1 percent in each of the two previous months and a sharp increase of 1.2 percent last October.

Industrial commodity prices account for 77 percent of the weight of the wholesale price index. The WPI is based on a monthly sample of about 2,700 items selected to represent the movement of prices of all commodities produced in the manufacturing, agriculture, forestry, fishing, mining, gas and electricity, and public utilities sectors.

The largest increases among industrial commodities last month occured among lumber and wood products, hides, skins, leather, and related products, and the nonmetallic mineral products groups, the government said.

Four other major industrial groups rose more than the average for industrial commodities in January: pulp, paper and allied products; transportation equipment; textile products and apparel; and furniture and household durables.

Senate Urged To Lift Curbs Of Hatch Act

The AFL-CIO has urged senators to support "without weakening amendments" a bill that would revamp the Hatch Act and allow federal and postal employes to take part in the nation's political life.

A companion bill was passed by the House last fall. It would continue existing safeguards that prohibit coercion or political pressure on federal workers. But it would restore their right to participate voluntarily, as private citizens, in political activities.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said denial of these rights has resulted in making "second-class citizens" of federal workers.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and its affiliates have actively worked for Hatch Act revision.

Long-Term Jobless Aid Termed Indispensable

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Both long-term unemployment insurance and public-service jobs are essential to meet the needs of America's millions of jobless workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared at its winter meeting here.

"In this time of continued, unacceptably high unemployment," the council said, "we insist the Congress not choose between these programs, but that it must fund both."

Congress has interpreted its budget procedures to claim that it must choose between expanding public-service employment for as many of the jobless as possible and extending unemployment insurance benefits for the long-term unemployed, the council observed.

"This is an unconscionable choice," the council declared. The true level of unemployment in the nation last month was closer to 10.6 percent than the 7.8 percent officially reported by the government. And many jobless workers have been out of work so long, they no longer are eligible for unemployment benefits.

"At least a million jobless workers have exhausted their unemployment insurance but are still unable to obtain jobs," the council said.

Legislation enacted last year reduced the maximum benefit period for jobless workers from 65 to 52 weeks in some states and to 39 weeks in others, as of last Jan. 1.

"Even with the 65-week maximum, many have exhausted their benefits," the council said. "Obviously, anything less than 65 weeks is clearly inadequate.

"We urge the Congress to immediately restore the 65-week maximum duration, retroactive to Jan. 1, including workers excluded from the regular program now receiving Supplementary Unemployment Assistance. If 65 weeks proves inadequate, there should be an additional extension."

Steelworkers Fill District Vacancy

Pittsburgh—Bruce Thrasher was named temporary director of Steelworkers District 35 after the USWA executive board accepted the resignation of District Director M. C. Weston, Jr.

Weston, who has headed the six-state southeastern district since 1965, cited personal reasons for his resignation. Thrasher has been on the USWA staff for 22 years, including service as an international representative and assistant director of District 35. He will complete Weston's unexpired term, which ends May 1977.

Jobless Rate 27.2%:

Building Trades Call Parley on Economy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Building & Construction Trades Dept., confronted with results of a 41-city survey showing an average 27.2 percent jobless rate among construction workers, has called a national economic conference for Apr. 5 in Washington, D.C.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine told a news conference here that the meeting will deal with jobs, housing, energy, public works, environment, multi-employer pensions, occupational safety and health, and transportation. More than 3,500 delegates from every state are expected to attend, he said.

Georgine told reporters the Administration has "no credibility" now in light of the President's veto of the construction-site picketing bill and its general economic program. The site-picketing veto "woke our people up," he said, and has led to stepped-up emphasis by the department on political action.

He termed Ford's subsequent veto of the public works bill "criminal" and urged Congress to override the President. The measure would have provided some 600,000 jobs, mostly in the depressed construction industry.

A campaign of thoroughly informing building trades workers on the issues, presidential vetoes and other information will produce activity at the polls, Georgine said. "We must get someone" in the White House to restore the country's economic health, he declared.

Georgine noted that the BCTD had produced its first voting record as part of the campaign to educate and activate its membership politically.

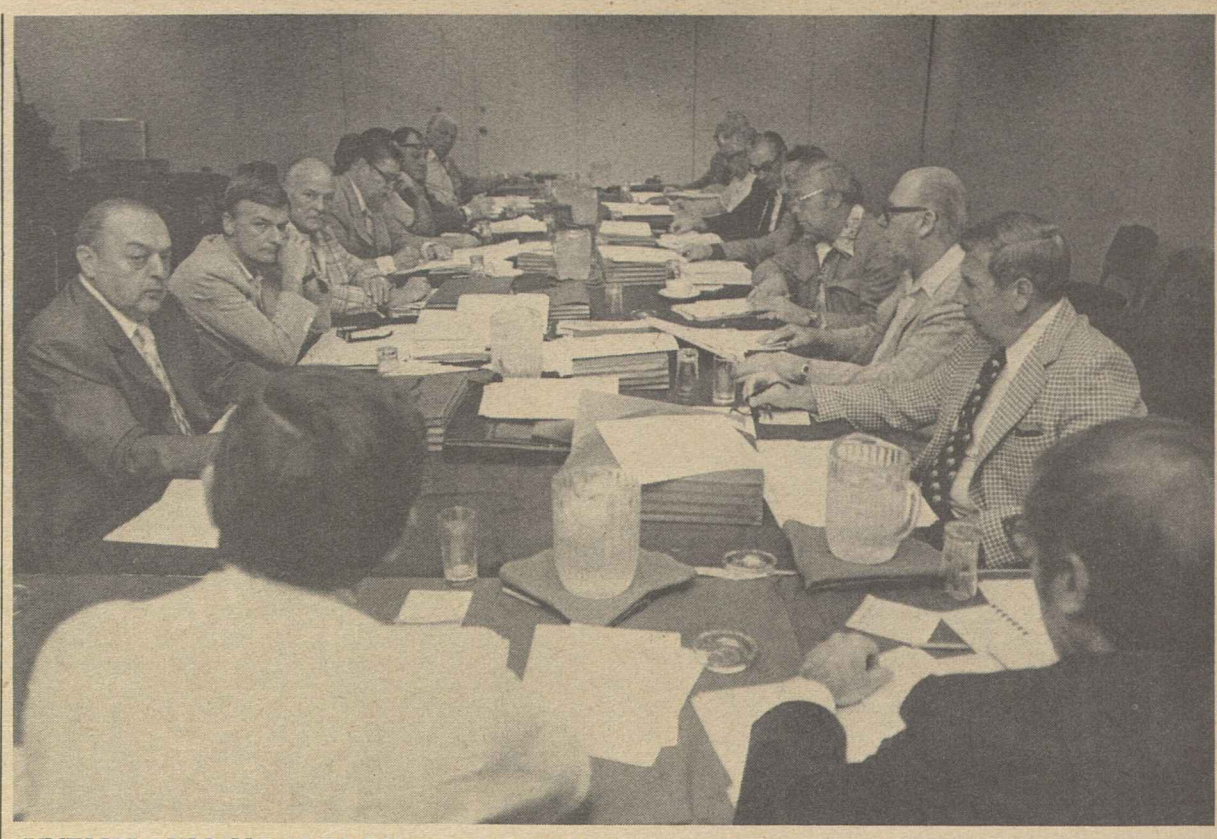
Papers that will form the basis for discussion at the BCTD's national conference are now being drafted by the department's research bureau. One of the completed papers, "The Economic Profile of the Construction Worker," was discussed at the Feb. 9-10 sessions of the BCTD Executive Council here.

The paper, which includes survey results showing unemployment among construction workers running at an average 27.2 percent, discloses that in some cities certain crafts have jobless rates as high as 90 percent. Many crafts in a number of communities have rates upwards of 50, 65 and 75 percent.

Other highlights of the "profile":

● Nearly 700,000 building tradesmen are idle today. "This means the nation's largest industry, the one industry unanimously singled out as being central to any viable economic recovery, is still in the depths of a deep depression."

● Another 500,000 skilled tradesmen are working shortened hours, less than a 40-hour week.



● In the first half of 1975, vetoes by President Ford cost an estimated 638,500 jobs. "As a result of Administration negativism, the public's confidence in the economy remains low."

● More than 450,000 unemployed workers will lose jobless insurance benefits in 1977. Of this number, 110,000 will be building tradesmen.

The paper also debunks the criticism from some quarters that the income of construction workers is "high." Such criticism is not rooted in fact, the BCTD paper stresses.

"An examination of the last four years demonstrates that the wage gains in the building industry have not only failed to keep pace with the cost of living, but in three of the past four years they even lagged behind those in other industries," the BCTD declared.

Those who protest high wage rates in the construction industry overlook the fact that the industry suffers from an extremely high amount of seasonality, more so than most other industries, the BCTD noted.

UNEMPLOYMENT SURVEY covering 41 key cities with an average jobless rate among construction workers topping 27 percent is analyzed by officials of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at Bal Harbour, Fla.

Move to Curb Use of Nuclear Power Scored

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Sharp limitations on nuclear energy contained in a California initiative measure would injure the drive for energy independence, the AFL-CIO executive council declared as it strongly endorsed efforts of the state federation to defeat the measure.

The restraints contained in the California measure, the council said, are "extraordinarily and unnecessarily severe" and could possibly lead to the end of nuclear power in the state. It noted that similar unnecessary restraints are being attempted in other states.

The council pointed out that the nuclear industry has operated for years under very close supervision and has been subject to most rigid safety standards and that as a result there have been "no serious accidents stemming from the operation of nuclear plants."

Labor Prods For Action on Health Plan

protection against hospital and medical bills."

The council said Ford was "deceitful" when he described his proposal as "protection" for the elderly. It noted that the out-of-pocket cost for the average Medicare-subsidized hospital stay would be twice as much under Ford's plan as it is now.

Ford's proposal to substitute $10 billion in block grants to the states for 16 existing federal health programs was also sharply criticized. The programs Ford wants to abolish by this substitution include Medicaid, comprehensive health planning, maternal and child health, migrant workers' health, neighborhood health centers, emergency medical services and mental health.

The AFL-CIO noted that the budget request "is less than present expenditures."

The council statement said the federal programs "were created in the first place because the states were unable to meet those responsibilities."

A separate council statement, on social security, included a proposal to cover the cost of prescription drugs under Medicare, to eliminate the monthly premium for the physician services (Part B) of Medicare, and reduction of the waiting period for disability coverage.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE award of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service is presented to AFL-CIO President George Meany by Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., at the federation's Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. Usery, former head of the FMCS, called Meany "a peacemaker in labor-management affairs" through his efforts to advance collective bargaining.

Jobs Bill Veto Sustained By Thin Senate Margin

The vetoed bill had these key ingredients:

● Up to $2.5 billion in grants to local and state governments for public works projects that could put the unemployed to work quickly. The program would have continued while unemployment was at least 6.5 percent.

● A "counter-cyclical" program of federal grants that would allow communities and states with at least 6 percent unemployment to continue basic services without the cutbacks that otherwise would be necessary because of a revenue-squeeze. The higher the unemployment rate, the larger the amount of the federal grants—up to a ceiling of $1.5 billion over 15 months.

● An added $1.4 billion for construction of wastewater treatment facilities in the 1977 fiscal year, and further funds for the Job Opportunities Program, an ongoing public works program.

Ford had sought to head off the veto override by promising to sign a Republican "compromise" bill that would have provided countercyclical funds under somewhat more restrictive conditions, but would scrap the public works portion of the vetoed bill.

The Ford-endorsed alternative was sponsored by two Michigan Republicans, Garry Brown in the House and Robert P. Griffin in the Senate. It carried a $780 million spending ceiling, with money channeled to eligible states and cities through the existing Housing & Community Development program. But only areas with unemployment over 8 percent would be eligible, and then only while the national unemployment rate stays above 7 percent.

Administration lobbyists tried to persuade Republicans in Congress that the Brown-Griffin bill would give them an acceptable excuse for sustaining Ford's veto of the $6.1 billion bill.

They failed in the House, but succeeded in the Senate—with the help of Democratic defectors. Voting to override were 51 Democrats and 12 Republicans. Supporting the President's veto were 25 Republicans and 10 Democrats.

The vetoed bill had strong support from the nation's mayors and most governors. Milwaukee's Mayor Henry Maier, who led a group of mayors that came to Washington to urge Congress to override the veto, told reporters that the legislation was urgently needed. "Our cities are in desperate financial condition," he said, with unemployment in some sectors of the major cities "as high as 30 and 40 percent."

Maier said the "so-called compromise" backed by the President "won't work." It is hampered by cumbersome restrictions on the use of the money "and it does not address the needs of the cities which are suffering from high unemployment, declining revenues and increased costs."

Energy Plan Termed Key to Independence

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its strong support for the creation of a $100 billion Energy Independence Authority to resolve the energy crisis, warning that the nation "is more vulnerable than ever to oil blackmail."

"Because gasoline lines have disappeared," the Executive Council said, "the nation should not delude itself into believing that the energy crisis is over." It pointed out that domestic production of oil has been declining steadily and dependence on foreign sources has been increasing.

Private industry, left to itself, the council asserted, "cannot and will not resolve the energy crisis. We urge Congress to establish" the authority as proposed by Vice-President Nelson A. Rockefeller to operate through direct loans, loan guarantees, price guarantees and other financial assistance to groups unable to secure private capital.

The council said that the authority should provide assistance for "the whole gamut of energy technologies" including construction of plants that use nuclear, oil, gas and coal, as well as coal liquefaction and gasification, shale oil and solar heat.

It said the corporation should provide financial assistance to convert oil or gas-using power plants to alternative sources of energy, aid in construction of energy efficient buildings and engage directly in the "production and distribution of energy whenever the national interest calls for it and private industry is unwilling or unable to do so."

Unions Gain In Federal Agencies

The number of federal government employes represented by unions rose 58,000 last year to a record 1.2 million.

A Civil Service Commission tally showed unions held bargaining rights for 59 percent of non-postal federal workers as of last November, up from 57 percent the previous year.

Since about 10 percent of the federal workforce is made up of supervisors not eligible for union representation, unions actually hold bargaining rights for close to 70 percent of the eligible workers.

The AFL-CIO affiliated American Federation of Government Employees remained the dominant union in the federal field, holding bargaining rights for 670,000 workers—up 20,000 from the previous year. Its leading unaffiliated competitor, the National Federation of Federal Employees, held bargaining rights for 136,000 workers.

Among the predominantly blue-collar AFL-CIO affiliates, Metal Trades Councils held bargaining rights for 58,600 workers and the Machinists for 32,900 — both higher than the previous year despite a drop in the government's blue-collar workforce.

A number of other AFL-CIO unions represent smaller groups of federal employes. The initial Civil Service Commission tally covered only unions representing more than 30,000 non-postal federal workers.

For the first time, the percentage

Basic Problems Unsolved:

Recession Continues Despite Mild Pickup

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The American economy remains in a very weakened condition with a vast amount of slack after its longest and deepest slide in 40 years, the AFL-CIO warned.

Despite modest improvements since last spring the recession continues, the Executive Council declared.

No basic economic problems have been solved since the economy's brush with near-disaster during the winter of 1974-75, the council statement said.

"Thus, the economy is vulnerable to possible adverse events at home or abroad," the AFL-CIO warned.

Deploring the Ford Administration's "very definite shift to economic restraint," the Executive Council noted that the President's budget proposals for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1 include a $29 billion cut in federal programs below this year's level of services, with spreading adverse impact after the November elections.

The council said that, if the President's program of "go-slow negativism" were adopted, there would be cuts in federal programs concentrated in employment, education, health care, income security and grants-in-aid to state and local governments. And it would lead to "rising unemployment during the latter part of 1977 and the possibility of a deeper recession," the council predicted.

"For seven years, the Nixon and Ford Administrations have given the nation the exact economic medicine once again proposed by the President. The record has been one of failure, recession, unemployment, inflation and huge budget deficits."

The council said that further deficits could be wiped out by a rapid reduction of joblessness, but the Administration has no plans to cut unemployment. Each one percent cut in the jobless rate would reduce the federal budget deficit by about $16 billion—$14 billion in added tax receipts and $2 billion in reduced expenditures for unemployment compensation and welfare, it said.

Action Pushed to Aid Ailing States, Cities

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Decisive federal action to meet "the fiscal emergencies of state and local governments" was called for by the AFL-CIO which warned that failure to act would lead to further deterioration of public facilities and services.

The federation's Executive Council called on Congress to reject proposals to shift responsibility back to the state and localities "for problems that are national in scope and effect." It specifically called for:

- Immediate Senate passage of legislation to provide federal funds to states and localities to protect present public service jobs and provide additional employment in the public and non-profit sectors of the economy.

- Rejection of the Ford proposals to shift present welfare and Medicaid costs to the states and localities, and "immediate substantive relief" through the federal government's "complete assumption of the full cost of Medicaid and welfare."

- Improved formulas under the Revenue Sharing Act to assure that funds are targeted to areas most in need, particularly the nation's urban centers.

- Establishment of a new agency like the Reconstruction Finance

Negative Approach To Needs Assailed

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has subjected the programs and policies of the Ford Administration to searching examination and found them lacking in almost every area of national concern.

This theme emerged from the mid-winter meeting of the Executive Council here as it reviewed the state of the economy, the nation's social needs, international problems, the state of the unions and the preparations for the 1976 elections.

In a series of statements, the council assailed the Administration's go-slow negativism on bringing the country out of recession, the tax and budget policies tied to the long discredited "trickle-down" theory, the failure to help the financially ailing states and cities or to develop an adequate and meaningful housing policy.

It scored the Administration for its phony program on health and social security, its limited approach to improving unemployment insurance and its unfeeling cutbacks on food stamps and programs for children.

Meeting as the Administrative Committee of the Committee on Political Education, the council and members from affiliated unions received a thorough report on the preparation for the 1976 elections—the results of which could bring new programs and policies. AFL-CIO President George Meany said he found COPE organizationally "in the best condition it has ever been in at the beginning of an election year."

Assessing the state of the trade union movement at a press conference, Meany said "I feel that we have good unions, good policies . . . what I am concerned with is not so much the image—we can't control our image—but . . . with the stability and the character of the trade union movement. I look at it and find it quite good."

The AFL-CIO president touched on a number of topics in the wide-open press conferences, including former President Nixon's trip to China. Characterizing Nixon as "the most corrupt President who ever sat in the White House," Meany observed that Nixon travelled thousands of miles outside the country "to criticize our foreign policy, which is something that I don't think anyone should do" especially in a country "where human freedom is denied."

Nixon's actions "are not very friendly toward the Ford Administration for whatever the reason," Meany said, adding that Nixon went to China to criticize the Helsinki agreement, "but I did it here at home quite often and quite loudly."

In international affairs, the council reaffirmed the federation's position of giving the ILO every opportunity to return to its original goals in the next two years before considering terminating membership, warned of blackmail by developing nations that is confusing U.S. foreign policy, called on Western European trade union movements to reject popular front arrangements with "national Communist" parties and reiterated its earlier calls for all-out support for Israel in light of the developments in Lebanon.

The council outlined federation policies on prepaid legal care, highway safety, the Postal Service, airline deregulation, bilingual education, TV reruns, copyright revision and government aid for the arts.

It elected two new members—Angelo Fosco of the Laborers and Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—received a report on the functioning of the Internal

Food Stamps Defended Against 'Vicious Attack'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's unions defended the food stamp program from a "vicious attack" by the Ford Administration and congressional conservatives.

Unemployed workers, many of them "people who once thought they would never need food stamps," depend on the program "to keep their families from going hungry," the AFL-CIO Executive Council stressed.

The food stamp program has been a favorite target of conservatives of all stripes who have sought political mileage by attacking it.

Thus, GOP presidential challenger Ronald Reagan's gibes at the program were topped by Treasury Sec. William Simon, who called it "a haven for cheats and ripoff artists." And on the eve of the New Hampshire primary, Ford announced that the Agriculture Dept. will impose new cutbacks on food stamps by administrative dictate.

The Agriculture Dept. followed through by proposing new regulations that would "save" $1.2 billion by dropping 5 million persons from the food stamp eligibility rolls. Interested parties were given

Labor Pushes Bill for Mail Registration

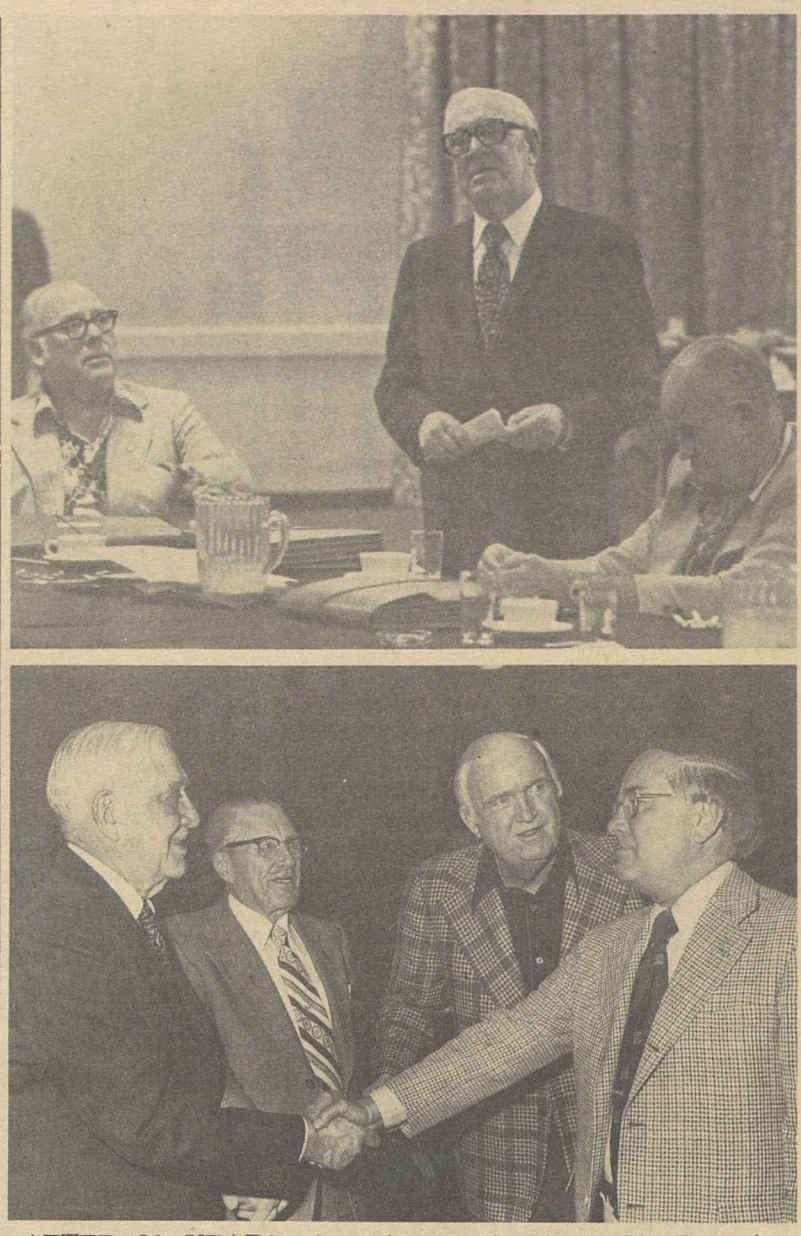
Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO urged prompt action by Congress to enact voter registration by mail to "remove the last artificial barriers to voting that remain among state election laws."

Such action is particularly appropriate in the nation's bicentennial year, the Executive Council said in a statement. It noted that legislation to provide for mail registration in federal elections has already been cleared by House and Senate committees.

The council also refuted objections that have been posed against mail registration, citing a new study by the Ford Foundation of 14 states that have already adopted such legislation. The study shows that mail registration avoids fraud, reduces cost and improves administration procedures, the council said.

It was noted, too, that mail registration improves voter participation—the goal of organized labor in its longstanding effort to get the legislation through Congress and signed into law.

Careful study of the experience of Maryland and Minnesota since mail registration was adopted reveals "only one case of deliberate fraud," the council noted.



"Mail registration is not more costly than traditional procedures," the council said. "In fact it is less costly.

"The average cost in the states studied was $1.54 per registration in 1972 before registration by mail. In 1974, under the new procedures, the average cost dropped to $1.09."

The major administrative gain, the council noted, is that mail registration would space out the workload and avoid "the last-minute registration rush and the burden it imposes on election officials."

The ideal test of the efficacy of the mail registration laws comes in Maryland, the statement said, since it allows county option on use of mail registration. And the Ford Foundation study shows that voter registrations were "substantially higher" in counties using the mail registration.

"Perhaps apathy will always keep some citizens from voting, regardless of what is done to ease procedures," the council said. "But obviously everything reasonable should be done to make the path to the voting booth smooth and direct for all those who wish to participate in the decision-making process in this democracy."

Keenan Bids Farewell In a Moving Moment

Bal Harbour, Fla.—When AFL-CIO Vice President Joseph D. Keenan rose to his feet at the Executive Council session on Feb. 19, 1976, it was a moment of labor history and high emotion. Joe Keenan, 80, was announcing his retirement; he was the last of the vice presidents elected at the merger convention in December 1955.

Keenan told the council in a slightly choked voice what it had meant to him to serve all those years and of the earlier years in the movement, the war years, the years in Germany, the beginning of Labor's League for Political Education, the campaign for decent housing. It was a brief speech made against a backdrop of absolute quiet.

As Keenan finished and sat down at his familiar seat, the council rose as one and applauded him, a demonstration that none could remember previously in the 20 years of the AFL-CIO. The applause was long and fervent and then members came by to shake his hand as a camera shutter clicked.

AFL-CIO President George Meany formally accepted the resignation, named the requisite committee to fill the vacancy and the moment passed into history. But not quite.

The next day Meany was asked at a press conference about his thoughts "on being the only remaining original member" of the council. Meany spoke of his regret at Keenan's retirement, noting they had worked together for "many, many years." Tracing Keenan's career, Meany said "he's been into everything. He's been a very busy man and a hard worker—very, very sincere. It is with great regret that I saw him depart yesterday. That's the last of the vice presidents of the original merger back in 1955. As for myself, it is just a reminder that, some day, that day is going to come true to me."

The council marked the occasion further with a special resolution noting that "the history of the trade union movement and this nation will record that Joe Keenan well and truly served his fellow man, his union, the entire trade union movement and his country." The council thanked Joe Keenan "on behalf of the millions of workers and others whose lives have been enriched and whose futures have been made more secure by his long and dedicated service."

Fosco, Pillard Elected To Executive Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council elected two new vice presidents and members of the council filling vacancies caused by death and retirement.

The council elected Angelo Fosco, president of the Laborers, and Charles H. Pillard, president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. They replace Peter Fosco of the Laborers who died in October 1975, and Joseph D. Keenan, who announced his retirement at the council meeting. Keenan served as secretary of the IBEW.

Angelo Fosco, 54, is a native of Chicago where he served for more than 25 years in a variety of posts in the Laborers, including seven years as a vice president and manager of the Chicago regional office. He was elected general president of the union on Oct. 30, 1975.

He serves on the executive board of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and is also a member of the executive council of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Pillard, 57, is a native of Buffalo who served as business manager of Local Union 41 in Buffalo after holding a number of other posts. He was elected a member of the IBEW Executive Council in 1961 and appointed to the presidency in 1968, winning election to the post at the union's 1970 convention.

He serves as a vice president of the Building & Construction Trades, Metal Trades and Industrial Union departments of the AFL-CIO and on the executive board of the National Council of Senior Citizens. He has been a member of numerous industry and governmental commissions.

Weapon Against Recession:

Congress Pressed To Retain Tax Cut

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO asked Congress to avert a job-destroying income tax rise in mid-year by extending present withholding rates. But it termed President Ford's demand for matching budget cuts to accompany any tax "reduction" a political maneuver intended "as an excuse to dismantle vitally needed social programs."

The tax cut enacted last year kept the nation's economy from plunging even deeper into recession, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said. "In light of continued high unemployment and the need for consumer purchasing power, the tax cut cannot be allowed to lapse in June."

Its statement reiterated labor's call for tax justice. "Despite years of rhetoric, campaign promises and some small improvements recently adopted by Congress," the council said, "the federal tax structure continues to be riddled with injustices."

As examples, it noted cases of individuals with incomes over $1 million paying no taxes, corporations with hundreds of millions of dollars in profit going untaxed, and U.S.-based multinational corporations paying an effective tax rate of only 4.2 percent on earnings abroad.

Such inequities mean that "working families pay much more than their fair share of the load," the Executive Council said.

This imbalance would be compounded under the Ford Administration proposals for "new tax giveaways to benefit corporations, banks and wealthy individuals," the statement charged.

The corporate share of the nation's income taxes has slipped from one-third of the total in the 1960s to about 25 percent in recent years, the council said. It noted that the Administration wants the corporate share of the tax load reduced to less than 20 percent by 1981.

Labor's call to Congress to move ahead on tax justice asked that "top priority" be given to eliminating tax subsidies for overseas operations of multinationals.

"These preferences have eroded the tax structure, destroyed American jobs, spurred the outflow of U.S. capital, technology and know-how."

It urged an end to the indefinite tax deferral privileges of multinationals and called for elimination of the Domestic International Sales Corp. program, a special tax deferment opportunity on export profits.

Other planks in labor's tax reform platform included:

- Ending the depreciation speed-up enacted in 1971 that is costing the government $1.5 billion a year in revenue. Furthermore, the $8 billion-a-year investment tax credit to business "should be ended as soon as the economy returns to high levels of production and employment."
- Closing the capital gains loophole that taxes profits from stock or property sales at half the normal rate.
- Substituting a less costly direct interest subsidy on state and local bonds for the present tax exemption "which benefits only banks and the very wealthy."
- Limiting the corporate surtax exemption to small corporations.
- Ending an assortment of tax provisions which benefit only the wealthy, closing big loopholes in federal estate and gift taxes, and strengthening the requirements for a minimum tax payment from the wealthy who otherwise would pay little or no taxes.

The Executive Council noted that some "small steps" taken in 1969 toward reducing some of the major tax loopholes "were completely reversed" in 1971 by "the Nixon Administration's tax giveaways to business."

Nursing Home Scandal Prompts Clean-Up Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A national effort to clean up the nation's nursing homes will be mobilized by the AFL-CIO to focus the country's attention on what has become a scandal and a national disgrace.

The federation's Executive Council said it is time for action and called on all AFL-CIO state and local bodies working through their community services committees "to investigate conditions in nursing homes" and touch off remedial action at the local, state and federal levels.

The council pointed out that the AFL-CIO and other groups have long pressed for legislative and administrative action. The AFL-CIO has testified on many occasions and exposed "fraud and ripoffs" in its publications, the council said.

There are some good nursing homes, especially among those operated on a non-profit basis, the statement said, but scandals continue to mount. "Unscrupulous nursing home operators, medical laboratories, clinics, doctors, medical appliance salesmen and insurance company executives are skimming their share off the top of the Medicare and Medicaid programs, reducing care for the elderly and subverting public support for these important programs."

The council called on AFL-CIO state and local bodies to work on the nursing home investigations with the National Council of Senior Citizens and other like-minded organizations. The objective is not the "spit-and-polish tours," but getting inside the homes for talks with patients and employes and getting answers to a checklist of important questions on the nature and quality of the care, the statement stressed.

"We will encourage our local committees to make their findings public," the council said, in order to achieve action by official investigatory bodies. It added that the AFL-CIO will compile the findings on a national basis and make a report to the Congress."

The federation program is no substitute, the statement said, "for the extensive investigations which the Administration can and should have undertaken, and which it has shamefully ignored."

The council said it hoped to achieve extensive congressional investigations of the conditions in nursing homes and the frauds committed against Medicare and Medicaid.

Ford Program Branded Total Failure

Council Denounces Go-Slow Negativism

Disputes Plan and heard two appeals under the plan, called for binding arbitration to settle the Washington Post strike, and rallied support for the Textile Workers in their long battle with J.P. Stevens.

Meany, in sessions with reporters, touched on the growth of corporate corruption (see editorial, Page 6) and the Agricultural Dept.'s inability to administer the food stamp program, calling for a congressional investigation to determine the "real culprits."

He termed President Ford's veto of the public works bill and the failure of Congress to override a "sad commentary on our system where 515 elected representatives of government meet and 382 of them disagree with the President and only 133 agree with him, and still the President prevails in his policy of callous disregard for the condition of the unemployed."

He commented that collective bargaining is not in jeopardy in the cities, particularly New York City, because of the financial crisis, that "if the unions gave up the right to bargain collectively that wouldn't cure New York City's present problem" brought on by losing taxpayers, a squeeze by the banks and the general economic picture.

Asked about the effectiveness of the Right to Work Committee, he said "their main job is to issue propaganda and to collect money. . . . They get money. We get people. And I'll bet on people against money any time."

In other actions the council upheld Meany on his ruling that the elections in Directly Affiliated Local Union 3036 were valid. The local is made up of New York City taxi drivers, and the appeal by the losing candidate also was carried to the Labor Dept. and rejected by the government agency as well.

It voted also to issue a charter to the School Administrators & Supervisors Organizing Committee set up four years ago. The new union, with 44 locals in 14 states and a membership of about 9,000, will be known as the American Federation of School Administrators & Supervisors. The group has scheduled a convention for July in New York.

The council voted contributions of varying amounts to the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, CARE, National Council for Resource Recovery, National Urban League, Atlantic Council, Southern Regional Council, National Housing Conference, Committee for National Health Insurance, National Council on Crime & Delinquency, Conference for Economic Progress, National Urban Coalition, Full Employment Conference, United Way of D.C., National Council of Senior Citizens, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Resource Center for Consumers of Legal Services, NAACP, United Negro College Fund, Asian-American Free Labor Institute Impact Fund.

The council set the next meeting for May 19 in Washington.

INTERNATIONAL ISSUES were aired during a visit to the Executive Council meeting in Florida by Scandinavian trade union leaders. Conferring with AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland is Thomas Neilsen, president of the Danish Federation of Trade Unions (LO-Denmark). Others in the delegation were Chairman Pekha Oivio and Kari Tapiola of the Confederation of Finnish Trade Unions; President Gunner Nilsson and Thornbjerg Carlssen of LO-Sweden; President Lennart Bodstroeum of the Swedish Central Organization of Salaried Employees, and Kjeld Aekjaer of LO-Denmark.

Prepaid Legal Service Group Gets Backing

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Resource Center for Consumers of Legal Services, established to help union and other groups set up prepaid legal service delivery plans, has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

The Executive Council recommends that all affiliates support the center in developing effective programs of information, guidance and assistance in the area of legal services.

The council noted that the labor movement is "concerned with the quality and cost of legal services" for workers. It said that prepaid group legal service has been incorporated into the collective bargaining programs of a number of unions.

These prepaid plans, whether union or community sponsored, the statement said, benefit the union member in contrast to the open-ended, fee-for-service arrangement that permits no cost controls and would "lead to the same kind of runaway cost escalation many unions have suffered in fee-for-service medical programs."

'Government by Minority' Prevails on Public Works

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the failure to override President Ford's veto of the Public Works bill, Feb. 20, 1976, Bal Harbour, Fla.

Yesterday's vote in the Senate means America has government by minority. The desires of more than two-thirds of the House and almost two-thirds of the Senate, to put America back to work, were once again thwarted.

The failure of the Senate to override the President's veto of the Public Works bill is a tragic loss for the American people.

The President may consider he won a political victory. We believe he has further damaged the economy and we consider it further evidence that America must have a President who understands the needs of the people and has some compassion for them.

It will now be harder than ever to restore health to the economy. But we will not stop fighting for the jobs America needs to achieve full employment, full production and a balanced economy.

We believe that on Election Day 1976, the American people will vote for candidates for the presidency and the Congress who have compassion for the jobless and a determination to put the nation back to work.

Washington Post Urged to Abandon Union-Busting Against Pressmen

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on the Washington Post to agree to final and binding arbitration of its dispute with the Printing Pressmen and "retrieve its reputation for fairness in labor-management relations."

The council unanimously adopted a statement tracing the history of the five-month-old strike and the paper's planned and "vicious campaign" to break the Pressmen's union, commenting that "the Post's liberalism can't be expressed on its editorial pages in defense of human rights and then denied in its labor relations policies."

Pointing out that the union has agreed to a final and binding arbitration approach recommended by a citizens' committee, the council urged the Post to "do likewise."

AFL-CIO President George Meany, asked by reporters if there was any possibility that the paper would consider binding arbitration, said "we hope in the long run the Post will be forced by public opinion to reconsider their position . . . we will do whatever we can to be helpful. We will keep the pressure on the Post and hope that somewhere down the line this business will change."

Meany told reporters of his personal efforts to convince Post publisher Katharine Graham to accept binding arbitration and that she "adamantly refused to even consider it." He said the Post's plans were well laid out in advance and that "it was quite obvious to me the management of the Post never intended to bargain in good faith."

The council statement also stressed this point, declaring that "it is clear that the Post management wanted a strike, hoped for a strike and long planned to replace union members with scabs trained especially in an effort to break the pressmen's union."

The Post refused to engage in real collective bargaining and presented the union with a take-it-or-leave-it proposal "which destroyed working standards achieved over the years and eliminated the jobs of many workers," the statement said.

The charges of violence against Post property, the council said, "can and should be adjudicated in the courts" but have been used as "an alibi for not engaging in genuine collective bargaining."

The paper had earlier rejected a recommendation by a committee of leading citizens for arbitration, declaring it would serve no useful purpose.

Pointing to the Post's carefully laid plans against the Pressmen, Meany said that the paper's final offer to the union before advertising for replacements was more unfavorable than the original offer in August guaranteeing the union's rejection. "I don't think they (the Post) had any illusions about what would happen to the offer," he said.

The AFL-CIO President, asked by a reporter to explain why a number of pressmen who staged a sit-in at the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington Feb. 20 were ordered removed, said: "I was not in touch with these people although members of my staff were there, and they were there all day. They (the pressmen) insisted that they were going to stay there until they got some kind of a statement from me. And they delivered what they characterized as an ultimatum. I refused to respond.

"I don't know what they expected me to say, but when the time came for closing the building, the police told these people that once the building was closed they couldn't stay there. Some of them left quietly and others were escorted out by the police. And that was on orders of one of my staff of which I approved."

Special Panel Appointed To Aid in Stevens Talks

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has created a special subcommittee of its members to work with the Textile Workers and the Industrial Union Dept. to help employes of the J. P. Stevens & Co. at Roanoke Rapids, N.C., secure a contract.

Federation President George Meany announced that the panel would be composed of AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Murray H. Finley, James T. Housewright and Edward T. Hanley.

The subcommittee, which may be expanded, will develop an action program to help the Stevens workers in their struggle with the notoriously anti-union company, submitting its recommendations to the federation's executive officers.

"No U.S. company is a more consistent, more willful, more malicious violator of the labor laws of this country than J. P. Stevens & Co.," the Executive Council declared.

The Textile Workers won bargaining rights for some 3,600 employes of Stevens's seven plants in the Roanoke Rapids area more than a year ago, but the workers still are without a contract.

Twice Stevens has been cited by a federal appeals court for refusal to bargain in Roanoke Rapids, but still it continues to "go through the motions of only superficial bargaining," the council charged.

The National Labor Relations Board has found Stevens guilty of massive violations of the law 13 times. Eight times these decisions were upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals and three times by the U.S. Supreme Court.

"Stevens's actions are unprecedented in modern labor relations," the council said. "It is, without question, the nation's number one scofflaw.

"Even today, Stevens thumbs its nose at the law of the land. Hundreds of pro-union employes have been discharged; coercion and intimidation run rampant."

The council observed that in their 13-year struggle to organize and build a union of their own, the 46,000 workers employed by Stevens have looked to the labor movement for help and support.

"We will not abandon them," the council said.

REPORT ON PREPARATIONS for this year's elections and political campaigns is reviewed by the Administrative Committee of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education at Bal Harbour, Fla. In addition to Executive Council members, the session heard from COPE representatives of federation affiliates on registration and get-out-the vote efforts.

Key Standards Lacking In Jobless Benefits Bill

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An unemployment insurance bill awaiting House action fails to remedy "glaring deficiencies" in the 50 state programs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It urged Congress to add to the bill federal standards covering the amount of unemployment benefits, duration of benefits, and rules for eligibility.

The council noted some good features in the bill drawn up by the House Ways & Means Committee. Coverage would be extended to an additional 9.5 million workers, including public employes, farm workers and domestics. The wage base on which employers are taxed would be raised from the present $4,200 limit to $8,000. This would bring in funds to replenish recession-drained reserves and finance higher benefits.

But "substantial improvements" are needed before Congress completes action on the legislation, the AFL-CIO insisted.

The council reiterated its advocacy of a single federalized unemployment compensation system. But "until that step is taken," it asked Congress to improve the Ways & Means Committee bill by:

- Setting minimum weekly benefits at two-thirds of former wages up to 75 percent of the average state wage.
- Providing a benefit duration of at least 26 weeks for every jobless worker who has had 20 weeks of employment or more.
- Replacing the present federal-state extended unemployment compensation that is triggered by high jobless rates with a 100 percent federally financed system. The extended benefits of up to 26 weeks should be available to all workers who exhaust their regular state benefits. It should be coordinated with job counseling, training, skills upgrading, rehabilitation if needed, relocation assistance and job placement.
- Strengthening the financing of the system in future years to gradually reach the same taxable wage base used by the social security system.
- Eliminating "harsh and arbitrary disqualifications" and assuring "a full hearing before any worker is disqualified for any reason."

The council also urged that Congress extend unemployment compensation to new entrants into the labor force and to former workers seeking re-entry.

Copyright Law Change Asked To Aid Artists

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO looked to the House to include in a pending revision of the copyright law "provisions guaranteeing performing artists a share in the profits made from commercial exploitation of their creative efforts."

A non-controversial bill that the Senate passed, 97-0, on Feb. 19 takes a few small steps in the direction the AFL-CIO and its performing arts unions have urged.

It includes a requirement that cable television operators pay for the privilege of picking up programs broadcast over the airwaves. It requires for the first time royalty payments from jukebox operators and raises the royalty payments on phonograph records.

But most of these benefits flow only to the composers and lyricists and not to performers even though it may be their unique talent that makes a work popular.

The Executive Council statement noted that "performing artists receive nothing for their work that is captured in sound recordings, tapes and films to be exploited by broadcasters, juke box operators and others." Their only payment comes from the sale of the records they have made, with no extra payment if a record is broadcast to hundreds of thousands of listeners.

It termed the fact that performing artists do not share in the distribution of royalties "unjust and inequitable."

The House has not yet acted on copyright law revision.

Highway Safety Support Pushed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Wide support and cooperation is essential in the nationwide campaign to reduce the needless slaughter of 50,000 Americans on the highways each year, the Executive Council declared.

Noting that hundreds of thousands more are injured in accidents, the council said strict enforcement of the 55 mile-an-hour speed limit would help make roads safer and reduce energy consumption.

The council called on union members and all Americans to participate in community programs to promote highway safety. It also urged Congress to immediately extend the Highway Safety Act.

Council Votes Aid To Quake Victims

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO voted $50,000 for Guatemala earthquake relief and will ask all its affiliates to join in the effort with their own contributions.

AFL-CIO President George Meany said the funds will be sent to the Guatemalan unions in the form of blankets, tents, hand tools and other items that they need to rebuild their homes and gain some shelter.

Federal Aid Held Vital to States, Cities

Corp. to provide government guarantees of state and local bonds as well as loan guarantees and low-interest, long-term loans for the preservation and creation of jobs in the private sector, including housing.

The council called also for overriding the President's veto of the public works bill which would have provided $2.5 billion in funds to states and cities, an attempt that fell three votes short in the Senate.

The council statement laid the fiscal crisis in the states and cities squarely on the doorstep of the Nixon-Ford policies that created back-to-back recessions, continuing inflation, usurious interest rates and massive unemployment.

It noted the rise in joblessness at the state and local level, the reduction in hours, the freezes on personnel and wages, and the rejection of bond issues by both the money markets and the voters coming with an end of meaningful federal government help in the early 1970s.

The huge costs of welfare and Medicaid borne by the states and localities have been greatly magnified by the Nixon-Ford recession, the council said, and even with slashes in health services and welfare payments the increased financial burden on the states and cities has been "intolerable." The council analysis concluded:

"The financial problems of state and local governments are not insoluble, but they cannot be resolved by Administration rhetoric, media distortion, cuts in public services or by making public employes scapegoats. Resolution of these problems rests most importantly on a national commitment to end the disastrous economic policies of the Nixon-Ford Administration and return to a full employment, full production, balanced economy."

Hidden Jobless:

AFL-CIO to Report Real Unemployment

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO charged that the government's official monthly statistics on unemployment "seriously understate" the true extent of joblessness, and announced that henceforth each month it will calculate the "real measure" of unemployment in the nation.

"Unemployment has been much greater and has had a much wider impact on American families than the Administration admits," the Executive Council declared.

The AFL-CIO has for some time criticized the Bureau of Labor Statistics for its failure to factor into the jobless rate the large number of "discouraged" workers who have left the labor market and part-time workers who are involuntarily without employment part of the workweek.

The federation also questions BLS's new seasonal adjustments of reported statistics, claiming the revisions distort changes in the jobless rate and produce statistical "gimmickry."

"The vast economic and social waste of human resources caused by unemployment must not be understated," the council declared.

"If the statistics more accurately reflected the range and depth of the unemployment problem in the United States, the American people would have a better understanding of the personal hardship and tragedy that joblessness causes."

Citing official BLS reports, the council noted there was an average of 7,830,000 workers without jobs each month in 1975, or 8.5 percent of the nation's workforce of 92,613,000. But during the same period there also was an average 1,082,000 workers too discouraged about job prospects to continue their search for work.

The government counts such workers every three months but substantially understates their number because many inner-city residents are missed by the counts, the council said.

"This number of discouraged jobless workers is not even added to the Labor Dept.'s official report on the number of unemployed," the statement pointed out.

"If these discouraged workers had been added to the jobless total in 1975, the average number of unemployed would have been 8,912,000, 9.5 percent of the adjusted civilian labor force of 93,695,000—or about one out of every 11 workers."

Even this accounts for only part of the understatement of the official jobless figures, the council said, because BLS does not give proper weight to the number of "involuntary part-time" workers counted each month.

In 1975, BLS reported an average of 3,748,000 workers were compelled to work part-time because full-time work was not available for them, the council noted.

But the government officially counts a worker as "employed" even if he works for as little as one hour during the surveyed week. Last year 3,748,000 workers put in an average workweek of approximately half the standard 40 hours.

"In terms of time worked, therefore, half the number of 'involuntary part-time' workers should be considered as unemployed," the AFL-CIO said.

"Adding that figure to the adjusted unemployment total, there were 10,786,000 unemployed people, 11.5 percent of the civilian labor force, or about one out of every nine workers."

Thus, the Executive Council concluded, 11.5 percent—not 8.5 percent—is the true measure of unemployment for 1975 when President Ford vetoed a series of job-creating bills "and condemned millions of Americans to the tragedy and waste of prolonged joblessness."

The council noted that not even the true measure of joblessness adequately reflects the impact of unemployment on workers and their families, since many workers are hit by two or more periods of layoff in a single year.

Council Stresses Effort To Restore ILO Integrity

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The American labor movement is determined to build an "effective working alliance of free workers, employers and governments within the International Labor Organization" to restore it to its original purposes and organizational integrity.

But the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that if that effort should fail "continued U.S. membership in that body will no longer serve any useful purpose and should be terminated."

The council pointed out that the ILO has within it both progressive and regressive elements in open confrontation and that the issue is clear and precise:

"Either the ILO must return to the constitutional tripartite purposes and procedures which have made it the hope of oppressed working men and women the world over, or it will continue to slide into the control of the dictatorships and monolithic governmental powers whose oppression of workers is current as well as historic.

"For these reasons, the AFL-CIO, together with the government and employers' organization of the U.S. has committed itself to a two-year undertaking, the thrust of which is to restore the ILO to its original purposes and organizational integrity."

The council said that "no honorable means will be left untried" to reverse the course charted by those nations seeking to enslave workers and to destroy their human rights.

The U.S. government filed the required two-year notice of terminating its membership in the ILO on Nov. 6, 1975, in a letter from Sec. of State Henry Kissinger.

Women in Workforce Double Total of 1950

The number of women in the civilian labor force has nearly doubled since 1950, the Labor Dept. said, with women workers numbering 35.8 million.

At the same time, jobless rates for women generally are higher than for men, the department notes.

Basic Problems Unsolved:

Recession Continues to Sap Nation's Economic Vitality

Instead of solving the problem of inflation, the council added, the President's austerity approach to the budget and economic needs will aggravate it. The council said it agreed with Dr. David L. Grove, vice president and chief economist of International Business Machines, who told the House budget committee on Jan. 27:

"In my judgment, the inflation rate over the next few years will not be made worse by more expansionary policies. . . . In fact, running the economy at too low a level too long may well make inflation more intractable.

"The smaller the size of the pie, the more intense is likely to be the struggle over shares. In addition, the smaller will be the growth in productivity. . . . Finally, investment may be inadequate to prevent many future bottlenecks and shortages unless the near-term economic environment improves."

Unemployment in January, officially reported as 7.3 million workers, or 7.8 percent, is undoubtedly much higher, the council said. A true measure of unemployment would put the jobless rate at 10.6 percent, it said, since the government does not count discouraged workers and ignores millions of others who are involuntarily working part-time because they cannot find full-time jobs.

But even at 7.3 million unemployed workers, or a jobless rate of 7.8 percent, unemployment last month was higher than in any earlier period since 1941, when the economy was emerging from the Great Depression.

Industry was operating at only 71 percent of its productive capacity in the last three months of 1975, according to the Federal Reserve Board.

"This under-use of America's industrial capacity, as figured on an annual basis by the conservative Dept. of Commerce, represents a loss of $221 billion—or $1,000 per man, woman and child," the council said.

A large number of banks and large companies, as well as most large cities and some state governments, are financially strained. Forced liquidations, such as that involving the W. T. Grant chain, threaten other firms, the council observed.

Meanwhile, the nation still has no comprehensive energy policy more than two years after the Arab oil embargo, and the country is more dependent on imported oil than it was at that time.

Benefits under the unemployment insurance system served as cushions and prevented a complete collapse of purchasing power for millions of families at the depth of the recession, the council said. The combination of last year's tax rebates, payments to retired people and lower tax withholdings on paychecks lifted consumer confidence and provided a measure of stimulus to the economy.

But, the council declared, the economy urgently needs substantial measures to create jobs and generate incomes "to restore the confidence of the American people in their government's ability to manage the economy and to lift the economy to full employment, full production and balanced growth."

Among the proposals of the Executive Council were the following:

- Congressional passage of an expanded public-service employment program for the unemployed.
- Continuation of the lower withholding tax rate past July 1 when the lower rate is scheduled to end.
- Full implementation of the government's housing programs to boost residential construction and prevent the further spread of today's housing shortage.
- Lower interest rates and a sufficient growth of the money supply to promote rapid expansion of the economy and job opportunities. Congress should direct the Federal Reserve System to achieve these ends. It should also direct the Fed to allocate available credit for such high-priority purposes as housing, state and local government needs and business investment in essential plant and equipment, while curbing the flow of credit for land speculation, inventory-housing and foreign subsidiaries.
- An increase in the federal minimum wage to $3 an hour, plus an automatic escalator provision for the future.
- Job programs especially designed for unemployed youths.
- A comprehensive energy policy and program to reduce rapidly the nation's dependence on imported oil and to establish U.S. energy independence.
- A new government agency, along the lines of the Reconstruction Finance Corp., to provide long-term low-interest loans in the private sector as well as to assist state and local governments.
- Authorization and appropriation of federal funds for the restoration of railroad track and roadbeds.
- Basic improvements in the outmoded unemployment insurance system.
- An end to major loopholes in the federal tax structure to raise as much as $20 billion of additional federal revenue and to take a giant step towards achieving tax justice.

Firm Policy Demanded On Foreign Blackmail

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on the Administration and Congress to set a firm course on foreign policy that will not yield to threats of blackmail by developing nations.

The Executive Council declared that it is "essential that the developing nations of the Third, Fourth and even Fifth World understand that U.S. foreign policy does not yield to blackmail and that it will confront the enemies of freedom with firmness."

The council warned that U.S. government confusion and ambivalence, "cloaked by an official policy of detente," defeats our national policy and weakens the free world.

The council statement pointed out that a growing number of leaders of developing nations "have imposed authoritarian regimes, maintaining power through the forceful suppression of human rights and democratic institutions." Many of these nations seek economic and military aid to buttress despotic leadership and inept management rather than to alleivate human suffering, the council said.

The governments of many developing nations frequently "employ the blackmail threat of alignment with the Communist dictatorships, principally the Soviet Union," the council declared. The Soviet Union is successfully expanding its influence through weak regimes dependent on Soviet subsidies and arms, it added.

Angola, it noted, has fallen to Soviet control because of the opportunity created by Portugese withdrawal, and the control is enforced by Soviet weapons "manned by Cuban proxies."

The United States, the council said, is in the position of making the decision on the "final state of world politics and economics for the remainder of this century" because there is no single nation, "and no visible cohesion between capable free nations," that will undertake to preserve human rights and human freedom when confronted by conservative and regressive dictatorships, principally the Soviet Union. The U.S. government must awaken to this situation, the council stresed, if the prospect of global warfare is to be kept at a safe distance.

Food Stamps Defended Against 'Vicious Attack'

until Mar. 29 to comment on the proposed changes. But a legal challenge to the attempt to bypass Congress is expected before then.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told reporters covering the Executive Council meeting that the Agriculture Dept. is the chief culprit for not cracking down on fraud if there has been any significant amount of chiseling. But Meany said it would be "unconscionable . . . to punish all of the people who depend on the food stamp program to keep their children from going hungry."

In fact, as the council resolution noted, the government has found fraud in less than one-tenth of 1 percent of participating households. On the other side of the coin. the council said, millions of families are eligible for food stamps but are not receiving them.

There were signs, however, that the wild-swinging conservative attacks on the program were having an impact in Congress.

A year ago, the Agriculture Dept. tried to make poor families pay more for food stamps and a bill blocking that move was quickly rushed through both the House and Senate by margins so big that Ford did not bother to veto it.

But on Feb. 24, the Senate Agriculture Committee approved a bill that would force more than 3.5 million families from the food stamp rolls and make most others pay more for their stamps.

While not as drastic as an Administration-backed bill that would cut off nearly 10 million of the 18.5 million persons now being helped, it would bring the test of eligibility close to the poverty level. At present, many families with modest earnings but heavy esential expenses are able to buy food stamps at a discount.

The committee bill would also count family earnings in the 30 days before application for food stamps in determining current income—in effect disqualifying persons who recently lost their jobs. An even more stringent 90-day retroactive income test is proposed by the Administration.

The Agriculture Committee bill is certain to be the target of amendments from both friends and hard-core foes of the food stamp program when it reaches the Senate floor, probably about mid-March.

The Executive Council statement suggested that one area for legitimate reform would be to crack down on fraud by food stamp vendors—including banks and other institutions that sell the stamps to the poor, but sometimes have been found lax about turning the money over to the government. "Food stamp money is for feeding the poor and not for making stamp vendors rich at the expense of the taxpayers," the AFL-CIO said.

'National Communism' Seen New Soviet Ploy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on the democratic trade union leadership of Western Europe "to awaken to the danger" of popular fronts or coalitions with Communist parties—"the worst enemies of free labor."

The council adopted a statement calling attention to the appeal of so-called "national communism" to some democratic political elements and leaders of some free trade unions in Western Europe, especially Italy and France. These leaders seem to think, the council said, that "national communism" signifies a change in the "nature of totalitarian force," that Communists participating in an Italian government would not seek to change democratic procedures.

These professions of a "new liberalism," the council said, "have captured the imaginations of many West European Socialists and Christian Democrats who would perfer to take on new allies in the Communists rather than coalesce against them."

The council warned that an unwillingness to close ranks and form a common defense against the "Soviet-directed CP effort in the West will lead to a willingness to accept 'national communism' as they have accepted the illusion of detente."

The Soviet efforts in Italy, France, Spain and Portugal "are related totalitarian models, deadly in their intent," the council declared, adding that these Soviet initiatives, designed to weaken the structure of democracy in Europe, "will certainly lead to Soviet conquests" as the USSR assimilates nations ruled by 'national Communist' parties."

U.S. Aid Termed Critical To Assure Israel's Safety

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The world today cannot accept a PLO terrorist gang in the family of nations," the AFL-CIO declared, strongly reaffirming its call for every necessary economic and military assistance to maintain Israel as a viable, democratic state.

The Executive Council emphasized that Syria and the Palestine Liberation Organization are playing "a deadly game" with the sovereignty and integrity of Lebanon with the ultimate purpose of creating a hostile community on Israel's northern border. Other enemies of Israel, the council said, are seeking military and economic credits from the United States to try and create a divided U.S. foreign policy based on "sales and greed."

Under these stresses Israel is becoming increasingly tense "knowing that its very existence depends upon the unstinting support of the U.S. to preserve its freedom." That support must be continued and extended until Israel's security is assured and internationally recognized, the council said.

Oregon AFL-CIO Shifts Headquarters Office

Salem, Ore.—The headquarters office of the Oregon AFL-CIO has moved to 530 Center St. here. State AFL-CIO President R. G. Kennedy said the phone numbers and zip code will not change.

The state federation's main office has been located at 105 High St. S.E. in Salem since 1966 and a sub-office was maintained in Portland until this year.

Corporate Morality

THIS NATION WAS FOUNDED by people who believed in certain moral standards. The American people as a whole are opposed to bribery and corruption.

The record of America's large corporations, the record of corporate morality that has been exposed in the last few years, is very, very discouraging. I think that American corporations that go abroad and take the position that the only way they can do business abroad is by bribing public officials, that this certainly does not square with American moral standards. I think Congress should take a look at it.

I think if it's a crime for a corporation to pass out a bribe to a public official in this country, it should be a crime for a corporation to pass out a bribe to a public official in another country, especially in view of the fact that these corporations enjoy a great tax advantage by doing business abroad.

One particular corporation is operating under a large loan that they negotiated, that is guaranteed by the federal government. And at the same time they have admitted that they gave millions of dollars to officials of other governments in order to do business.

NOW THIS IDEA that that is the only way you can do business—that there is nothing to be done about it—this is like taking a drug addict with a real drug habit, needing a certain amount of money every day to support that habit, and excusing them by saying, "Well, it's too bad. They have to have this money and they have to steal."

I think something should be done about corporate morality in this country. I think the American people have been disillusioned by government officials. I think the administration of President Nixon did almost irreparable damage to the American political structure.

People have absolutely no confidence—not only no confidence, they have no respect for public officials. And I think what Nixon did to the structure—the deceit that he practiced—I don't think it ended with his resignation.

Now we find that American corporations, which people are supposed to look up to, these great giants of industry, stooped to common crimes in order to do business. I think it's bad. I think it's bad for the future of the country. I think it's bad for the young people. They not only have no confidence in American officials, they are going to get to the point where they will have absolutely no confidence in any one connected with a large American corporation.

'Then Why Do I Feel So Bad?'

A Word Edgewise:

New Book Catches All Sides Of LBJ's Complex Personality

By John P. Roche

THE MORNING AFTER one of his symphonies had been savaged by the music critics, a group of friends came to commiserate with the great Finnish composer Jean Sibelius. To their surprise, he was jovially eating breakfast. As they began to complain about the unfairness of the criticism, Sibelius interrupted them with a great laugh: "Come now," he said, "have you ever seen a statue of a critic?"

What brought this to mind is the rough treatment that various intellectuals have accorded Jack Valenti's quite moving book about President Lyndon Johnson, "A Very Human President" (Norton). Writing in the New York Sunday Times Magazine in 1964—long before Vietnam was an issue—I noted the utterly irrational demons that LBJ loosed among the intelligentsia. Now, even though he is dead, the quest for psychic revenge continues and manifests itself in nasty cushion-shots at anyone who says a good word about the late President.

Jack Valenti, who began in advertising and public relations and is now president of the Motion Picture Association, has not written as a political scientist, a psycho-biographer, or a hagiographer. As a fellow-Texan, aide, and intimate friend, he has given us Lyndon Johnson—warts and all. Curiously his portrait of LBJ is far more complete and penetrating than his observations about various Johnson staffers, to whom he is uniformly kind. (In my judgment several richly deserve to be dropkicked over the Washington Monument.) But precisely because Valenti shared the same set of givens as Johnson, his book catches the elemental qualities of the man in a fashion impossible to any intellectual. Any intellectual (myself included) confronting this man of a thousand masks is in the position of a color-blind critic evaluating Van Gogh.

The closest anyone has yet come to catching the essential Johnson was Harry C. McPherson in his superb "A Political Education"—a book which went into the critical black-hole because he made the mistake of suggesting that Lyndon Johnson was not Attila the Hun. For those interested in a composite, I would suggest a back-to-back package of McPherson and Valenti. The former shows Johnson, the head-counter, the political wizard, the administrative paranoid—that is, the Senator, Vice President and then President in his various professional capacities. Valenti, demonstrating that art reflects life, gives us all six-feet, four-inches of one of the most unnervingly complex characters I have ever encountered; a man—so my bias may be clear—whom I held in deep affection.

The style—which has brought urbane guffaws at this hick-author—is in fact perfect: It is Johnson's style. It is loaded with superlatives—both negative (LBJ's scatological character analyses were awe-inspiring) and positive (for example, the inscription in my copy of his 1967 "Messages to Congress": "To my dear trusted friend John Roche—who has done much to strengthen and comfort me.") What critics fail to understand is that this was authentic Johnsonia, not fake schmaltz. One minute his flinty eyes would bore through you like laser beams; half an hour later, they might be filled with tears. (I know: I prepared for his signature letters to the widows of the astronauts burned in the Cape Kennedy tragedy, and to a number of mothers whose sons died in Vietnam. He didn't have a tear-machine.)

THERE IS SOME IRONY here, too, though I doubt if it was conscious. I had compared the 1967 State of the Union Address to a Sears-Roebuck catalog and suggested it be cut in half. Similarly, McPherson and I were constantly trying to eliminate the interminable shopping-lists our boss was so fond of sending Congress. If this sniping gave him "strength and comfort," he never made a point of it at the time. But all of a sudden the volume turned up on my desk and, I confess, I appreciated it, despite my reservations on its contents.

Valenti catches this ambivalence, his pettiness, his towering rages and unconscionable bullying of some staff, but puts it all into a context which includes his unpredictable warmth and generosity, his caution in risky situations, his computer-mind, and his devotion to the old, the sick, the black, and Chicanos, and the poor.

These people don't buy books or write reviews, but their memory of Lyndon Johnson is the kind of monument I'm sure he would prefer.

Vulnerable to Relapse:

Worst Recession in 40 Years Leaves Economy Ailing, Fragile

Excerpts from a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 20, 1976, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

DESPITE MODEST IMPROVEMENTS since last spring, the American economy remains in a weakened condition, with a vast amount of slack, after the longest and deepest recessionary decline in 40 years. Thus, the economy is vulnerable to possible adverse events at home or abroad.

The officially reported unemployment count for January was higher than in any earlier period since 1941, when the economy was coming out of the Great Depression. Moreover, the Labor Dept. also reported that 131 of the 150 major labor market areas still had substantial unemployment—this figure was unchanged from December and down only slightly from the peak of 135 in September. Substantial unemployment was also reported in 1,046 smaller job market areas, which means that nearly four-fifths of the nation's labor market areas were still in bad shape.

Industry was operating at only 71 percent of its productive capacity in the fourth quarter, according to the Federal Reserve Board. That means 29 percent of plants and machines were idle.

This under-use of America's industrial capacity, as figured on an annual basis by the conservative Dept. of Commerce, represents a loss of $221 billion—or $1,000 per man, woman and child.

A significant number of banks and large companies, as well as most large cities and many state governments, are financially strained. Numerous poor countries, further impoverished by the Arab-dominated oil cartel's five-fold price boost of the past three years, are in a severe financial squeeze.

In addition to the forced liquidation of the W. T. Grant chain, there may be further defaults on loans or more bankruptcies in 1976 among banks, large companies, major cities, state governments or foreign countries—with adverse effects on the American banking industry and the world's money markets.

America still has no comprehensive energy policy, more than two years after the oil embargo, and is more dependent on imported oil than it was at that time. This condition leaves the nation extremely vulnerable to further oil blackmail.

Although the nation's economy survived the near-disaster of the winter of 1974-75, and there have been some improvements since last spring, there is remaining weakness, vulnerability and uncertainty. No basic economic problems have been solved.

However, the Ford Administration's Economic Report and Budget for fiscal year 1977 adamantly insist on continuation of its policy of go-slow negativism for this year. The President also proposes a very definite shift to economic restraint—including a $29 billion cut in federal programs below this year's level of services, for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1, 1976, with spreading adverse impact after the November elections.

The Administration has forecast a modest improvement of sales and production in 1976, with a minute decline in unemployment to 7.7 percent, a moderate improvement in inflation and a sharp 32 percent boost in corporate profits. This election year forecast depends on Dr. Arthur Burns and the Federal Reserve maintaining lower interest rates on short-term loans and depends on Congress overriding President Ford's vetoes of some job-creating programs.

If the President's program were adopted, beginning Oct. 1 there would be cuts in federal programs, concentrated in employment, education, health care, income security and grants-in-aid to state and local governments. If this program were adopted, it would result in rising unemployment during the latter part of 1977 and the possibility of a deeper recession.

The economy's near disaster of the winter of 1974-75 was cushioned by the operations of the unemployment insurance system, back-stopped by food stamps, public welfare and extended unemployment benefits to the long-term jobless. Although average benefits were less than $69 a week, the automatic operations of the unemployment insurance system added about $1.3 billion per month in the January-March quarter of 1975. These cushions prevented a complete collapse of purchasing power for millions of families and a full-scale depression.

THE $23 BILLION emergency tax measure, adopted in March and reluctantly signed by President Ford, lifted consumer confidence. The combination of tax rebates, payments to retired people and lower tax withholding rates on paychecks, added more than $10 billion to consumer incomes in May and June. The lower withholding rate provided continuing stimulus through the rest of the year.

As a result, retail sales began to pick up somewhat in April and housing starts in May. But the pick-up was from depression levels.

In the final quarter of 1975, the real volume of total national production rose at a rate of only 5.4 percent—not enough to reduce joblessness substantially with productivity rising rapidly and the labor force continuing to increase.

So the recession continues.

To Add Purchasing Power:

Improvement Long Overdue In Jobless Insurance System

LONG NEGLECT has left the nation's unemployment insurance system unable to effectively cope with the plight of millions of jobless workers during the "most prolonged and most pervasive recession" since the Thirties, AFL-CIO social insurance expert James O'Brien declared on Labor News Conference.

Renewing the AFL-CIO's call for basic changes in the permanent program and renewal of the temporary measures adopted in response to the unemployment emergency, O'Brien stressed that jobless benefits are dollars that go quickly into the community to pay for food, clothing, rent and other essentials. He pointed out that modernization of the "primary mechanism for pumping purchasing power back into the economy," has not kept pace with the changes and advances of the U.S. economy over the four decades since the system was created.

O'Brien said the importance of the unemployment insurance system as an economic stabilizer is clear, noting that in normal times it adds some $5 billion annually to the economy. He added that the outdated system of today is a substantial boost to the economy, with probably about $20 billion in benefit payments to unemployed workers in 1975.

He scored the failure of the states to raise their benefit levels up to 50 percent of the former wage objective Congress intended when it first shaped the program. He said that current benefits fall far short of that goal, and replace little more than one-third of wages lost when workers are temporarily jobless because of layoffs, plant closings and other cutbacks. He urged adoption of a minimum federal standard "to assure that the great majority of unemployed workers would get a benefit equal to at least 50 percent of their former weekly wage."

O'Brien said that the permanent program should also be revamped to better meet the needs of the long-term unemployed, rather than the "feast or famine concept" of the present program, which operates on a trigger system geared to overall jobless levels.

Protection should be tied to the individual, he asserted, with benefits "coupled with job training, retraining, upgrading of skills and relocation, if necessary," in an "entire assistance package to improve employment opportunities."

WHY DOES PRESIDENT FORD continue to veto job-creating legislation when he must know that this unites more and more working Americans against him?

Ford's recent veto of the $6.1 billion public works bill drew the universal condemnation of labor, liberal and black groups in the nation. Far from being the "pork barrel" that Ford called it, the legislation would have put a lot of jobless Americans to work at useful employment. And the President must have known his veto stood a good chance of being overridden. As it happened the override attempt missed by only three votes in the Senate after it was overwhelmingly approved by the House.

More than 40 bills passed by the Congress have been vetoed by Ford since he took office 18 months ago. In the vital area of jobs for unemployed Americans, the President has either vetoed or threatened to veto virtually every major measure. The public works bill was the latest.

The short-term answer to the question of Ford's motivation is simply that he and his White House advisers are not interested, at present, in the opinions of liberals and blacks. He is concerned solely with what Republicans—especially those who will vote at the Republican National Convention—think of him. And he is concerned especially about Ronald Reagan's apparent success in winning support from the most conservative elements in the Republican Party.

Ford and his political advisers seem most aware of the prevailing conservative view that the size of government should be reduced, that federal deficits should be lowered and that we should move toward "balanced budgets" and "fiscal responsibility."

And they seem most unconcerned that these things add up to social irresponsibility. For as the AFL-CIO has repeatedly pointed out, there are large numbers of disillusioned, desperate and even hopeless Americans who have no stake in "balanced budgets" or "fiscal responsibility."

Labor, liberal and black leaders know that the unemployed, the underemployed and the poverty-stricken are far more serious threat to the general welfare of the nation than federal deficits of any size.

The public works jobs bill by itself would not have solved the problem, but it would have helped as would the other job-creating measures the President has vetoed.

THESE VETOES REFLECT not only Ford's fundamental conservative philosophy, but also his concentration on short-term political goals. Other examples are his continuing attacks on school lunches, food stamps, Medicare and other social programs designed to meet the needs of people rather than business.

But the long-term effect could be social disaster on a scale that could make balanced budgets meaningless.

Organized labor has persistently maintained that America's long-term security—even for those who are working regularly at decent jobs—is in seeing to it that work is available for all who are able and want to work. To achieve this objective, the AFL-CIO has called on Congress to enact legislation that will reduce joblessness to an "acceptable" 3 percent rate.

It remains to be seen whether Congress will accept the long-term view, which requires leadership, or the short-term politically expedient view of President Ford.

PERSISTENT CRISIS-LEVEL joblessness spotlights the need to both revamp the basic unemployment insurance system and extend measures shaped to meet the emergency, AFL-CIO Assistant Social Security Director James O'Brien, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Rachelle Patterson of the Boston Globe and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Postal Service Subsidy Plan Wins Support

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A proposal to provide a federal subsidy of 10 percent of the Postal Service operating budget won the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council warned also that "it will oppose any efforts to permit private carriers to compete for the most lucrative postal business" further increasing the Postal Service's financial problems.

The statement stressed that to satisfy those who "incorrectly demand that the Postal Service should make a profit," the USPS has closed many post offices, eliminated or curtailed some services and engaged in wholesale transfers of personnel and instituted speed-up programs that will eliminate many jobs and result in a further deterioration of service.

Because the Postal Service is an "essential government service," the council voted support of the federal subsidy plan offered by Sen. Gale W. McGee, chairman of the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee. The proposal includes creating a panel of experts to investigate postal operations and financing and bring in findings and recommendations to Congress.

The council's action was in relation to a referred resolution from the 1975 convention. It also adopted with minor changes another referred resolution calling for federal legislation that would grant employes of the Postal Service a union shop so that all enjoying union-won benefits would "at least pay dues for these benefits."

AFFIRMING SUPPORT for the consumer boycott of Russell Stover candies are AFL-CIO President George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and President Daniel E. Conway, right, of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers. The B&C is protesting the candy company's "consistent pattern of anti-union and illegal activities."

Mediation Proves Value In Internal Disputes Plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The use of mediation continued to be an effective means of settling internal disputes in the AFL-CIO, the Executive Council reported.

Of the 1,664 cases filed under the Internal Disputes Plan since January 1962, nearly 60 percent have been settled by a member of a panel of mediators made up of officers of affiliated unions. In 1975, of 152 cases filed, 69 were settled in mediation and 22 were pending at the mediation level at the end of the year.

Impartial umpires set up under the plan found 33 violations of the plan in cases brought before them in 1975; for the 13-year period of the plan there were 415 violations found. The council's report contained statistics on appeals, complaints of non-compliance and other data.

Since the plan's inception 13 affiliates have been found to have failed to comply with decisions of the impartial umpire or directions of the plan's appeals subcommittee in 23 cases. In 10 instances compliance was later achieved and sanctions imposed under the plan were lifted and an affiliate's rights under the plan restored. There are presently three affiliates under sanctions—Air Line Pilots, Typographical Union, Graphic Arts International Union.

The council heard two appeals during its sessions and found that there were incorrect applications of Article XX (Internal Disputes Plan) by the impartial umpire. The council issued one statement declaring:

"The provisions of Article XX are designed to establish the rights and duties of AFL-CIO national unions vis-a-vis one another and not to settle those union's rights and duties vis-a-vis employers. Employer action which has the effect of depriving a union of its bargaining rights cannot end that union's established bargaining relationship under Article XX. Similarly, an employer's refusal to recognize an independent's affiliation with an AFL-CIO national union is of no relevance in determining whether there is an affiliation under Article XX."

In the other appeal, the council said that the umpire erred in holding that the signing of an NLRB consent election stipulation where the petition had been filed by an independent union constituted a waiver of Article XX rights.

Increased Aid Sought For Performing Arts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A new federal commitment is needed to help enrich the cultural life of Americans, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The first attempt of the government for a comprehensive program to aid the arts came 11 years ago when the National Foundation on the Arts & Humanities was established. But much more must be done, the council stressed.

It outlined a seven-point program to promote the development of American performing arts activities and strengthening protections for U.S. artists.

Specifically, the council called for:

- The continuation of the National Foundation and expansion of its activities, including new programs that would lead to the creation of a national theater, increased financial aid for the performing arts, and more opportunities for American artists to perform in the United States and abroad.
- The National Endowment for the Arts to explore ways of assisting private operators in theater, music, dance and film production and to encourage private investment in these areas.
- Opposition to the use of government funds to support the production or acquisition of foreign performing arts programs.
- Congressional action to regulate the importation of foreign-made commercials and spot announcements.
- Opposition to regressive excise taxes by local and state governments that would inhibit performing arts productions.
- Application of prevailing standards for wages, salaries, fringe benefits and other working conditions in all projects supported by government funds.
- Cultural institutions and government agencies involved in the development of artistic programs to be responsive to the needs of working artists and all working people.

FCC Scored On Tolerance Of TV Reruns

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The failure of the Federal Communications Commission to limit television reruns during prime time hours has worsened the situation for the viewing public and American film workers, the Executive Council declared.

For the 65 million U.S. families who rely on television as a major entertainment source, there is a diet of repeats. The excessive repetition of old programs also has resulted in rampant unemployment and diminished job opportunities for thousands of skilled film workers, it noted.

"Television can only become a significant cultural medium if its programming is new and fresh, offering opportunities for creative artists and producers to improve the product," the council stressed.

It deplored the failure of the FCC to act on the council's urging of more than three years ago and called on the commission to adopt rules now to limit network repeats to "spare the American public from boredom and film workers from unemployment lines."

To End Jobs Drain:

Labor Asks Repeal Of Tariff Loopholes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Prompt congressional action is needed on measures that would revamp U.S. foreign trade law to reinforce the American economy and protect jobs against damaging imports, the AFL-CIO warned.

A major problem cited by the Executive Council deals with two trade provisions—items 806.30 and 807 of the U.S. tariff schedules—that encourage American firms to contract out work to low-wage countries on products for shipment back to U.S. markets at reduced duty rates.

The rush to export American jobs through these tariff loopholes, the council said, is reflected in a 563 percent rise in the dollar value of imports over an eight-year period — from $593 million in 1966 to $5.4 billion in 1974.

The council noted that through the efforts of several unions, Congress has become more aware of the destructive impact of the tariff schedules. Within two weeks, 18 separate bills were introduced to repeal the items.

"We welcome the introduction of measures to meet this menace," the council said, and it called on the House and Senate to follow through by repealing the tariff loopholes.

"The result will mean more jobs for American workers, more production for American industry and more strength for the American economy."

The council noted that the AFL-CIO convention last fall warned of the dangers caused by imports and the export of American jobs, technology and capital.

The worsening trend continues, the council said.

The council statement noted that a wide range of industrial jobs are affected by items 806.30 and 807 of the tariff schedules. Included are such products as internal combustion engines, office machines, television sets, radios, electronic components and apparel, in addition to iron, steel and copper mill products, aircraft and auto parts.

When components from the United States are sent abroad for assembly, item 807 permits the finished product to be imported with a tariff limited to the value added, which essentially consists of the low wages paid. During 1974, the council said, this meant the tariff that was applied to apparel, for example, was paid on only 31 percent of the full value of the product.

Item 806.30 allows American firms to send non-precious metals to other countries for processing and to bring the product back at reduced duty rates for further processing and assembly in the United States.

In industries such as apparel, the contracting-out of work to other countries has expanded so rapidly that between 1965 and 1974 total imports under item 807 rose 13,670 percent, the council said.

The council warned that the rising tide of imports permitted under the two tariff provisions is increasingly washing away American jobs and that eventually the entire production of many products could be lost to low-wage countries.

March Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

Seven trade union groups will use the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center at Silver Spring, Md., during March. The schedule:

Postal Workers—A teacher training course for Postal Workers' state directors of education, Feb. 29 through Mar. 5.

Railroaders—A two-week course for general chairmen of the United Transportation Union. Topics include claim and grievance processing, pre-hearing analysis writing, group process, UTU legislative and political activities, and newsletter writing. From Mar. 7 to Mar. 19.

Government Employees—A staff conference for AFGE vice presidents and national representatives, Mar. 15 to Mar. 19.

Trade Union Women—A multi-union institute on Women in the Labor Force for men as well as women leaders of unions interested in organizing women. Topics include economic facts concerning women union members, the laws and court decisions affecting employed women, training and promotion problems, opportunities for union organizing, and bargaining for affirmative action. From Mar. 21 to Mar. 26.

AAFLI—A 10-day meeting of the Asian American Free Labor Institute's country directors and Washington staff to plan the year's program in 14 countries in Asia and the Middle East, Mar. 21 to Mar. 31.

Pensions & Insurance—An institute for union officers and representatives who negotiate pension and insurance plans and for trustees of pension and insurance funds. Topics include problems and trends in negotiated pension and insurance plans, analysis of fund reports, problems of investment under the new federal pension reform law, and the special role of the labor trustee in overseeing the administration of such funds. From Mar. 28 to Apr. 1.

Letter Carriers—A teacher training program for national business agents and state directors of education of the Letter Carriers, Mar. 29 to Apr. 1.

Further information about these or other Labor Studies Center programs, may be obtained from Fred Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md., 20903. Phone 301/431-6800.

National Commitment Sought:

Housing Programs Far Short of Need

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on the Ford Administration to adopt a comprehensive housing policy to help the residential construction industry snap out of its continuing depression.

"The housing recovery has gone into reverse," the Executive Council declared here. "In January, the annual rate of new housing starts declined for the third straight month.

"A human need as basic as shelter certainly deserves appropriate national commitment, which it is not receiving."

New housing starts last year plummeted to the lowest level since 1946, a post-World War II year that was plagued by material shortages. The 1975 rate of 1.17 million starts was 25 percent less than the basic number of units needed to keep pace with the average annual net increase in households of 1.54 million during the first half of the '70s, the council observed.

It cited recent Census Bureau statistics confirming that there is an annual housing need of 2.6 million units to meet basic household requirements and replace occupied substandard units by 1985.

"Unfortunately, 1976 is expected to be the third consecutive year of production shortfall in relation to needs, following the depressed housing year of 1974 with 1.33 million starts and the debacle of 1975," the council said.

Although the number of annual starts rose to 1.3 million in the last three months of last year, and some limited housing support measures were recently initiated by the Administration, the consensus of projections is that only 1.5 million housing units will be started in 1976.

"Futility and frustration will continue to face millions of American families seeking decent homes," the Executive Council declared. "Mortgage interest rates are still at about a 9 percent level, except for limited mortgage funds available at below-market interest rates under government programs."

The council noted that more than 900,000 construction workers —one out of five—were unemployed in January. The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in the construction trades was 15.4 percent last month, "and the percentage was no doubt much greater among those who work in residential construction," the statement added.

It urged action in the following areas to restore the industry:

- The Administration should reallocate a large portion of the funds authorized under the Section 8 rental assistance program to the proven conventional public housing program, which has over the years successfully provided more than 1 million housing units.

"Congress should also designate $250 million in housing assistance payments authority for new conventional public housing and direct the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to use it for that purpose."

- The $264 million available for use under the Section 235 homeownership assistance program should be released much more rapidly than the three-year period planned by the Administration. The mortgage interest rate under Section 235 should be lowered from the current 5 percent to no more than 3 percent.

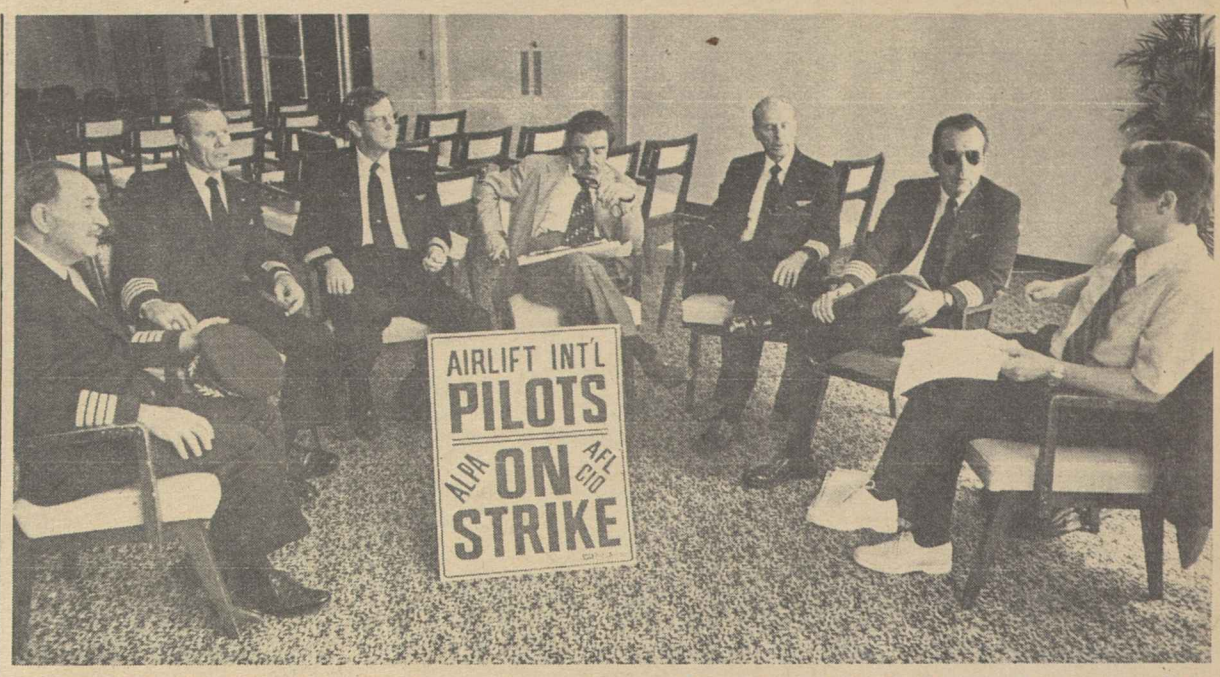
- The Administration and Congress should immediately provide increased funding for housing for senior citizens and the handicapped under the Section 202 program.

- The Administration should help ease the tight rental housing market developing throughout the country by immediately making available the $2 billion in appropriated funds it has held up. Also, Congress should appropriate the remaining $5 billion authorized under the program so that additional support could be provided to help most homeownership and rental housing needs and, at the same time, create job opportunities for unemployed construction workers.

- Finally, the Administration should demonstrate its commitment to a coordinated approach to community problems by providing financial assistance only to those communities that link their housing and community development programs, as intended by the Housing & Community Development Act of 1974.

Public Employe Panels Urged on Central Bodies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on all state and local central bodies to establish public employe committees as part of their standing committee structure to coordinate legislative, organizing and trade union activities of public employe unions.



The council wholeheartedly concurred in the proposal by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. that the best method of handling the problems of public employe unions is through the established local body structure.

The council said that the state and local public employe committees should include at least one representative from each affiliate of the central body representing public employes that desires to be a member of such a committee.

The committees will provide a focal point "for local unions representing employes of the federal, state and local governments to meet and discuss mutual problems," the council said, adding that the Public Employee Dept. has offered its assistance to state and local bodies in forming the committees and will work closely with them in efforts to increase affiliation from local unions representing public employes.

The council instructed the Dept. of Organization & Field Services to assist in the formation of public employe committees at the state and local levels and to continue its efforts to gain full affiliation and participation of public employe unions with central bodies.

The statement said the Public Employee Dept. will report back to the Executive Council in six months on progress in implementing the program "including recommendations that it may have to meet the needs of public employes at the state and local levels."

STRIKING PILOTS of Airlift International, Inc., a Miami-based air freight carrier, meet with Alan Kistler, right, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and Frank Pollara, special assistant to the federation's executive officers, center, during the Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour. The pilots, members of the Air Line Pilots, have reached agreement on a new contract but are snagged on a back-to-work accord to end their three-month strike.

New Hampshire Voting Runs Close to Form

The 1976 presidential primary season opened with New Hampshire voters confirming that the Republicans have a race on their hands and Jimmy Carter is a force to be reckoned with among the Democrats.

President Gerald Ford won a close, 51 to 49 percent victory over former California Gov. Ronald Reagan in the Republican race and Carter led five Democrats with 29 percent of the vote.

Both winners dominated the separate balloting for convention delegates. Ford captured at least 17 of the GOP's 21 delegate seats and his headquarters claimed he may get 19 to only 2 for Reagan. Carter got 14 of the Democrats' 17.

With both presidential preference races running almost exactly as predicted, the New Hampshire results served to heighten the next step in the record 30-primary 1976 race. For the Democrats, that means Mar. 2 in Massachusetts and for Ford and Reagan it means Mar. 9 in Florida since neither has campaigned in Massachusetts.

After Florida, primaries in Illinois, North Carolina, New York and Wisconsin are packed into the next four weeks until Apr. 6, with a lull coming in the three weeks before the Pennsylvania primary Apr. 27.

In New Hampshire, Carter, the former governor of Georgia, was followed by Arizona Rep. Morris Udall with 24 percent; Indiana Sen. Birch Bayh 16; former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris 11 and 1972 vice presidential nominee Sargent Shriver with 9 percent. Udall won the remaining three delegate spots. Final vote totals will probably put Carter at 23,000, Udall nearly 19,000, Bayh 12,500, Harris 9,000 and Shriver almost 7,000.

Another 4,400 votes were written in for Minnesota Sen. Hubert Humphrey and 1,000 each for Alabama Gov. George Wallace and anti-abortion candidate Ellen McCormack for a total Democratic turnout of just under 80,000.

The turnout could be nearly eight times that many in Massachusetts, where Wallace and Washington Sen. Henry M. Jackson will join the field. The bigger field adds emphasis to the Massachusetts primary, as does its role as the only state to go Democratic in the 1972 presential election and its recent preoccupation with school busing to achieve racial integration.

Wallace, the only one in the Massachusetts field who does not have labor endorsements of some type, sharply altered his original plans and has campaigned heavily in Massachusetts before he faces Carter, Jackson and Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp in Florida, where he won in 1972 with 42 percent of the vote.

Ford's razor-thin margin—about 1,250 votes of 110,000 cast—came in his first appeal for votes outside his home congressional district in Michigan. And because they are conservative states, New Hampshire and Florida had been handpicked by Reagan as the launching pad for his challenge to an incumbent President.

Ford Opposed On Plan to Lift Airline Rules

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Ford Administration's proposal to deregulate the airline industry would further undermine the labor and general economic stability of this sector of the economy, the AFL-CIO charged.

Administration-backed measures now before Congress would permit established carriers to drop less profitable lines and would invite below-cost price competition, the Executive Council observed in a statement.

"The real result would be that as each carrier restricted its routes, many smaller cities would lose needed airline service and many more workers would be laid off," the council said.

Already, the airline industry has been forced to deactivate scores of aircraft and lay off thousands of workers because of recession-induced deficits, the council statement noted.

In addition, it said, the President's proposal could eliminate the labor-protective provisions of the 1958 Federal Aviation Act which apply to employes victimized by mergers, consolidations, route sales and transfers, thus further harming workers by denying them even these basic protections.

"This proposal is unsafe, uneconomic and basically anti-labor, and we will oppose it," the council declared. "The federal government has an absolute responsibility to regulate interstate commerce for the protection of the economy and the health and safety of passengers and workers."

Recall Terms Stall End of Airlift Strike

Miami—Pilots for Airlift International, Inc., maintained their strike against the air cargo carrier as the two sides in the contract dispute failed to agree on a back-to-work accord.

Terms of a new contract were reached on Feb. 10. But return to work is contingent upon recall agreements between the carrier and the striking pilots and each of the other unions who have honored their picket lines.

The pilots, who are members of the Air Line Pilots Association, balked when the company announced that strikebreaking pilots would be retained in supervisory capacities and that it would issue initial recall notices to only 30 of the 115 pilots involved in the dispute with no assurances of further recalls.

Another stumbling block is the company's insistence that the striking pilots return to work without any guarantee of unprejudiced return of members of the Machinists and Transport Workers who have honored the picket lines.

Capt. Ralph Chrismon, master executive council chairman, said the company's action and "unrealistic attitude" could nullify the contract if a speedy agreement on returning to work is not reached.

"It endangers and violates the very basics of good labor practices that have been established and accepted by management over the last half century," he said.

The three and one-half month old strike began last Nov. 14 after two years of bargaining and mediation failed to produce a new contract.

Airlift is certified to carry military freight, as well as commercial cargo, and has contracts with the Air Force's Military Aircraft Command. The striking pilots, who have already picketed MAC's operations at Dover AFB, Del., plan additional protests at other bases over the use of strikebreaking pilots.

NLRB Names Barker Deputy Chief ALJ

The National Labor Relations Board has named James T. Barker as deputy chief administrative law judge of the agency.

Barker, 52, has been the agency's West Coast presiding judge for the past three years, directing western operations of the NLRB's division of administrative law judges headquartered in San Francisco.

Rollcalls on Jobs Bill, Veto Override

Jobs were the issue in both of these key House rollcalls.

Column I shows the 239-154 vote on Feb. 10 for a labor-supported bill to expand the public service employment program that President Ford wants to phase out. Voting right (R) were 216 Democrats and 23 Republicans. Wrong votes (W) were cast by 102 Republicans and 52 Democrats.

Column II is the 319-98 vote on Feb. 19 to override Ford's veto of a job-creating package of accelerated public works and anti-recession aid to cities and states. Voting right to override the veto were 263 Democrats and 56 Republicans. Voting wrong were 82 Republicans and 16 Democrats. The override attempt succeeded in the House but fell short in the Senate.

Barriers Cleared Away:

Legal Services Plans Enter Crucial Development Phase

Pioneering efforts of unions, consumer organizations and lawyers have cleared away barriers for further development of prepaid and group legal services.

Now in its formative years, the movement of these legal service plans is facing a more crucial test than in its infancy period, Theodore J. St. Antoine writes in the American Federationist.

In his article in the AFL-CIO magazine, St. Antoine notes that sponsors of prepaid legal service plans will make vital choices on financing, the structure of the programs and delivery of services. Experimentation with the development of plans best suited for specific groups will continue, he predicts.

"An important concern of these formative years will be to avoid repeating the experience of prepaid health service plans—an experience marked by haphazard, undirected, and uncontrolled development that resulted in spiraling costs and poor quality control," the article says.

St. Antoine cites the critical need for cost and quality controls as a key motivating factor in establishing the Resource Center for Consumers Legal Services, a national clearinghouse for such programs.

St. Antoine, dean of the University of Michigan Law School, is the president of the center. It was set up last year to take over the functions of the National Consumer Center for Legal Services, which had been formed in 1972 with labor support and has served as the legislative arm for the group legal service movement.

As a clearinghouse, the center makes information available to unions and consumer groups on the development of group service plans.

By helping design prototype legal service plans, the center can devise models that offer standards of comparison, St. Antoine observes.

"Since experimentation remains a key to the center's desired effectiveness, the center has assembled a laboratory of 5,000 existing legal services plans," he reports.

A number of unions have established such programs after constitutional hurdles were cleared in Congress and the Supreme Court. The Taft-Hartley Act was amended to permit unions to negotiate labor-management funded programs, and the Supreme Court handed down four key rulings providing constitutional protections for the concept of "group law."

The largest group plan was established in 1973 by the Laborers District Council in Washington, D.C., to provide prepaid services for 10,000 LIU members and their families in eight union locals in the District of Columbia, Maryland and Virginia.

Its delivery system is a combination of "open panel" and "closed panel" plans. The "open panel" plan gives members a choice of any attorney, while the "closed panel" plan offers members a choice from previously selected lawyers.

About 85 percent of the cases are handled by the legal service plan's staff attorneys.

St. Antoine notes that although the Laborers' Washington area plan is member-financed, it is tied to a collective bargaining agreement with employers assisting in the collection of conrtibutions by members.

Initially, contributions were 4 cents an hour per participating member, but were reduced to 3 cents an hour as of January 1975.

Since the plan's inception, St. Antoine observes, its goals have been to make quality legal service available to all members and to promote wider usage by making the services more accessible.

Such programs provide "a great opportunity to workers who have long been denied access to the legal system," St. Antoine points out.

"The richest 10 percent of Americans can afford lawyers and the poorest 20 percent are at least partially served by such entities as legal aid societies and public defenders' offices," he notes. "This leaves the 140 million middle-class Americans who are either unable to pay standard attorney fees or are unable to find the 'right' lawyer to help them with a particular legal problem."

Group legal plans also provide opportunities for thousands of young lawyers who otherwise might have trouble making a living in the practice of law, the author observes.

The group legal service program is the ideal mechanism for bringing together lawyers in need of clients and clients in need of lawyers, St. Antoine concludes.

Senate Vote Sustaining Public Works Bill Veto

The Senate on Feb. 19 doomed hundreds of thousands of workers to continued unemployment by failing to override President Ford's veto of a labor-supported bill combining accelerated public works construction with anti-recession help to cities and states. The 63-35 majority to override was short of the needed two-thirds.

Funds Backed For Bilingual Education Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Bilingual education should aim at bringing children with a limited knowledge of English into the mainstream of American life, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It urged Congress to continue to earmark federal funds for bilingual education, instead of lumping all school aid into general educational grants to the states as the Ford Administration proposes.

At the same time, the council statement warned against using bilingual education to justify a segregated school system. "The very purpose of bilingual education would be defeated by the establishment of separate schools for Spanish-speaking students, separate schools for Indian students and separate schools for Oriental students."

With the help of bilingual education, students should be taught to thrive in an English-speaking society," the AFL-CIO said. "The classroom should be a laboratory for a democratic society in which children from diverse cultures meet together and learn from each other."

Conrail Adds Trackage As Two Railroads Balk

Funding of a new government-subsidized rail sytem—Conrail—appeared certain as the House voted overwhelmingly to appropriate $2.03 billion to reorganize and upgrade seven bankrupt northeastern and midwestern railroads.

The money included $110 million added in floor amendments to provide for 2,200 miles of track not included in the original reorganization plan.

The Chessie System and the Southern Railway Co. backed out of participation in the plan after failing to reach new worker protection agreements for the trackage involved as provided for in the reorganization plan.

The two private carriers had agreed to purchase the property to provide competition for Conrail, which is scheduled to begin operations on Apr. 1. Now Conrail will absorb the 2,200 miles of track, enlarging it to a system of more than 17,000 miles rather than 15,000 miles as originally planned.

Following the House action on the appropriation measure, the Senate approved the same amount for Conrail, plus $260 million for other rail-improvement purposes. The differences between the House and Senate measures now must be ironed out by a conference committee.

The House measure would provide $460 million in fiscal 1976; $965 million in the budget transition period, July-September 1976, and fiscal 1977; $425 million in fiscal 1978, and $176 million in fiscal 1979.

Meanwhile, Transportation Sec. William T. Coleman, Jr., summoned key officials of the Chessie and Southern and leaders of rail unions to a meeting in Washington to see if they could restore the original plan embodying competition for Conrail. Otherwise, the new system will have a virtual monopoly on rail service to major cities in the Northeast and Midwest.

Rail union leaders blamed the breakdown of their talks with the Chessie and the Southern on the carriers' rigidity. The Railway Labor Executives' Association, speaking for all but one of the unions involved, pointed out that about 20 agreements had already been negotiated with other private lines interested in acquiring small portions of the bankrupt railroads.

"However, negotiators for the Chessie and the Southern have refused to agree to provisions accepted by all other acquiring carriers," RLEA reported. It said management negotiators "insisted on unreasonable, inflexible and inequitable deviations from those agreements which cannot be accepted by the unions."

Chessie was to take over 2,000 miles of lines from the ailing Penn Central from Ohio into New York City and Philadelphia. The Southern had agreed to acquire 200 miles of Penn Central's "DelMarVa" line between Wilmington, Del., and Newport News, Va.

Railway Carmen Name Canadian Vice President

Kansas City, Mo. — H. O. Crane has been named Canadian vice president of the Railway Carmen. His appointment was made by Carmen President Anthony L. Krause, with the approval of the executive board.

Crane, 59, succeeds George Sartorio, who retired last December. The new vice president previously served as system general chairman on the Canadian Pacific. He began his railroad career on the CP in 1944.

Textile Union Drafts Goals For Contract

Boston — The Textile Workers Union of America set goals for this spring's contract negotiations in the northern cotton-synthetic and woolen industry keyed to wage increases and fringe-benefit improvements sufficient to offset the impact of inflation and substantially raise the living standards of members.

"The wage increases negotiated last year for workers in both the woolen and cotton-synthetic industries have been virtually wiped out by the rising cost of living," TWUA President Sol Stetin told some 150 delegates to a conference here.

Stetin stressed that the union's overall goal is to win a contract settlement that will not only make up for the beating members have taken from past inflationary bouts "but one that will also enable them to weather the economic storms that continue to buffet them from all angles."

Most cotton-synthetic agreements are due to expire in mid-April. About half of the agreements in the woolen division will expire in May and succeeding months. The pacts cover about 20,000 workers in 70 cotton-synthetic and woolen plants, mostly in New England.

The conference delegates passed a resolution noting that orders are beginning to rise for textiles.

"Prices and profits are moving up sharply," the resolution observed. "Surely the workers in this industry are entitled to share in the growing prosperity."

Index Rises .4%:

Service Costs Push Consumer Prices Up

The cost of living continued to rise in January, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, with the government's consumer price index moving up another four-tenths of 1 percent.

Real spendable earnings, meanwhile, remained about the same as in 1965, despite the reduction in federal income taxes that went into effect last May.

The average weekly spendable pay for a worker with three dependents last month was $92.21, compared to $92.03 in December, an increase of two-tenths of 1 percent over the month. In 1965, real earnings—take-home pay adjusted for the effects of inflation—averaged $91.32 a week.

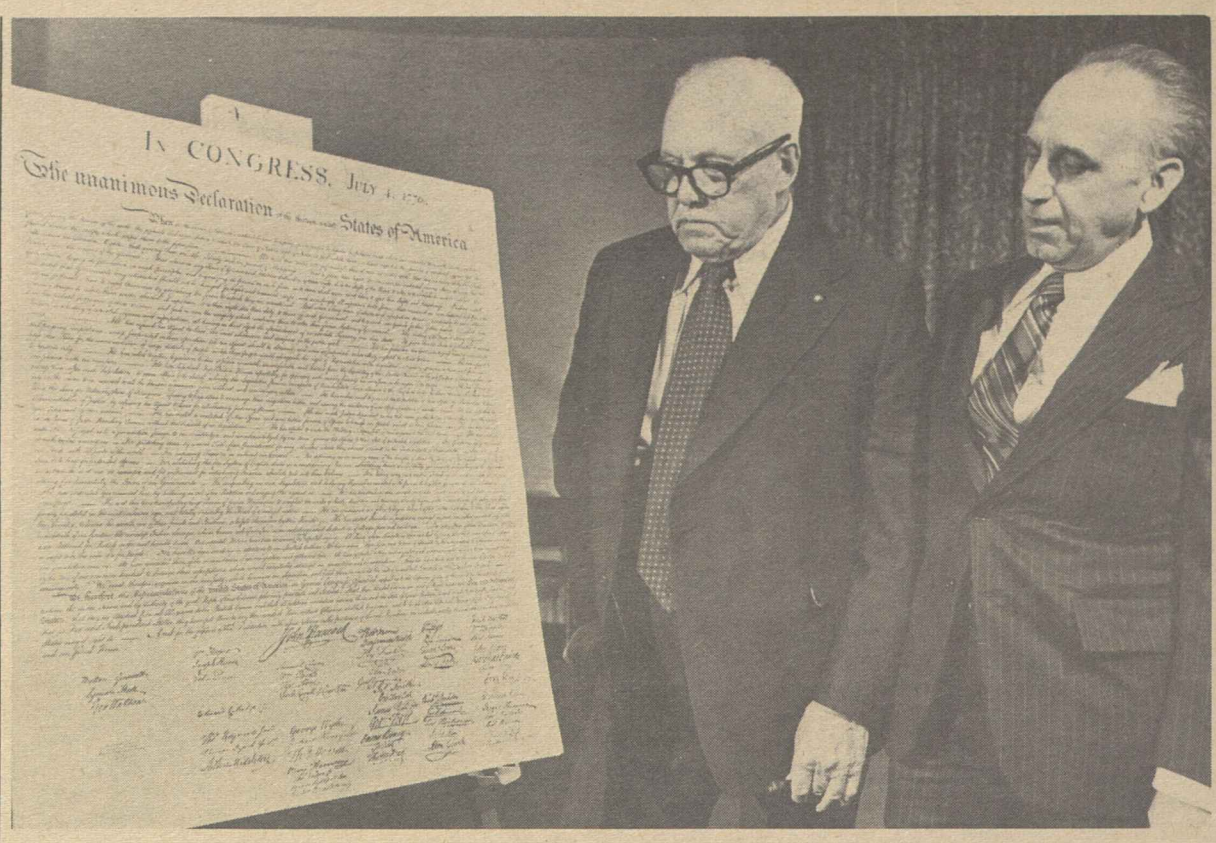
The January increase in the CPI was almost entirely attributable to higher costs for a wide variety of consumer services, BLS said. Huge increases were reported in postal rates, automobile insurance premiums and charges for medical care.

Prices of services in January rose a seasonably adjusted 1.1 percent over the month, the largest increase since a similar rise in July 1974. The 1.1 percent jump followed increases of six-tenths of 1 percent in December and 1 percent in November.

The overall cost of living has gone up at an annual rate of 6.5 percent over the last three months. At 166.7 percent of its 1967 base, the CPI in January was 6.8 percent higher than a year earlier.

Retail food prices declined two-tenths of 1 percent last month, the first decline in this category in five months, while commodities other than food increased two-tenths of 1 percent.

BLS said the slower rise in the nonfood-commodities index reflected seasonally adjusted declines in the prices of gasoline and motor oil and fuel oil and coal.



The drop in food prices was due mostly to a slide of four-tenths of 1 percent in grocery-store foods, including pork, poultry, beef and fresh vegetables. Cereal and bakery products posted price increases, however, and restaurant meals rose eight-tenths of 1 percent.

New car prices declined slightly in January, following large increases in recent months, BLS said, but prices of used cars went up. The government also reported increases in prices of apparel, appliances, floor coverings and toilet goods. Tobacco products continued to rise rapidly.

Among the higher charges for services was a 2.2 percent rise in the transportation services index, largely the result of a sharp increase in auto insurance rates. All major service categories, except rent, increased more in January than in December.

Household services other than rent increased 1 percent, reflecting in part of the postal rate increase which went into effect last Dec. 31. Medical-care services rose 1.2 percent, compared with 1 percent in December.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported separately that real output—gross national product adjusted for inflation—rose at an annual rate of 4.9 percent during the fourth quarter of 1975, rather than at the 5.4 percent rate indicated in preliminary data issued a month earlier.

RARE REPRODUCTION of the Declaration of the Independence is presented to AFL-CIO President George Meany for display at the federation headquarters by Angelo LoVecchio of the Plate Printers. The engaving was made in 1933 by union craftsmen at the Bureau of Engraving & Printing, from which a limited number of copies has been printed.

Labor Asks New Study On Power Press Safety

Organized labor has asked the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to reopen the record on a safety standard for mechanical power presses in an effort to reduce worker injuries.

The request by the AFL-CIO and the federation's Industrial Union Dept. was made after a federal appeals court panel ruled last month that the Labor Dept. did not justify its revocation of a "no hands in dies" standard. The ruling was in response to a suit brought by the AFL-CIO and the IUD.

The request for reopening the record cites the need for the submission of updated accident and injury data, studies into the feasibility of workers operating presses without inserting their hands into dies, and additional materials explaining technological developments designed to curb hazards on power presses.

In the petition to Assistant Labor Sec. Morton Corn, labor is asking for a review of the number, severity and costs of accidents and injuries to power press operators working at plants complying with the current standard.

These data would supplement statistics OSHA has collected since the "no hands" consensus standard was revoked Dec. 3, 1974.

OSHA acknowledged shortcomings in the method used to compile reports on accidents and injuries involving power press operations.

During the last six months of 1975, OSHA received such accident and injury reports from the 21 states operating their own safety programs, compared with 268 reports from states under federal administration of the job safety law.

"A comparison with workmen's compensation data indicates that the national office is receiving only about one-fourth of the reports that it should receive," OSHA said.

Safety experts in organized labor pointed out that thousands of workers who must insert, adjust or extract stock manually are injured every year. In Michigan alone, job injury statistics showed that during 1973 there were 307 amputations on power presses resulting from workers placing their hands in die areas.

Government Unions Hit New Peaks

of salaried employes represented by unions passed the 50 percent mark—rising from 48 percent in 1974 to 51 percent last year. During the same period, the percentage of blue-collar workers in bargaining units rose from 82 to 84 percent.

The November tally showed 789,600 salaried workers and 410,700 blue-collar workers represented by unions, continuing a trend which over the past decade has seen the number of white-collar workers in bargaining units first catch up with the traditionally better-organized blue-collar workforce and then surpass it — in numbers, though not in percentage.

Most unions in the federal field represent some of both groups of workers. Thus the AFGE, although predominantly white-collar, holds bargaining rights for more than 205,000 hourly-paid blue-collar workers.

In the separate Postal Service traditionally the best-organized segment of the federally-related workforce, unions bargain for nearly 600,000 workers—87 percent of the total number of postal workers but virtually 100 percent of those eligible for union representation.

The number of government workers represented by unions has always been substantially higher than the number of union members since there are no union-shop agreements and unions are required by law to represent non-members as well as members.

The percentage of members represented who hold union membership is highest in the Postal Service, followed by blue-collar units where workers are more likely to have had a first-hand knowledge of unions before taking government employment.

There was a significant gain last year in the number and percentage of workers covered by a written union contract—the normal step after bargaining rights have been won.

Agreements were negotiated in 2,704 non-postal bargaining units, up 227 from the previous year. They covered 1,083,000 workers, 53 percent of the total federal workforce. A year earlier, only 985,000 workers were covered.

State Penalties Upheld For Hiring Illegal Aliens

The Supreme Court has ruled unanimously that a state may penalize an employer who knowingly hires illegal aliens in order to protect the working conditions of lawful residents.

It reinstated a 1971 California law that state courts had nullified on the contention that immigration-related issues are pre-empted by federal law.

A labor-endorsed bill to set federal penalties for employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens is pending in Congress. But the Supreme Court refused to go along with the argument that the absence of federal legislation means that a state can't fill the void by acting to protect its lawful workers.

The court's opinion, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., cited these key reasons for legitimate state concern with the employment of illegals:

- "Employment of illegal aliens in times of high unemployment deprives citizens and legally admitted aliens of jobs;
- "Acceptance by illegal aliens of jobs on substandard terms as to wages and working conditions can seriously depress wage scales and working conditions of citizens and legally admitted aliens;
- "Employment of illegal aliens under such conditions can diminish the effectiveness of labor unions."

The court noted that these problems are particularly severe in California, with the "significant influx" of illegal aliens from neighboring Mexico.

While reversing the state court ruling that the California law is unconstitutional on its face, the Supreme Court directed the state court to consider whether California's administrative regulations to enforce the law conflict with any federal laws or regulations.

In another decision, the Supreme Court rejected a lobor-supported claim that a disabled worker has the right to a full hearing before being dropped from the social security disability benefit rolls.

The AFL-CIO, in a brief to the Supreme Court, challenged a regulation by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare that provides the right to a formal hearing procedure only after disability benefits have been cut off.

A 1970 Supreme Court decision held that persons receiving welfare benefits could not be denied them before such a hearing, and the AFL-CIO contended that the same principle should apply in the case of disability benefits.

But in a 6-2 decision, the high court held that wasn't the case.

Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., writing for the majority, asserted that "the disabled worker's need is likely to be less than that of the welfare recipient."

Justice Brennan and Justice Thurgood Marshall dissented from the ruling. Brennan noted that in the case that reached the Supreme Court, a disabled laborer had his mortgage foreclosed and his furniture repossessed when his disability benefits were cut off.

In other action, the court agreed to review two cases of special interest to labor.

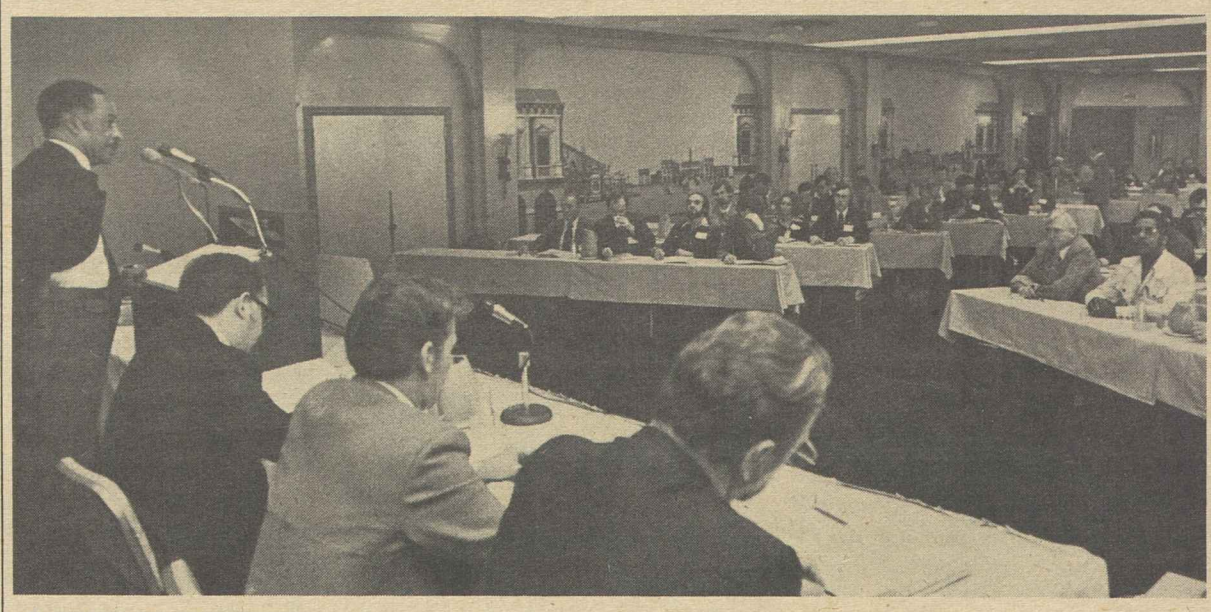
It will hear arguments on the reasonableness, under the Landrum-Griffin Act, of a Steelworkers' requirement that a candidate for local union office must have attended at least half the meetings of his local for three years to qualify.

Two federal appellate courts came to different conclusions on the issue and all parties involved have sought the Supreme Court adjudication.

It also agreed to review a complex case involving union work rules dealing with prefabricated building components. A 5-4 majority of a federal appellate court had overturned a National Labor Relations Board ruling against the union involved.

Vermont Senate Crushes R-T-W Bill

Montpelier, Vt.—The Vermont Senate crushed a "right-to-work" bill by a 25-4 vote in a bipartisan rejection of union-busting.



At committee hearings earlier in the month, more than 500 union members from all sections of the state came at the call of the State AFL-CIO to register their opposition to an open-shop law.

The Senate committee unanimously recommended that the bill be rejected.

Labor Hits Delay Tactics On Injury Compensation

LABOR EDUCATION at the university level was one of three major themes of this year's AFL-CIO Education Conference. Election Act Revisions Speeded

Legislation to salvage the Federal Election Campaign Act has been scheduled for early congressional action in an effort to meet a Supreme Court deadline and prevent the dismantling of the presidential campaign financing mechanism in the midst of its first election test.

A bill approved by the Senate Rules Committee and a companion measure being put in final shape by the House Administration Committee go beyond the stop-gap measure President Ford wants enacted. Ford has threatened a veto if the final version isn't to his liking.

The relatively non-controversial portion of the bill would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as an executive branch agency whose members would be nominated by the President subject to confirmation by the Senate. Four of the six members of the present commission were appointed directly by Congress, but the court ruled that such a body could not administer and enforce a law.

The commission's responsibilities include approving requests by presidential candidates for matching federal funds for use in primary campaigns, a continuing process that has already resulted in payments of more than $1 million each to four of the presidential candidates—including Ford, himself. Other candidates have received smaller amounts.

In addition to making several law changes necessary to conform to the Supreme Court decision, the House and Senate committees proposed to amend the law to change a questionable interpretation by the Federal Election Commission. The commission majority had ruled that an employer could solicit contributions to a political fund from his workers. The House and Senate bills would limit management solicitation to stockholders and white collar supervisory officials. Unions are limited to soliciting their members. Further, if management chose to use a checkoff for management contributions, a union would be able to utilize voluntary checkoffs for worker political contributions.

The Senate bill was changed somewhat in the course of the committee proceedings, raising some questions as to the meaning of various amendments. The bill, of course, will be subject to further amendment on the Senate floor.

Still uncertain was whether Congress would seek at this time to deal with the issue of public funding of House and Senate elections.

Minimum Standards Demanded

The AFL-CIO accused the Labor Dept. of trying to delay action by Congress on legislation setting federal standards for workers' compensation benefits.

Reform of "haphazard, inadequate and inequitable" state programs to compensate victims of job-related injuries and disease is long overdue, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified. He asked a Senate Labor subcommittee to reject any further delay.

The panel is considering a bill sponsored by Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and six co-sponsors that is based on a 1972 report by a national commission established by Congress. The commission unanimously recommended standards of benefits and coverage, urging federal legislation if the states failed to upgrade their programs to the recommended levels within three years.

That deadline passed last July, but no state has yet fully complied with the recommendations, Biemiller testified. But "despite this record of compliance," he said, the Labor Dept. is still trying to "thwart" congressional action.

Biemiller charged that the department has "consistently been the advocate of delay" and has fought "in a subtle and skillful fashion" legislation to establish minimum federal benefit standards.

He reminded the senators that two years ago, on the eve of Senate hearings on a similar federal standards bill, the Labor Dept. announced the creation of an Interdepartmental Workers' Compensation Task Force. It was to provide technical assistance to help states improve their programs and report

After Public Works Veto:

Substitute Jobs Bill Called Political Ploy

President Ford's proposed alternative to the job-creating public works jobs bill he vetoed is "a clear prescription for continued unemployment," the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the Republican substitute bill "a callous political gesture" that does not come close to rectifying the damage to the economy caused by the veto.

The job claims made for the Administration bill are "a sham and a fraud," he charged in a statement to the Senate Banking Committee.

The vetoed bill would have provided up to $6 billion in federal funds, available when unemployment is 6 percent or higher. Most of the money would be in two programs—accelerated public works construction and counter-cyclical grants to cities and states so that they don't have to cut back on services and public employment during periods of high joblessness. It would have financed an estimated 600,000 jobs.

By contrast, Biemiller noted, the Administration bill would authorize only $780 million, require a complicated unemployment trigger formula and put the funds into a program not designed for immediate job creation.

The Administration bill, sponsored by Michigan Republicans Robert Griffin in the Senate and Garry Brown in the House, would utilize the Community Development Block Grant Program. Biemiller reminded the committee that these programs, designed to be part of housing assistance for low-income families, are based on long-term planning and the time lag is so great that almost none of the $2.5 billion appropriated for the 1976 fiscal year has yet been spent, and only about 20 percent of the funds voted the previous year.

An attempt to superimpose an accelerated jobs program would lead to "chaos," Biemiller warned.

The AFL-CIO statement sharply challenged Ford's claim that the vetoed bill wouldn't have provided jobs quickly enough to help pull the nation out of recession.

Biemiller cited the experience of the 1962 Accelerated Public Works Act. Within the first 75 days, he said, 1,500 construction projects were approved and the number rose to 4,000 in less than nine months.

Carey Frees 8 Teachers In New York

Albany, N.Y. — Eight Orchard Park, N.Y., teachers, jailed on charges growing out of a strike last fall, were ordered released by Gov. Hugh Carey after serving approximately 10 days of their 30-day sentences.

Carey granted the teachers executive clemency on Mar. 2 following a meeting the day before with a delegation of western New York legislators and union officials.

The commutation of the sentences had been urged by AFL-CIO President George Meany in a telegram to Carey on Feb. 23. The teachers are members of the Orchard Park Teachers Association, a local of the New York State United Teachers. NYSUT is affiliated with the American Federation of Teachers.

The teachers' release had been sought because of the severity of the sentences, the maximum al-

Supreme Court Shifts On Picketing Rights

The Supreme Court overturned a landmark free speech decision and ruled that the right to picket at a privately-owned shopping center isn't based on constitutional guarantees.

Its 6-2 decision demolished a 1968 ruling that business firms couldn't "immunize themselves" against pickets by a barrier of parking lots and state trespass laws.

The new majority, which included all four justices appointed by former President Nixon, disagreed only as to whether the 1968 decision was being overturned for the first time now or whether in fact it had been nullified by a 1972 decision that allowed a shopping center to bar protesters against the Vietnam war from distributing handbills.

In its current decision, the Supreme Court did not deal with the question of whether the right of peaceful picketing at a shopping center in a legitimate labor dispute is guaranteed by federal labor law even if it isn't a constitutionally protected right.

It ordered the case, stemming from an Atlanta shopping center's denial of access to striking members of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, returned to the National Labor Relations Board for

Unions Press Congress On Employment Goals

Two union officials pressed Congress to move the nation towards full employment and sharply challenged the Ford Administration assumption that it is inflationary to create jobs through government action.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Clothing Workers President Murray H. Finley told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that unemployment is still close to depression levels in their industries.

"The construction industry has been laboring under double-digit unemployment for 22 consecutive months," Georgine said, and the jobless rate is currently "a staggering 15.4 percent." And of those with jobs, 15 percent are on short hours because of lack of work, he said.

Finley told the committee that employment in the apparel and textile industries is sharply off from pre-recession levels and he warned that unless some realistic curbs are

New Deadline Set to Revise Election Law

While the committee bills do not deal with this matter, amendments that would provide public funds for House and Senate contests may be offered when the legislation reaches the floor. Two years ago, the Senate voted for public financing of congressional elections, but the House refused and the provision was dropped.

The Supreme Court originally set a Mar. 1 deadline for Congress to remedy the constitutional defects of the present election commission. It then extended the deadline to Mar. 22 at the request of congressional leaders.

In other developments:

- The House voted 210-183 approval of a bill that would grant "black lung" disability benefits to all coal miners with long service in underground mines.

The medical proofs currently required of claimants have been the source of controversy and red tape. The House bill, supported by the Mine Workers and opposed by the Administration, would provide payments of $200 to $400 a month to miners who worked at least 30 years in an underground soft-coal mine or 25 years in a hard-coal mine. It would be financed by a tonnage fee on all coal mined.

- A compromise bill banning the manufacture and sale of certain types of small, easy to conceal handguns failed to win House Judiciary Committee approval. The committee voted 17-16 to send the measure back to a subcommittee. Its action, after heavy lobbying by opponents of gun control, reversed a previous 18-14 endorsement of the bill.

Unions Press Congress on Job Programs

put on imports the job loss may never be recovered.

Among many examples he cited was a 29.4 percent drop in employment in the suit and coat industry between mid-1973 and mid-1975—a period in which imports increased despite the recession.

Finley urged congressional action on the job-creating measures proposed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting. He asked for a firm commitment to full employment, declaring:

"We must attain universal recognition that a person is entitled to a job at a decent wage and as a matter of right. The total community must assume this responsibility and guarantee its fulfillment."

Georgine termed President Ford's veto of the public works bill "dreadfully shortsighted" and said the economy very much needed the 600,000 jobs the legislation would have created.

He told the panel that the construction industry has carried "an unfair and disproportionate burden" as a result of the Administration's "discredited policies."

Georgine called Ford's proposed budget "politically calculated and socially destructive . . . the groundwork for further economic disaster."

The deficits that the Administration so fears, Georgine reminded the committee, are the direct result of high unemployment and a sluggish economy. With full employment, he stressed, the deficits would be wiped out by the higher tax revenue and lower welfare expenses.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH SAFEGUARDS to protect workers from the hazards of industrial chemicals were recommended at an International Labor Organization conference. Representing U.S. workers at the Geneva sessions were Vice President Arthur G. Wood, left, of the Chemical Workers and Vice President Elwood D. Swisher of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

ILO Conference Drafts Guidelines on Chemicals

Geneva—A 23-nation conference sponsored by the International Labor Organization called for action to insure that workers can perform their jobs free of all fear for their health or safety.

The ILO's chemical industries committee said that trade unions, employers and governments should "make every effort to use all available knowledge on technology to eliminate occupational hazards in workplaces."

When laying down guidelines for the developing of chemical industries in the poorer countries, the committee stressed that the "optimizing" of job opportunities should be a paramount consideration.

Elwood D. Swisher, vice president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Arthur G. Wood, vice president of the Chemical Workers, formed the U.S. workers team at the nine-day session.

The conclusions drafted by the committee for submission to the ILO's governing body for action were "generally satisfactory" to the worker delegates, Swisher commented when reviewing the results of the session.

Swisher, who served as the committee's worker vice chairman, said that the developing countries should particularly benefit from the conclusion adopted on how the chemical industry can best provide their workers with jobs.

"But the ILO will have to keep a close watch to make certain that due attention is paid to these findings," he cautioned.

The worker delegations overcame employer objections to win consideration of the impact of chemical production processes on the environment outside the plant.

Countering employer claims that this was not the concern of the ILO, the union spokesmen stressed that many workers and their families who live in the vicinity of the plants are exposed to the harmful effects of pollutants emitted into the environment.

The committee went on to recognize that the "working environment is an integral part of the general environment" and said "great care should be taken in solving problems within chemical plants not to create or aggravate environmental problems outside the plant."

Because of the possible danger of some chemicals to workers exposed to them on the job, the committee urged a "greater effort" at all levels, including international, to evaluate "regularly and systematically" the extent of the risk involved in handling such substances.

The committee said it was "essential to carry out all necessary investigations before manufacturing and putting into use" all the new chemicals that are being developed because of the serious hazards they may create for workers exposed to them.

W. J. Widman Retires, AFL-CIO Field Auditor

Danville, Ill.—W. J. Widman, field auditor for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Accounting, retired Feb. 29. Widman handled the auditing functions for the federation in midwestern and western states. He had been an organizer with the CIO before joining the AFL-CIO accounting staff in August 1956.

lowed under New York State's Taylor law, which forbids New York public employes from participating in strikes.

The charges grew out of a four-week strike that began Oct. 14, 1975. The teachers were found in contempt of a two-day restraining order by New York Supreme Court Judge Norman Stiller.

The eight teachers included officers and negotiators of the local and one rank-and-file member. About 280 of the Orchard Park school system's 310 teachers took part in the strike, which involved economic issues and the local's attempt to require that just cause be shown in the discharge of probationary teachers.

In addition to sentencing each of the eight to 30 days in jail, Stiller fined three of them $250 each, the maximum individual fine allowable under the law. Appeals to higher state courts were denied.

During the period of appeal, each of the eight teachers had spent about 9½ hours in jail. When the final appeal was rejected, they were sent to jail on Feb. 25 to fulfill their sentences.

Organized labor, along with state and county legislators in the Orchard Park area near Buffalo immediately contacted Gov. Carey, who heard their presentation and took their request for commutation under advisement.

Meany's telegram observed that jail sentences never resolve labor disputes or bring about agreements.

"In any case, since these jailings are taking place many months after the resolution of the dispute, there is no reason to proceed with jailings which can only be seen as vindictive and which will disturb the harmony which has been achieved by the Orchard Park teachers and Board of Education under their collective-bargaining agreement," Meany said.

In the settlement of their strike last November, the NYSUT local agreed to a compromise on the teacher probation issue. The new contract contained a just-cause provision for teachers who had fulfilled two years of their three-year probationary period. Until then, probationary teachers could be fired for any reason without a hearin.

Release of the eight jailed teachers was applauded by NYSUT President Thomas Y. Hobart. He said the fact that the governor "recognized the time already served as ample punishment bears out our position that the 30-day sentences were harsh and excessive."

Among those who met with Carey were George L. Wessel, president of the Buffalo AFL-CIO; Michael Ricci, Erie County Building Trades Council; Fred Carner, Buffalo Fire Fighters; Dan Sanders, a vice president of NYSUT; State Sen. Joseph A. Tauriello of Erie County; Assemblyman Vincent J. Graber, Sr., representing Erie and Wyoming counties; Joseph Benbenek of the Steelworkers, Buffalo; Joseph Newton, United Auto Workers; Hobart and Emanuel Tabachnick, NYSUT senior associate counsel.

BICENTENNIAL SALUTE to America's workers and unions for their contributions during the nation's first 200 years was staged in a two-performance musical program sponsored by the New York City AFL-CIO. The show, "I Paid My Dues," tracing the development of the American trade union movement from colonial times to the present, featured vocalist Elly Stone, left. It was written, directed and produced by Eric Blau under the auspices of Labor/Arts, Inc., the cultural arm of the city's central labor council, and its community services committee. Affiliated unions of the Actors & Artistes, the Musicians and the Theatrical Stage Employes cooperated in the production. James Joy, Jr., chairman of the community services committee, expressed hope the musical would be staged beyond New York City during the bicentennial year.

Cutbacks Cited:

Priorities Examined By Labor Educators

Degree programs in labor studies are proliferating at colleges and universities in the United States, but they face much the same economic problems as the country as a whole, labor and university educators were told at the annual AFL-CIO Education Conference.

Herbert Levine, director of labor studies at Rutgers University, noted "a tremendous interest" in the field on college campuses but pointed out that the recession has forced cutbacks in some programs.

At Rutgers, which was one of the first schools of higher education in the U.S. to institute a degree and advanced studies program in labor, six or seven full-time labor education instructors are being diverted to other academic activities, Levine reported.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, in opening the three-day conference, stressed the importance of economics in any soundly conceived labor studies program.

"American corporations are working at this fulltime," he said. "They are now influencing government on the basis of their projections. Labor is nowhere in the picture."

Assistant Education Director Rudolph Oswald reviewed the current economic picture in the United States, and emphasized that a working knowledge of economics is central to the trade unionist's education.

Joining Oswald in a panel discussion on how to get the economic message across were Russell Allen, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, and Philip Garman, coordinator of labor studies at the University of Illinois in Champaign.

In a panel discussion on goals of unions and universities in labor education, Levine said that "now more than ever labor educators and universities are going to have to concern themselves with priorities" because of the economic conditions facing the country.

With him on the panel were Charles Crown, education director of the Machinists; Bruce Raynor, education director of the Textile Workers Union of America; George Boyle, director of labor education at the University of Missouri, and Lois Gray, assistant dean for extension and public service at Cornell University.

Among other problem areas discussed by the panel were the dangers of over-specialization in labor studies programs and attaching too much importance to "credentialism," or pursuing a degree for the sake of a degree.

Dr. Gray observed that another problem area frequently is a difference in perceived goals between unions and universities. Unions tend to want labor studies programs to train workers for jobs and emphasize skills while universities tend to stress academic studies, she said.

Boyle stressed that the measure of success in labor education should be how well the program serves to prepare the individual trade-unionist. Crown and Raynor outlined programs their unions are conducting jointly with universities.

Other panels and workshops focused on union programs on women in the labor movement, how to improve union-university relationships, the role of university advisory committees, and economic issues in the public school system.

William Pollard, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, compared the struggle of women to gain their rightful place in today's workforce with the struggle of black Americans to secure their rightful place in society.

Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, called for an educational program to persuade state legislators of the need for enactment of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.

Marge Rachlin, a senior staff associate at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, noted that approval of the ERA by only four more states would enact it into law.

More than 125 delegates attended the conference. They included trade union and university education specialists and state federation staff members.

CLOTHING WORKERS demonstrate outside the Famous-Barr Co. department store in St. Louis to inform consumers of the disastrous effects apparel imports have on the livelihoods of American workers. Imports of men's and boys' clothing from low-wage countries have cost ACWA members nearly 60,000 jobs over the past five years, the union said in a recent report.

Supreme Court Shifts Position In 'Free Speech' Picketing Case

consideration solely in terms of labor law.

Justice Thurgood Marshall, who wrote the 1968 free speech decision, and Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., who was part of the majority in that case, dissented strongly from the reversal.

Marshall said the Supreme Court did not even have to get into the constitutional question since both the National Labor Relations Board and the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals found ample grounds in federal labor law for finding the denial of reasonable access to union pickets an unfair labor practice.

Thus, the dissenters said, the court should have gone into the constitutional issue. But since the court majority did so, the dissenters reiterated their belief that the free speech aspects of the 1968 decision are "sound" and that the First Amendment can't be denied in the "walkways of the modern shopping center" anymore than the streets and sidewalks of "a company-owned town."

The union's brief to the Supreme Court had stressed the argument that federal labor law clearly must take precedence over a state trespass law and also had sought to demonstrate that the free speech constitutional claim had added strength in this case because it was directly related to a business located in the shopping center and there was no other feasible way of bringing the union's message before potential customers.

Another case decided by the Supreme Court the same day was more in accord with the position argued by the AFL-CIO in a brief.

Although the union involved — the Teamsters—was not an affiliate, the AFL-CIO presented arguments on a facet of the case that had implications for unions generally.

A group of drivers who had been fired by their employer charged that their union hadn't been diligent enough in digging up evidence on their behalf. They claimed that the reason an arbitrator upheld their dismissal was that the union failed in its duty of fair representation.

The drivers sued both the union and management. A federal district court dismissed both suits, holding that the arbitration decision was final and there was no clear evidence of bad faith.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the dismissal of charges against the company, but sent the case back to the lower court for trial to determine whether the union was liable for damages.

The AFL-CIO brief contended that if any cause for legal action exists, "the employer's liability is primary" since he initiated the wrongful discharges "and that of the union is secondary."

In a 7-1 decision, with only Justice William H. Rehnquist dissenting, the court held that the truck drivers must prove a wrongful discharge and a union breach of its duty of fair representation. If they do so, they are entitled to a remedy from the employer as well as the union.

In other action, the full Supreme Court on Mar. 3 heard a reargument of the challenge brought by the League of Cities and the National Governors Conference against a 1974 amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act which extended coverage of the law to large groups of local and state workers.

Solicitor General Robert J. Bork, representing the government, argued that the 1974 amendments merely extend wage-hour coverage to groups of public workers who had not been covered in an earlier law that the Supreme Court had upheld in a 6-2 decision in 1968.

Utah Gov. Calvin Rampton, in a rare personal appearance by a high public official before the court, contended that "the last barrier preventing intrusion of Congress into the powers of the states and localities" would fall if the coverage was upheld.

The attorney for the League of Cities, Charles Rhyne, said the action by Congress would mean that citizens would get "less service at higher cost" from their local governments. When one justice suggested that city officials were effective lobbyists and perhaps should address their arguments to Congress, Rhyne said their views were "overpowered by big labor" and that unions had "steamrollered" the bill through Congress.

Democrat Wins Race For GOP House Seat

Jamestown, N.Y.—A labor-endorsed Democrat won a House seat that Republicans had held for more than a century in a special election to fill a vacancy in New York's 39th Congressional District.

Jamestown Mayor Stanley N. Lundine's decisive 55,400 to 35,100 majority came in a district where more than 60 percent of the eligible voters are registered Republicans.

Lundine, 37, defeated John T. Calkins, formerly a top White House aide to President Ford and one-time Republican national congressional campaign director.

Calkins's organization skills had been expected to compensate for his "carpetbag" image; he had spent more time in Washington than in his native Elmira for the past two decades. But as it turned out, the organization laurels of the campaign went to an all-out union effort.

The AFL-CIO's state, national and local COPE operations worked together to reach some 50,000 union members in the congressional district. Three central bodies in the area—the Chemung County AFL-CIO Assembly, the Jamestown Central Labor Council and the Dunkirk Area Labor Council—had major roles in the campaign, along with the district's building trades councils.

The special election resulted from the resignation of James Hastings, who held the seat for the Republicans since 1968.

Lundine, a popular four-time mayor, turned an anticipated close contest into a runaway. His election brings the party lineup in the House to 290 Democrats and 144 Republicans, with one vacancy.

The lone vacancy, in the 22nd district of Texas where Democrat Robert Casey resigned, will be filled after a runoff election on Apr. 3.

In the first round of voting, a Democrat with COPE endorsement, State Sen. Bob Gammage, led with 42 percent of the ballots. He will face Dr. Ron Paul, a Republican physician, who polled 39.8 percent. Four other Democrats and one Republican were also on the ballot and divided the remainder of the votes.

Flight Engineers Push Suit Against Furloughs

New York—The Flight Engineers stepped up efforts to prevent the furlough of 337 of the union's members employed by Pan American World Airways, instituting a major grievance against the company and completing depositions in connection with its lawsuit against the carrier.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court here last December, seeks to nullify a special agreement between Pan Am and the union signed last October.

The agreement was designed to save the beleagured company 50 to 75 percent of its flight engineer costs on overseas charters. It also would have stopped the planned furlough of 175 flight engineers and tried to prevent future furloughs.

In seeking to nullify the agreement, the union charged the company acted in bad faith by withdrawing unilaterally on Dec. 17, 1975, from a related earlier agreement—the furlough cancellation agreement—and announcing the furlough of 337 flight engineers, over one-third of their total number.

As a result of the company's reneging from the furlough cancellation agreement, the first 140 of the 337 flight engineers slated for furlough face the loss of their jobs.

The grievance procedure, begun Feb. 19, also concerns the company's withdrawal from the furlough cancellation agreement.

"It is unfortunate that after all the Flight Engineers have done and sacrificed to ease Pan Am's economic plight, Pan Am should allow such deception to occur," said Richard E. Smith, president of the union's Pan Am chapter.

The union said it was particularly disturbed by the airline's withdrawal from the furlough cancellation agreement since it followed two seemingly promising developments: Pan Am's completion of its best financial quarter ever and its success in obtaining a $93 million line of credit from 23 banks.

In addition, the withdrawal followed a two-year period in which the Flight Engineers waged an intensive and expensive effort to relieve the economic plight of the airline.

The union said this effort, still in progress, included a 1975 agreement to roll back $2.7 million in wage gains; fighting and winning continued Pan Am mail-carrying rights on the West Coast; winning the promise of congressional oversight hearings into the overall plight of Pan Am and U.S. international airlines, and investing in professional research and counseling services to enhance its efforts in Washington.

Feeding the Hungry

FOOD STAMPS, one of the most vital social programs in America at a time of widespread unemployment and continued inflation, is under vicious attack by the Ford Administration. This attack is unwarranted.

During the current recession, enrollment in the food stamp program followed the unemployment figures. As unemployment rose to 9.2 percent in May 1975, food stamp participation increased from 15 million to 19.4 million. Since last May, unemployment has eased slightly and the number of recipients has declined to 18.5 million. Another 14 million are eligible for food stamps but are not receiving them.

Food stamps help Americans who are on welfare or receive very low incomes. In recent years, people who once thought that they would never need food stamps have had to resort to them, just to keep their families from going hungry.

The Ford Administration has charged that the food stamp program is a haven for chiselers and rip-off artists but those allegations have been disproved by statistics of the government itself. Figures published by the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture show that the incidence of fraud is less than one-tenth of one percent among participating households.

There have also been charges that large numbers of middle-income students are getting food stamps. The fact is that such students are now ineligible under legislation denying aid to students claimed as a tax dependent by a household that is not itself eligible.

It has become clear that the real targets of the attacks, coming from the Administration, congressional conservatives and right-wing organizations, are the unemployed and low wage earners. Two bills designed to gut the food stamp program abound with provisions directly aimed against workers, as well as to punish the elderly and children.

THE MOST IMMEDIATE threat to the food stamp program comes not from proposed legislation but from a renewed effort by the Ford Administration to slash the program by administrative regulation. Only congressional action prevented the Administration from taking similar action last year.

The AFL-CIO will continue its strong opposition to any and all efforts to cut back on the food stamp program at the expense of those desperately in need. We will oppose any and all proposals which are not genuinely aimed at improving the food stamp program. We insist that the USDA effectively monitor the program so as to insure that no eligible person is denied food stamps.

Recent exposures of fraudulent food stamp vendors are evidence of maladministration by Earl Butz and his staff. Food stamp money is for feeding the poor and not for making stamp vendors rich at the expense of taxpayers.

The food stamp program has served millions of families in need. It must not be scuttled or slashed. Food stamps must be available to all hungry Americans who need them for themselves and their families.

A Word Edgewise:

Britain's Economic Woes Laid To Nationalizing Bankruptcy

By John P. Roche

Looking at postwar developments with a historical telescope, it now seems doubtful whether any government—socialist, conservative, liberal or, for that matter, social credit—could have significantly altered the course of events.

DENIS HEALEY, Chancellor of the Exchequer, has just delivered a grim message to the British people. In essence, he documented the position that the nation is bankrupt, that social services must be cut back, that there are no hidden assets left to tax, and the economy must be stimulated. In short, the British must prepare to lower their living standard: Workers living with double-digit inflation cannot expect compensatory wage increases. There simply is no slack.

The left-wingers in the Labor Party promptly went into hysterics, denouncing Healey for abandoning socialism, but the stark fact must be faced. British socialism, for reasons largely beyond Parliamentary control, has become the nationalization of bankruptcy.

There have been a number of similar pronouncements by American politicians, but the situation here is completely different. In structural terms, we hit a depression, but with a trillion dollar gross national product we have an enormous range of choices.

Indeed, one of the things I have found most annoying is the insistence that our first priority in economizing must be cutting social services. It is analogous to the captain of a ship, which has hit a reef and is slowly sinking, asserting that the root of the problem is that the crew is overweight. (By British standards, for example, we are hardly taxed at all.) We can plug the holes in our hull and pump out the water; the British can't afford to buy pumps.

For those of us who have a long, close connection with British socialists, there is a tragic irony about this disaster. Little did we, or our Labor friends, realize when we rejoiced over the results of the 1945 general election (in which the Labor party resoundingly defeated Churchill's Conservatives) what a ghastly inheritance that victory provided.

Socialism, we believed, would bring equality and prosperity to Britain, but in our euphoria we completely failed to consider the impact of the war and of decolonization on Britain's economic substructure. Thirty-one years later, Healey is calling for a different brand of equality: equal shares of hard luck.

The Labor lefties, addicted to Victorian Marxism, had a patented remedy for all occasions: nationalization. Public ownership would in some miraculous fashion transform, say, the railroads. But the real problem with the railroads was that they needed, in addition to repairing the war damage, vast amounts of investment for modernization.

The United States government is currently in the process of doing just that—but we have the resources. Flying the Union Jack over a railroad station did not provide any special socialist elan: In 1945 any British government would have been forced to take over the railroads.

Similarly the British coal industry was in desperate need of modernization and rationalization. In fact, a special commission appointed by the Churchill government, noting that perhaps half the mines in Britain should be closed as inefficient, suggested that only the state could undertake the task. The result? Another bankrupt industry nationalized. This sad tale could continue almost indefinitely: The latest triumph of socialism was the nationalization of the (bankrupt) aircraft industry.

STEADY ECONOMIC DETERIORATION has led to an understandable demoralization. The British worker has never been overpaid; now he is told to tighten his belt. Moreover, tribalism has popped up, notably in Scotland (which does not want North Sea oil revenues vanishing from their Scottish venue) but also in Wales. And Northern Ireland, of course, is a shambles. Internationally things have reached such a pass that Argentina is twisting the lion's tail over the Falkland Islands.

What haunts my conscience is the extent to which the United States is responsible for Britain's post-war economic shambles. The cruel truth is that, when Britain stood alone against Nazism, we forced the British—under our "Cash and Carry" policy—to liquidate their entire portfolio of foreign investments at fire-sale prices. Couldn't we extend our foreign aid program to include a substantial contribution to Britain? It would be a nice Bicentennial gesture.

Giveaways to Wealthy, Corporations:

Ford's Tax Proposal Assailed As Adding to Workers' Burden

The following is excerpted from a statement on tax justice adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Feb. 20, 1976, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

DESPITE YEARS of rhetoric, campaign promises and some small improvements recently adopted by Congress, the federal tax structure continues to be riddled with injustices.

Recent government reports have presented some dramatic illustrations:

● In 1973, according to the Internal Revenue Service, 22 individuals reporting incomes of $500,000 and over paid no federal income taxes whatsoever—seven of these superwealthy Americans reported that their incomes in 1973 were over $1 million.

● Eight large corporations with profits totaling $844 million paid no income taxes in 1974, according to a congressional study. The effective average corporate tax rate for 142 of the nation's largest companies was only 22.6 percent—less than half the statutory 48 percent rate.

● U.S. Treasury data show that U.S.-based multinational corporations earned $53.6 billion abroad in 1974 and paid U.S. corporate taxes of $1.7 billion—an effective tax rate of only 3.2 percent.

As a result of these and other injustices, working families pay much more than their share of the tax load.

In 1969, a small step was taken toward eliminating and curbing some of the major tax loopholes, despite the Nixon Administration's attempts at sabotage.

But by 1971 those small steps were completely reversed under the Nixon Administration's tax giveaways to business.

Early last year, as part of the emergency tax cut to stimulate the economy, some additional small steps toward tax justice were taken. The oil depletion allowance was substantially eliminated and limitations were put on some of the loopholes available to U.S.-based multinational corporations.

The emergency tax cut and its extension to mid-1976 prevented a further downward spiraling of the economy and made a modest contribution to tax justice. In light of continued high unemployment and the need for consumer purchasing power, the tax cut cannot be allowed to lapse in June.

The Administration has now proposed an array of new tax giveaways designed to benefit corporations, banks and wealthy individuals. The Administration forecasts a huge 32 percent increase in corporate profits for 1977 and admits its tax giveaways would save corporations $12.2 billion in taxes in 1977 alone.

In the 1960s, corporations paid about one-third of the nation's income taxes. In recent years, the corporate share has slipped to about 25 percent. By 1981 the Administration wants the corporate share of the nation's income tax load to be cut to less than 20 percent.

Obviously, that would mean the workers' share of the tax burden would increase even more.

The President's proposal of a so-called $28 billion income tax cut, linked to an equal slash in the budget, is pure politics. There would not be a $28 billion tax cut, in fact, and it is an excuse to dismantle vitally needed social programs.

We call upon the Congress to reject the President's political gimmick.

We urge the Congress to extend the present payroll tax withholding rates now scheduled to expire.

AMERICA'S WORKERS and the American economy cannot tolerate an increase in taxes this summer.

Further, the AFL-CIO urges rejection of across-the-board "tax incentives" for business investment—including further depreciation speedups, permanent investment credits, dividend write-offs, proposals to widen even further the capital gains loophole and additional gimmicks for the wealthy.

The Administration's scare talk of impending shortages of capital for all private business investment is unfounded. There may be some special and unique problems that will require specific tax incentives for a particular industry. In those clearly documented cases where the need has been amply proven, the AFL-CIO has already demonstrated its willingness to support measures tailor-made to meet the problem.

We will continue to oppose across-the-board tax gimmicks which would shift more of the tax burden to the backs of average Americans.

Laxity Breeds Scandals:

Nursing Home Abuses Spur Labor's Campaign for Cleanup

VICTIMIZATION of the nursing home population has grown so widespread that the prospect of entering such a facility commonly causes fears of financial ruin, poor health care and "loss of liberty and human dignity," Associate Director Lawrence Smedley of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said in a network radio interview.

Federal policy failures have left elderly Americans desperately in need of help, Smedley declared, stressing that hit and miss regulation of the $7.5 billion-a-year nursing home industry and virtually non-existent enforcement of standards of operation have bred conditions of scandal and national disgrace in many homes.

He said the AFL-CIO is mobilizing its community services representatives in state and city central bodies across the country to investigate nursing homes in their areas, call public attention to conditions they find and otherwise "stimulate more grassroots concern" and step up the demand for reform.

Smedley said on Labor News Conference that the AFL-CIO will coordinate those local efforts and direct the findings and reports to the appropriate committees of Congress and agencies of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. He acknowledged that past congressional investigations, hearings and media exposés have turned up a lot of evidence of scandals, abuses and shortcomings without producing substantial effective remedies for deplorable conditions.

Past failures of Congress and HEW to move effectively have not discouraged the AFL-CIO and other organizations with a strong commitment to older Americans, he asserted, but "have made us more determined than ever."

Smedley singled out fire safety as one area where Congress wrote stiff regulation into the law, but lax enforcement failed to translate the regulation into solid protection. Noting that "elderly people are more vulnerable to fires probably than any other group in the population," he said there were 6,400 nursing home fires in 1973.

Yet, he stressed, a 1974 survey of Medicare-certified nursing homes, which have been bound by the Life Safety Code of the National Fire Protection Association since 1967, showed that 59 percent had code deficiencies, and a 1975 survey showed two-thirds with four or more deficiencies.

Reporters questioning Smedley on the AFL-CIO produced interview, broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Anne McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONCE UPON A TIME, the United States was unified behind confident leadership. The times were dangerous. World War II was raging. The fate of western civilization was at stake. Yet national leaders looked ahead and spoke of planning and full employment.

There was a National Resources Planning Board which foresaw, at war's end, several years of reconversion to a peacetime economy and then a possible letdown. Early in 1942, the board said that "a positive program of postwar economic expansion and full employment, boldly conceived and vigorously pursued, is imperative." A conservative Congress dissolved the board in 1943.

President Roosevelt took up the banner. In January 1944, he proclaimed an economic bill of rights, giving highest priority to "the right to a useful and remunerative job."

Thomas E. Dewey, the Republican presidential candidate, declared in a campaign speech later that year: "If at any time there are not sufficient jobs in private employment to go around, the government can and must create job opportunities."

The full employment sentiment gained support in the Senate, where liberal Democrats and Republicans got a bill to the floor, entitled "The Full Employment Act of 1945." It committed the government to "provide such volume of federal investment and expenditure as may be needed . . . to assure continuing full employment."

The battle lines were familiar. Organized labor strongly backed the bill, along with the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations, liberals and church and civic groups. Organized business was against, with one spokesman arguing that "depressions are inevitable under the free enterprise system."

The resulting Employment Act of 1946 lost the word "full" on the way to enactment. The new law did establish a federal policy and responsibility "to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power." It created a three-member Council of Economic Advisers to assist the President, who in turn was required to submit an Economic Report annually. A congressional Joint Economic Committee was created to consider the report.

WHEN THE EMPLOYMENT ACT took effect, there were 58 million persons employed and only 2 million jobless. President Truman reported the nation had "virtually full employment."

Now, 30 years later, the United States is in the grip of the worst recession since the Great Depression. Although 86 million are employed, 3.5 million are forced on part-time. Officially, 7.3 million are jobless, but organized labor puts the total of unemployed, underemployed and drop-outs at more than 10 million.

So it is timely that the Joint Economic Committee has set a National Conference on Full Employment for Mar. 18-19 in Washington, D.C. As Chairman Hubert H. Humphrey remarked, "We have never been so far from meeting the goals of the Employment Act as we are today."

The conference and its unusual format may help focus public attention on the huge gap between the promise and performance of national economic policy. To stimulate discussion, the hearing will be laid out in a triangle. Committee members will sit on one side, expert witnesses on another side, and union officials, unemployed workers and community leaders on the third side.

Among the witnesses to be grilled are Alan Greenspan, President Ford's "free market" chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and Arthur Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. They are the architects of policies that call for minimum federal intervention in the economy and high-level unemployment.

A recent New York Times/CBS News national survey showed that 70 percent of the American people believe the federal government should "see to it that every person who wants to work has a job," but America has a President who believes otherwise.

WIDESPREAD ABUSE in nursing homes commonly spurs fear among elderly Americans entering such facilities that they will suffer financial ruin, poor care and loss of liberty and human dignity, Associate Director Lawrence Smedley, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Anne McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

A NATIONAL HOUSING POLICY to restore health to the depressed homebuilding industry and to invigorate the entire economy was called for by President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at the 45th annual meeting of the National Housing Conference. Georgine, right, discusses AFL-CIO proposals to revive the industry with NHC President Leon N. Weiner.

2.6 Million Units Annually:

Housing Conference Asks 4-Year Construction Plan

The National Housing Conference called on the Ford Administration to set a four-year construction goal of 2.6 million homes a year, with 1.2 million of them government-assisted units.

Deploring current depressed levels of homebuilding, Leon Weiner, president of the NHC, called on the government to restore housing and community development to its previous priority position in the nation.

The capacity for attaining the 2.6 million annual goal is there, Weiner said, noting that more than 2 million units were produced in each of the two years before 1973. What is needed is for the government to show its "commitment and the will" to do the job.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., echoed Weiner's call for action and urged adoption of a comprehensive housing policy drawn up by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

"It is clear that the manpower capability and industrial capacity exist to meet this country's needs," Georgine said in an address to the NHC delegates. "But the Ford Administration apparently does not recognize the dimensions of the problem or of the efforts required for its solution."

The last two years have been a disaster for the American homebuilding industry, Georgine declared. In 1975, new housing starts plummeted to the lowest level since 1946. Housing starts totaled 1.33 million in 1974 and 1.17 million in 1975.

He noted that 1976 is expected to be the third consecutive year of production shortfall in relation to national needs. The consensus of projections is that only 1.5 million housing units will be started this year, he said.

The AFL-CIO has urged that Congress and the Administration adopt immediate actions to fill the housing gap. These include a reallocation of funds for public housing, quicker release of funds for home ownership assistance, greater funding for housing for the elderly and the handicapped, and the release of $2 billion—already appropriated but held up by the Administration—to help ease the rental housing market.

Mortgage interest rates also should be lowered, Georgine said. Rates still are at about the 9 percent level, except those for limited mortgage funds under government programs, he said.

Weiner noted that the Nixon Administration changed its policies and abandoned its commitment to housing in 1973. Since then public housing has been so reduced in quantity that it represented only a very small portion of total 1975 starts, he pointed out.

"Housing production is greatly depressed, especially for low- and moderate-income families," Weiner said. "There is an inequitable burden on those who need housing and on the housing industry."

The goals of the 1968 Housing Act were designed to achieve a reasonably stable level of housing construction each year, he noted, yet the country has failed to achieve those goals or to avoid the unsteady cycles of housing construction.

Also addressing the conference were Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Sec. Carla A. Hills of the U.S. Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and Executive Director Vernon Jordan of the National Urban League.

Humphrey told delegates to the two-day meeting that the Ford Administration has "welched" on the government's 1968 commitment to build 600,000 government-assisted housing units a year. In 1974, the number of such units was only 60,000 while last year it was still below 100,000.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, who was a member of a panel that addressed questions to Mrs. Hills, noted the sharp decline in available rental housing vacancies in the last quarter of 1975 and the continued rise in rents and median prices of existing homes sold last year.

Schechter urged the Administration to take steps to make more funds available this year for Section 202 housing for the elderly and the handicapped and Section 235 homeownership assistance programs instead of relying on the slow-moving Section 8 program for low-income housing.

Railway Clerk Delegates Form Canadian Division

Winnipeg, Man.—Members of the Railway & Airline Clerks in all the Canadian provinces established an autonomous Canadian division of the union at a convention here.

The action had been authorized at BRAC's convention in Washintgon in May 1975.

Provisions of the union's international constitution, protective laws and statutes governing local lodges, will continue to govern all Canadian affiliates. However, any "conflicting provisions" of the constitution will be temporarily suspended—subject to the prior approval of the president and executive council of BRAC—until ratified by the union's 1979 convention.

The Canadian locals will continue to pay dues to the international union and to receive a division of the per capita payments as in the past. Locals in Canada will also raise their own funds for meeting the expenses of future conventions.

Headquarters of the Canadian BRAC organization will be in Montreal. BRAC Vice President W. Y. McGregor was elected president of the new division, and Bob Cranch will hold titles as assistant to the international secretary-treasurer and Canadian secretary-treasurer. Dick Smith, an international assistant vice president was elected vice president of the Canadian Division.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis, speaking to the 185 delegates, noted that he had recommended the new autonomous division to the last BRAC convention, and he commended the union's Canadian officials for their "vision and hard work" in bringing about its formation.

Dennis acknowledged that there are differences of viewpoint between union members in Canada and the U.S., but he added:

"Outweighing the differences are the common interests, and it is these common interests we must focus on, reach agreement on and move forward with."

Dennis noted that the Canadian wage freeze ordered by Premier Trudeau seemed much like that instituted by former President Nixon in the United States a few years ago.

"Collective bargaining," he said, "is a creative process, but it cannot long exist when government begins to dictate the terms of settlement."

Aluminum Workers Get 7-Cent COL Hike

Pittsburgh — Hourly wages for about 30,000 members of the Steelworkers employed by three major aluminum companies rose another 7 cents Mar. 1 under cost-of-living provisions of USWA agreements.

Earlier COL adjustments for workers at Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metals Co. and Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Co. have totalled 82 cents since the 1974 contracts went into effect, the USWA reported.

Raceway Union's Pact Features Charity Fund

Mineola, N.Y.—Parimutuel clerks at Roosevelt Raceway have come up with a sure winner in their union contract to help out orphans, the needy, aged, handicapped and the blind.

A three-year agreement negotiated last March by the harness track's Mutuel Ticket Agents Union, a directly affiliated local of the AFL-CIO, carries a provision for joint labor-management contributions to a charities fund.

At the rate of 2 cents an hour, the contributions work out to 15 cents a night per local member, and the track management chips in an equal amount for each of the clerks.

During the 160-day racing season in the first year of the contract, the 600-member local raised more than $20,000 through this means for charities. The money has been distributed among several organizations mutually agreed upon by the local and track officials.

"That has greatly improved the odds for a lot of kids overcoming their handicaps," said John J. Duffy, past president of DALU 23293.

Duffy, who headed the local collective bargaining committee that negotiated the agreement last year, said he came upon the idea from the charity fund while viewing Jerry Lewis's muscular dystrophy telethon.

Duffy, who also works as a lather during the day, now hopes to have his Lathers Local 46 and other building trades unions in the New York area establish similar funds under their contracts.

Of the more than $20,000 the Roosevelt mutuel clerks raised, $14,000 was given to the Association for the Help of Retarded Children in Nassau, N.Y. An additional $2,000 went to the United Givers Fund, and $1,000 each to Angel Guardian Home, an orphanage in Brooklyn; Human Resources Center, Association for the Advancement of Blind Children, and the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

Labor Scores Stalling On Job-Injury Benefits

to the President and Congress by January 1976.

Congress was urged by the Labor Dept. to delay action until the work of the task force was complete.

"January 1976 has come and gone," Biemiller emphasized. "February is also behind us, and the report of the task force is unavailable. We have been told the report will be ready by mid-year, and legislative action should be postponed until that time."

From past experience, Biemiller said, it is clear that "mid-year 1976 will come and go without the report, and Congress will be requested by the department to wait until next year before giving consideration to workers' compensation legislation."

He assailed the Labor Dept.'s "continued and repeated attempts to blunt workers' compensation reform, and called on Congress to act "this year" to achieve the "long overdue" reform.

The AFL-CIO testimony endorsed the principal features of the Williams bill and proposed improvements in some sections.

All victims of work injuries or disease would be entitled to medical care, rehabilitation, weekly benefit payments, choice of physician —and uniform benefits from state to state.

Biemiller emphasized labor's support of the principle that federal law, not state law, should determine whether an ailment is covered by workers' compensation.

He noted that at present, "heart disease is compensable in one state and noncompensable in another; asbestosis is compensable in some states and not in others; loss of hearing is treated in disparate fashion by the states."

A similar point was made by Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., in earlier testimony before a House Labor subcommittee.

Clayman noted that Arizona pays $33,000 for the loss of an arm at the shoulder, but Wyoming pays only $6,800 for the same loss. In New York, there is no limit on the period a widow and children of a worker killed on the job will receive survivor benefits, other than the age of the children. But Michigan has a time limit on payments and Oklahoma has a dollar limit.

A spokesman for the National Association of Manufacturers took an opposite approach. He said states have made "impressive progress" and no federal law is needed.

131 Major Labor Areas Still on High Jobless List

The number of major areas with substantial unemployment remained at 131 in February—unchanged for the third consecutive month.

A year ago, 74 of the nation's 150 major labor areas had substantial unemployment and two years ago the number was only 33. The recession high point was 135 last September.

An area is considered to have substantial unemployment when the jobless rate is 6 percent or higher and is expected to stay at that level for at least two more months.

In the February tally, Manchester, N.H., was dropped from the list and Kenosha, Wis., was added.

With 3 Carriers:

Airline Unions Win Major Settlements

Key settlements were won by four airline union groups in separate negotiations with three carriers.

The Air Line Pilots reached a back-to-work agreement with Miami-based Airlift International, Inc., a certificated air freight carrier, while the Machinists ratified a new contract with National Airlines and the Flight Attendants approved a new accord with United.

Meanwhile, the Air Line Employees Association, an affiliate of ALPA, announced the signing of an agreement with National providing for arbitration of economic issues in a new contract.

The ALPA contract with Airlift ended a strike that began on Nov. 14, 1975. While economic terms had been settled Feb. 10, the parties had been unable to resolve back-to-work issues.

Main obstacles to the agreement were the company's plans to retain strikebreaking pilots in supervisory positions, plus lack of assurance from the carrier that workers from other unions who honored the strike could return to their jobs without prejudice.

In the final agreement, the pilots preserved their seniority rights and the strikebreakers were not kept on. Also worked out were back-to-work agreements with members of the Transport Workers, ALEA and the Machinists who refused to cross ALPA picket lines.

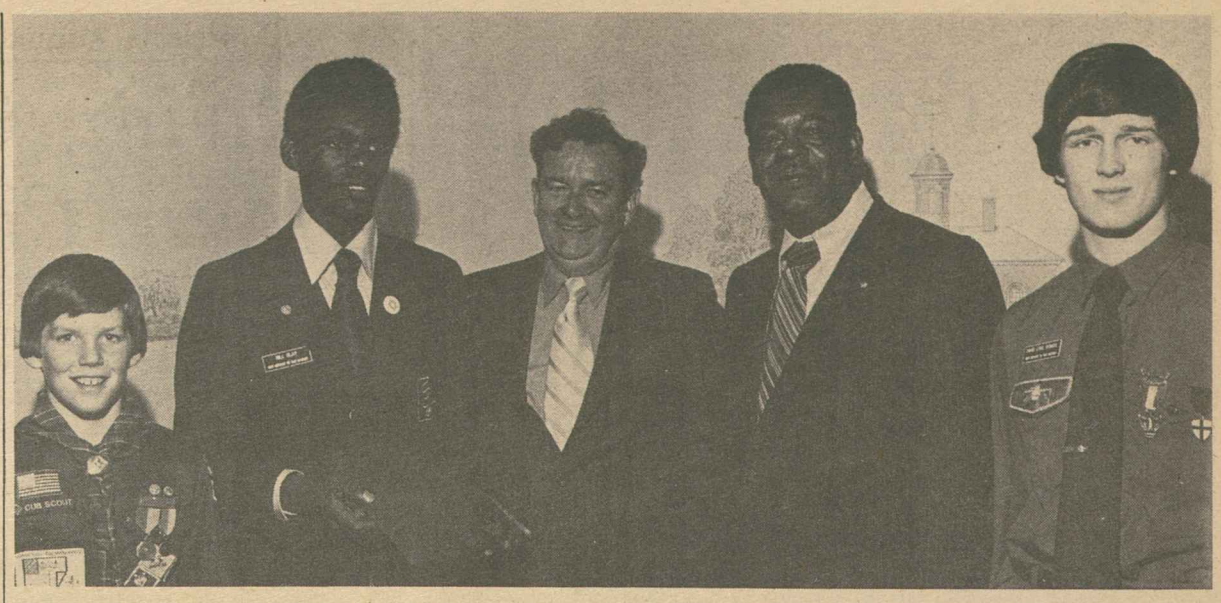
Airlift resumed partial operations on Mar. 3 and planned to be back on a full schedule within 10 days. Involved in the strike were 115 ALPA members and about 500 workers from sympathizing unions.

The Machinists' settlement with National will increase the pay of a top-rated mechanic from $7.84 to $10 an hour by July 1, 1978, assuming payment of two cost-of-living adjustments provided by the three-year agreement. Ratification was by a margin of about 5 to 1.

The contract, which covers some 1,500 workers, also improves pension benefits, medical coverage and premium pay for employes who hold government licenses based on proficiency. The contract is retroactive to Nov. 1, 1975.

Pension improvements raise the monthly benefits for workers retiring after last Jan. 1 to $16 for each year of service for top-rated employes. The amount will be raised to $17 in May 1977 and to $17.58 in November 1978. Comparable increases are provided for lower-rated employes.

IAM now has reached agreement with all major airlines but TWA and Braniff in its current round of bargaining with the industry.



Members of the Flight Attendants, also affiliated with ALPA, approved their new contract with United by a 6 to 1 margin. The agreement will raise the wages of some 7,900 attendants a total of 28 percent over the three-year life of the pact.

The new contract, retroactive to Oct. 1, 1974, also provides pension improvements and increased fringe benefits, including shorter duty days, better trip scheduling and single-room accommodations during stops away from home.

ALEA's agreement with National was worked out with assistance from the National Mediation Board. It not only specifies that there will be no strikes or lockouts, but also limits bargaining time which in the past has dragged on for more than a year.

ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said that, basically, the plan calls for three months of direct negotiations followed immediately by a month in mediation. If these discussions have not produced an agreement by the contract renewal date, economic issues will be referred to an arbitrator who must render a decision within 45 days.

LABOR'S WIDE PARTICIPATION in the nation's Boy Scout movement is cited in a report to AFL-CIO President George Meany during a BSA 66th anniversary celebration in Washington. The report was accepted by John McManus, center, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, and Lorenzo Stephens, human relations director of the Postal Workers. Presenting the report were, from left, Cub Scout Jeff Honsaker of Ogden, Utah; Explorer Scout Bill Clay of Copperas Cove, Tex., and Boy Scout David Honigs of Topeka, Kan.

Labor Food Co-op Pares Bills For Union Members in Phoenix

Phoenix, Ariz.—The bite the high cost of living takes out of the average worker's paycheck has been cut down to more reasonable size by AFL-CIO union members in the Phoenix area.

Under the leadership of the Central Arizona Labor Council, they have pooled their food dollars and set up Labor's Community Co-op, a full-fledged grocery and meat market where they can set their tables at savings of from 15 to 30 percent—and even up to 50 percent on some meat items.

Some 2,700 members of 36 local unions paid $10 each for lifetime memberships in the co-op. And many of them donated time and skills to refurbish a vacant building that once housed a fried chicken emporium and turn it into a modern, up-to-date food store. Still others put used grocery and meat equipment into operating shape.

The co-op was the fruit of much research and careful planning, according to Sec.-Treas. Jim White of the labor council. Union workers really started it a couple of years ago, he said, when inflation was boosting food prices at a rate that left pay hikes far behind.

"First the council conducted a survey of union members on what they thought ought to be sold in something like a co-op store," he recounted. "We found out what they were paying, and calculated what could be saved."

Arizona State University, in nearby Tempe, helped in the planning stages, he said.

"Finally, we had a council committee that among other things determined where our members were living, and on that basis picked a site on the west side which had the greatest concentration of workers in the city."

The council struck a rental deal with the fried chicken chain that still held a long-term lease on the building. Volunteer workers from building trades unions then turned the inside of the structure into an attractive food store. Total cost of the conversion, White reported, was about $28,000, including the second-hand equipment" which our members put into first-class shape."

The bulk of the volunteers were members of Retail Clerks Local 99, Meat Cutters Local 448, Operating Engineers Local 428, Sheet Metal Workers Local 359, Communications Workers Local 8519, Carpenters Local 906, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 387, Steelworkers Local 5914 and Iron Workers Local 75.

Through the federal Comprehensive Employment Training Act, the co-op got a grant for two trainee jobs yielding $1,610 a month. White, a member of the Meat Cutters, helped set up the meat department. Now the store has five employes working at union scale. The manager is Marie Astuti, a member of Retail Clerks Local 99 and a veteran of 30 years in food retailing.

The grocery stock consists of local and national brands selected by the members and produced under union contracts. The meat comes rom union-manned packing houses. The produce, so far as possible, is purchased from nearby growers.

"The store is a service to union members and especially to the unemployed," White said.

"A lot of them just can't afford to buy at other stores. But we sell for 59 cents a pound hamburger steak of the same grade the supermarkets are selling for 99 cents."

The store is open Tuesday through Saturday from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., and according to Astuti, prices on all items will be "as low as possible every day."

"This is a non-profit operation," Astuti pointed out, "and our prices will reflect that concept more and more as time goes on."

Customers, who must be members of AFL-CIO unions, find the relatively low meat prices "very exciting" and the "most attractive single item we have," he added.

White conceded there has been pressure from some employer groups apparently uneasy at the competition a growing co-op might offer. But the fledgling store, he maintained, "hasn't made a dent" in the supermarkets' business.

Meantime, in Tucson the Arizona Consumers Council has opened negotiations on converting a long-established supermarket into a co-op. Many union members have expressed interest.

Job Safety Standards Pressed for Divers

The Carpenters called on a federal interagency task force to act quickly in developing recommendations for a safety and health standard to protect commercial divers from job hazards.

Carpenters President William Sidell said that fast action on the standard is an urgent necessity because of the excessively high fatality rate among divers.

The task force, composed of representatives from the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, and the Coast Guard, is expected to make its recommendations in about two months.

Assistant Labor Sec. Morton Corn, who heads OSHA, announced the formation of the task force in response to a petition filed by the Carpenters last August and subsequent hearings held in November.

Sidell said, "It is a step in the right direction that Dr. Corn has made arrangements with the Coast Guard so that when the rules are issued, they will be enforced in a vigorous and uniform manner."

But he stressed that immediate action on federal guidelines is essential since workers' lives hang in balance.

The Carpenters cited British medical studies showing the annual fatality rate among that nation's divers is 10 per 1,000. Carpenters Vice President Patrick J. Campbell noted that that 24 deaths had been recorded among divers working on oil rigs offshore in the North Sea during the past four years. This fatality rate is 50 times greater than in British factories and 10 times worse than in coal mines.

U.S. divers face similar hazards with the stepped-up oil exploration on the outer continental shelves of the East and West Coasts, the union pointed out.

In addition to the high fatality rate among divers, the Carpenters cited in data presented at government hearings the hazards of blood, lung and bone disorders related to deepsea diving.

The union represents thousands of commercial divers in the construction of dock and harbor facilities, waterway projects and oil drilling operations.

NLRB Upholds Claims For Facts on Job Bias

Unions have a duty to file lawsuits against employers who discriminate against workers because of their race or sex and are therefore entitled to detailed information about an employer's workforce, a National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge ruled.

The decision stems from a long-standing dispute between the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and Westinghouse Electric Corp. over efforts by the union to obtain data showing whether the company was hiring and promoting minorities and women on the same basis as white males.

The union argued that because it might be legally liable for failure to correct discriminatory practices in contracts with employers, it needed the information to represent its members adequately.

Westinghouse refused to give the IUE the requested information. But Judge Marvin Roth of the NLRB held its reasons for withholding the information were insufficient.

Replying to Westinghouse's argument that the union wanted to use the data to file charges with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission or lawsuits, Roth said the union "has an affirmative duty to root out discrimination."

"Filing of charges with EEOC or lawsuits addressed to alleged sex or race discrimination . . . is a legitimate function of the union's collective bargaining obligation," Roth said.

His ruling broadens findings made last year by another NLRB offical that opened such records to an IUE local in Dayton, Ohio.

Roth declared that Westinghouse should furnish the requested information on all of its plants to the union or to its IUE-Westinghouse Conference Board, a national committee that conducts collective bargaining with the giant electrical manufacturer.

In his opinion, Roth cited the union's previous efforts to protect women and minorities. IUE had proposed to Westinghouse a program for promoting women and minorities from low-paying jobs and correcting unequal pay. He also cited various class suits instituted by the IUE when the company refused to grant maternity benefits and end other discrimination.

Roth's decision also directed Westinghouse to supply IUE with its most recent affirmative action programs covering each plant or location represented by the union.

On Import Limits:

Specialty Steel Jobs Tied to Ford Action

The jobs of 65,000 American steelworkers could be wiped out unless President Ford goes along with recommendations of the International Trade Commission to limit rising imports of specialty steel, labor and industry officials warned.

Ford has until Mar. 16 to approve, reject or modify the recommendations of the ITC that would hold imports to the 1970-74 annual average. In effect, this would lower current imports to 146,000 tons—a 10 percent reduction from last year.

President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers told a Washington press conference that for each 100 tons of specialty steel imported into the United States, one American steelworker's job is exported.

If imports continue to flood U.S. markets at the increasing rate of the past decade, Abel warned, there will be no American specialty steel industry by the end of the century.

Industry officials joined Abel in pledging that the labor-industry coalition would work to have Congress override Ford's action should he fail to approve the ITC recommendations. A simple voting majority of each house may override the President's rejection under the 1974 Trade Act.

Abel noted that nearly 70,000 workers in the U.S. basic steel industry, including about 20,000 in specialty steel, are laid off or working at reduced hours because of foreign imports.

While imports have captured upwards of 60 percent of some U.S. product markets, Abel said, two of every five specialty steelworkers have been out of a job in Pennsylvania and Ohio.

He said that although American steelworkers are the most productive in the world and their industry's technology and equipment is top rate, "we have seen the steady erosion of our markets and our jobs caused by imports."

Richard P. Simons, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., said the real issue is the competition posed for U.S. free enterprise steel producers by government-subsidized foreign firms.

"American steel companies are forced to compete—not with foreign companies—but with foreign governments that use their steel industries as instruments of national economic policy," Simons stressed. "Steel producers abroad operate under a completely different set of rules than those under which we operate."

He warned that American specialty steel users and consumers would pay substantially higher prices in the future after foreign imports capture a larger share of the U.S. market through the use of current "cutthroat" pricing policies.

Frederick G. Jaicks, chairman of the American Iron & Steel Institute, said the ITC decision should not be regarded as a "protectionist measure," but as relief for an injured industry.

Jaicks, who also is chairman of Inland Steel Co., said that "the specialty steel case is illustrative of the broader international trade problem that besets the entire steel industry."

Jaicks and Simons expressed full support for the USWA's position calling for relief for the steel industry. Last July, 19 steel companies also joined with the Steelworkers in petitioning the ITC to curb the rise in imports of foreign steel products.

Unemployment among USWA members in the carbon and specialty steels is running as high as 45 percent and has averaged 30 percent during the past year, Abel reported.

"American specialty steel companies and American specialty steelworkers can outproduce any company or any group of steelworkers" in the world if given an equal chance, he said.

"That is the crux of the problem," Abel declared. "We don't have an equal chance to compete."

He said a decision by the Labor Dept. earlier in the week to certify nearly 1,300 specialty steel workers for trade adjustment assistance substantiates the labor-management claims of injury to the industry.

Such assistance for workers displaced by imports is only a partial answer to the problem, Abel said. He pointed out that the USWA's supplemental unemployment benefits provide members with a more realistic weekly payment to meet their needs.

The USWA's Washington office noted that only a small percentage of Steelworkers who had been laid off as imports increased have actually been certified for trade adjustment benefits by the Labor Dept.

STEEL IMPORTS threaten thousands of American jobs if the Ford Administration fails to go along with recommendations of the International Trade Commission to limit them, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel warned. Supporting Abel's position at a Washington news conference were Richard P. Simons, right, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., and Frederick G. Jaicks, chairman of the American Iron & Steel Institute.

Ford Assailed On Substitute Jobs Proposal

In the first year of the program, 3,600 projects were under way or completed. "Studies have shown that relatively small street, sewer and water and public building projects can be started quickly and result in increased employment," he declared.

Ford's veto "damaged the American economy," the AFL-CIO told the committee, "and it will be harder than ever to achieve full employment, full production and a balanced economy."

The President's attitude, Biemiller said, "reflects the general Administration policy of timidity, caution—and the unemployed can wait while the economy rights itself."

While the Senate Banking Committee continued its hearings on the Administration bill, the House and Senate Public Works Committees were exploring other alternatives, closer to the vetoed bill.

Congress came within a hair of overriding Ford's veto of the public works bill. The House voted by much more than the required two-thirds margin to override the veto. The Senate failed by three votes to achieve the needed two-thirds.

Massachusetts Primary Narrows Field of Democratic Candidates

Boston—The second stop of the Democrats' long presidential primary process enhanced the candidacy of Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington and sped the process of winnowing other candidates from the field.

Jackson led the eight major candidates with 163,000 votes—23 percent of the total—in Massachusetts, the first major industrial state to hold a primary.

He was followed by Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona with 18 percent, Gov. George Wallace of Alabama with 17, former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia with 14, former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris with 8, 1972 vice presidential nominee Sargent Shriver with 7 and Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana with 5.

Bayh, who finished third behind Carter and Udall in the first primary in New Hampshire, announced 48 hours after the Massachusetts primary that he was suspending his active campaign because of a lack of funds.

Shriver and Harris reversed their order of finish in New Hampshire, but again were far back of the field.

On the Republican side, President Gerald Ford captured 63 percent to 37 percent for former California Gov. Ronald Reagan in a "non-contest" in which neither candidate campaigned in the state.

For both parties, the results headed the candidates to crucial tests in Florida Mar. 9.

For the Democrats, Florida is a three-way race among Wallace and the two early primary winners, Jackson and Carter. The latter got 29 percent in New Hampshire where Jackson did not compete.

And Florida is the second of the conservative states selected by Reagan as targets in his bid to unseat Ford. Reagan lost narrowly in New Hampshire and has banked heavily on Florida, where 66 GOP convention seats are at stake compared to 21 in New Hampshire and 43 in Massachusetts.

For the Democrats, Massachusetts is the biggest prize until Apr. 6 in New York and Apr. 27 in Pennsylvania.

Massachusetts had 104 convention delegates at stake, and Jackson won about 30 of them against 21 for Udall, 20 for Wallace, 16 for Carter, 7 for Shriver, 6 for Harris and one each for Bayh and minor candidates.

In the Vermont primary held the same day as Massachusetts, Carter got 46 percent of the vote to 31 percent for Shriver, 14 for Harris and 9 for McCormack, the only other Democrats competing. Reagan was not on the ballot, but got 16 percent on a write-in to Ford's 84 percent. No delegates were chosen in the Vermont balloting.

Ford got an estimated 27 delegates in Massachusetts to 15 for Reagan and one uncommitted. Updates on the previous week in New Hampshire gave Ford 18 of the 21 GOP delegates and Carter 15 of the Democrats' 17, with Udall getting the other two.

With the three primaries and an equal number of states with preliminary caucuses completed, the overall Democratic delegate selection process has netted roughly 40 seats each for Jackson, Wallace and Carter.

Thus Jackson's victory in Massachusetts in his first start left him with about the same number of delegates as Carter won in the New Hampshire and the caucus states of Oklahoma, Iowa and Maine. Wallace's biggest block came from party caucuses in Mississippi.

The Massachusetts victory, Jackson said in his post-election statement, proved that the Democrats have one dominant issue, jobs. He attributed the victory to the "lunch bucket" vote, which he said resurrected the "grand alliance" which elected Democratic Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Johnson.

Putting it together, Jackson said, was largely due to the labor effort on his behalf. The state building trades council endorsed Jackson, who also had extensive support from a big industrial local of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Ladies' Garment Workers, State, County & Municipal Employees and Machinists.

The upcoming primaries were scrambled by the collapse of the candidacy of Bayh, who also had extensive labor support. Bayh's Massachusetts labor committee totaled over 100 and his labor support was also extensive in New York.

10.5% 'Real' Jobless Rate Refutes Recovery Claims

Election Act Bill Backed By Labor

By David L. Perlman

A bill to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission and restore equal treatment of corporation and union political activities headed for the Senate floor with a strong AFL-CIO endorsement. The House will take up a similar bill after the Senate acts.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged senators to approve, along with some "perfecting amendments," the bill that was drawn up by the Senate Rules Committee.

It would patch up the holes in the campaign reform law left by a Supreme Court decision earlier this year. And it would also remedy some of the problems of interpretation and enforcement of the law—including the SUNPAC advisory opinion issued last year by the Federal Election Commission.

SUNPAC is the political action committee that the Sun Oil Corp. set up. Prior to the advisory opinion, the law appeared clear as to the differing jurisdictions of union and employer political activities. Unions could communicate and appeal to members and their families; corporations could communicate similarly with stockholders and their families.

The new legislation would nullify a portion of the advisory opinion that broke down this separation by allowing corporations to solicit their workers as well as stockholders and management officials for political purposes—and to use a checkoff to collect contributions even though unions did not have a similar checkoff right.

Under the new Senate bill, management could not seek political funds and support from its rank-and-file employes. Apart from stockholders, it could solicit only salaried management officials having supervisory or policy-making functions.

If a corporation used a checkoff for management contributions, it would have to allow a union to use a checkoff. The option would be up to the corporation.

Political committees of corporations and unions would be limited to the same maximum contribution of $5,000 to a candidate in any election.

A key section of the legislation would meet a Supreme Court objection by re-establishing the Federal Election Commission as an Executive Branch agency, with its members appointed by the President subject to Senate confirmation. Four of the six members of the present commission were named directly by Congress, and the court

Ford Hit On Budget Holddown

Unless the nation pursues more stimulative economic policies than the Ford Administration proposed, the fragile recovery now under way could founder in 1977, the Joint Economic Committee of Congress warned.

"We expect improvement in economic performance in the next several months," the JEC declared in a report by a majority of its members, "but we are very concerned that the President's restrictive 1977 budget, if accepted, would remove the supports from beneath the recovery at a critical time."

The committee, which is required by the 1946 Employment Act to review the President's annual economic report, announced its findings at a Capitol Hill press conference.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the JEC, cautioned the American people against "permitting ourselves to be lulled into a false sense of economic security which is conveyed in the President's budget," and reminded reporters that the nation has been the victim of misguided economic policies over the past seven years.

"What we've been having here is the gospel according to Nixon and Ford and the apostles of Stein and Greenspan—and frankly that's no way to heaven," Humphrey declared.

In a lengthy report on the economic situation and outlook, the committee's Democratic majority warned that the strength and duration of the long awaited recovery —particularly in 1977—is less assured than the President and his economic advisers would like the country to believe.

Subsidies for Multinationals:

Panel Urged to End Tax Loophole Drain

Top priority in tax reform should go to closing loopholes that lead to destruction of American jobs as well as loss of needed revenue, an AFL-CIO economist urged at Senate hearings.

Arnold Cantor, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, asked an end to three flagrant tax subsidies for overseas operations of multinational corporations. He urged a tax policy task force set up by the Senate Budget Committee to recommend:

- Dropping the foreign tax credit, which allows U.S. corporations to credit taxes paid to other countries on a dollar-for-dollar basis against taxes owed to the United States. Instead, foreign taxes paid by U.S. corporations should be allowed only as a cost-of-doing business deduction, "just like the taxes corporations pay to state and local governments."
- Ending the privilege accorded multinational firms to defer paying taxes on earnings of foreign subsidiaries until the profits are returned to the United States, "which may be never."
- Abolishing the Domestic International Sales Corp. (DISC), which allows corporations to set up export subsidiaries that can defer 50 percent of taxes on export profits.

Cantor said these reforms alone would bring in more than $9 billion a year in revenue and slow the outflow of American capital and technology.

He asked the Budget Committee also to include in its revenue estimates the "modest" tax reforms passed by the House last December in a bill still awaiting Senate action. The House bill would bring in about $1.5 billion in revenue, but Cantor said the amount could be substantially increased if some of its provisions were tightened.

Cantor listed other tax reform measures that have long been urged by the AFL-CIO, as "guidance to

Meany Says BLS Total Distorted

By James M. Shevis

The government's official report on joblessness in February seriously understates the true unemployment picture in America, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

A "realistic" analysis shows the nation's jobless rate was 10.5 percent rather than the 7.6 percent officially reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Meany said. Similarly, the true number of unemployed was 9.9 million workers instead of 7.1 million as reported by BLS, he declared.

Meany said the government fails to take account of discouraged workers who have stopped looking for jobs and workers on part-time because they have no other choice.

"To the 7,136,000 workers counted as unemployed by the Dept. of Labor, one must add the 972,000 discouraged unemployed who have given up hope of finding work," Meany said.

To that total, there should be added the partial unemployment of workers forced to work part-time because full-time work is not available, Meany said. Approximately 3.5 million persons worked part-time schedules in February "for economic reasons," BLS reported.

"Using the conservative measure of 50 percent of their time as unemployed we have added 1,760,000," Meany said. "Thus, the true number of unemployed is 9,900,000 or 10.5 percent of the adjusted labor force."

The government's figures obviously do not convey the full impact of unemployment in the nation,

Usery Denies Political Pressure On Job Safety, Health Standards

Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., says he has not been subject to "political pressure" in the setting of standards on occupational health and safety and that the department is committed to "the most professional approach" in this area.

Usery's statement came in response to a letter from AFL-CIO President George Meany pointing out that President Ford's New Hampshire campaign pledge to have OSHA treat "businessmen as friends, not enemies," was followed by reports of delays in publishing OSHA standards until after the election.

After obtaining a copy of a Labor Dept. memorandum, the New York Times reported that many standards due to be published now would be delayed until March and April of 1977.

Meany told Usery that the story indicated "a repeat of the 1972 attempt by the Nixon campaign to barter the health and security of American workers for campaign contributions to an incumbent Republican president."

Usery replied that he, too, "was shocked and dismayed at the New York Times article of Mar. 4."

"There is no truth to the implications of political maneuvering set forth in the article, for neither Dr. (Morton) Corn nor I have ever been subjected to any political pressure in the operation of OSHA," Usery wrote.

In addition to saying he had instructed Corn, the new assistant

Public Sector Unions Show Steady Gains

More than half of all full-time state and local government workers are members of unions or associations that function as unions, the U.S. Census Bureau reported.

Its tally of more than 78,000 governmental units showed a 10.1 percent membership gain between October 1972 and October 1974, the date of the latest count.

The 4,725,000 organized public workers reported by the governmental units surveyed amounted to 51.5 percent of the total full-time workforce. Local governments were most strongly organized, with 56 percent union or association the committee in its efforts to target major areas of consideration," even though it does not have legislative authority to write tax law.

Tax Reform Priority Urged On Loopholes

The budget targets set by Congress, however, are based on expectations of legislative actions dealing with programs, appropriations and revenues.

In the context of congressional budget action, Cantor urged the task policy panel to concentrate on those major areas where elimination of "costly" tax preferences would also "strengthen the economy and help put an end to the recession."

The emergency tax cut enacted last year and temporarily continued into this year proved "a major factor in cushioning the economic downslide and enabling the economy to survive the near disaster of last winter," Cantor testified. But "if the loopholes of special privilege to wealthy individuals and corporations were not so wide and fewer dollars escaped the tax structure, more money would have been available to bolster consumer purchasing power and fund the programs necessary to create jobs, protect the jobless and help state and local governments provide essential facilities and services."

At the hearing, the Auto Workers testified along similar lines but the National Association of Manufacturers took an opposite approach and suggested a new loophole. The NAM said individuals should get a tax credit for putting money into savings accounts or buying stocks and bonds.

OUTREACH TRAINEE Patricia Jones of Rochester, N.Y., receives the outstanding electrician apprentice award of the Recruitment & Training Program, Inc., from Deputy Director Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services at the R-T-P's annual conference in New Orleans. R-T-P Executive Director Ernest G. Green is in the center.

Outreach Job Training Hits Recession Barrier

New Orleans—The staggering level of unemployment in the building and construction industry has virtually halted progress in apprenticeship outreach efforts for the minorities, Executive Director Ernest G. Green of the Recruitment & Training Program, Inc., reported.

Addressing the R-T-P's eighth annual conference here, Green said, "Potentially, we're faced with cutting back the program in the East-Northeast, the geographic areas hardest hit."

A recent survey conducted by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. of 41 cities showed an average unemployment rate of 27.2 percent among construction workers.

Conference participants were told that R-T-P has already begun to focus its recruitment and placement efforts in the South's Gulf Coast area, moved into the technical-industrial placement sector, and expanded its Minority Women Employment Program.

MWEP, a project to place college-educated minority women in white-collar technical, professional and management jobs in the private sector, is currently providing services in Atlanta, Dallas, Cincinnati, Houston, Tulsa, New Orleans and Los Angeles.

Vernon E. Jordan, executive director of the National Urban League, warned in an address to the conference that cutbacks in needed government programs at the federal, state and local levels would increase the problems of the poor and the minorities.

He said that if proponents of this "new minimalism" get their way, most of the social gains made during the 1960s would be wiped out.

Federation Civil Rights Director William Pollard received an R-T-P appreciation award, and Don Slaiman, deputy director of the Dept. of Organization & Field Services, presided at an awards ceremony for outstanding trainees. Rep. Andrew H. Young (D-Ga.) was the guest speaker at the affair.

R-T-P is the outgrowth of the Joint Apprenticeship Training Program, which had been cosponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Workers Defense League. Randolph, a retired vice president of the AFL-CIO, and Bayard Rustin, president of the Randolph Institute, were guests of the conference.

Special conference participants included Dr. Roy Godson of Georgetown University, David Dorn of the U.S. Youth Council and Dr. Marcus Alexis of Northwestern University.

'Real' Jobless Rate Put at 10.5 Percent

Meany added, charging that the Administration's statistical "gimmickry"—a new so-called "seasonal adjustment" formula—further distorts the facts.

While there was a modest improvement in employment last month, the AFL-CIO noted several minus signs in the BLS report. Unemployment among blacks rose over the month from 13.2 to 13.7 percent. For black teenagers, the rate moved up from 34.6 percent in January to 35.2 percent in February. Meanwhile, the labor force remained unchanged at about 93.5 million.

"There is no rational reason for the euphoric, politically-inspired predictions of Administration spokesmen," Meany declared.

Alan Greenspan, the Administration's chief economic adviser, responded to the February jobs report by predicting that unemployment may fall below 7 percent by the end of 1976. Earlier, he had forecast the rate would be between 7 and 7.5 percent by year's end.

The strongest single point in the February jobs report was the increase in nonfarm payroll employment. BLS reported a gain of 210,000 in this category. Even so, the total of 78.3 million workers on nonfarm payrolls, while up 2 million from the June 1975 recession low, was still half a million below the historic high of September 1974 when the economy's slump accelerated.

Total employment in all sectors, as measured by a household survey conducted for BLS, moved up by 225,000 to 86,319,000 in February, the government said. The employed total now has fully returned to pre-recession levels, BLS said. A large part of the recovery has been among adult women. Employment of adult men is still nearly 700,000 below its high point.

The unemployment rate for household heads fell to 4.9 percent from 5.1 percent in January. For whites, the rate dropped to 6.8 percent from 7.1 percent. The rate for full-time workers also declined, from 7.3 to 7.1 percent, while that for married men was unchanged at 4.1 percent. The rate for teenagers fell to 19.2 percent from 19.9 percent.

Manufacturing employment continued to rise, but the increase of 42,000 was modest when contrasted with the expansion in earlier months.

Construction employment dropped by nearly 60,000 in February after a slight upturn in January, and the job count in that industry has hovered around the recessionary low level of 3.4 million for almost a year. The jobless rate in the construction industry last month was 15.5 percent.

Employment in services continued to climb, adding 70,000 to payrolls over the month. Transportation and public utilities also increased, with a gain of 30,000 jobs.

The average duration of unemployment fell to 16.2 weeks, down from 16.9 weeks in January. A year earlier, the average duration was 11.7 weeks.

J. C. Turner Elected To Metal Trades Seat

President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers has been elected 10th Vice President of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

Turner fills a vacancy on the MTD executive council caused by the retirement of Hunter P. Wharton, the president-emeritus of the IUOE.

Not Enough Investigators:

Wage Law Violations Swell Backlog 78%

The Labor Dept. received a record number of complaints of employer violations of the wage-hour law during the 1975 fiscal year, but didn't have the investigators to check upon all of them.

In the fiscal year that ended last June 30, a total of 52,846 wage-hour complaints were filed, up 30 percent from the previous 12 months. But over the same period, the backlog mounted 78 percent to 17,659. And since then, the Labor Dept. confirmed, it has continued to grow by more than 1,000 a month. The latest tally, as of Jan. 20, 1976, was 25,610 complaints awaiting investigation.

The department's annual report on the economic effects of the Fair Labor Standards Act showed that the latest rise in the minimum wage, which went into effect Jan. 1, 1976, resulted in increases to 3.9 million low-paid workers and will pump about $1.2 billion of purchasing power into the nation's economy before the year is out.

The wage floor for most workers rose last January to $2.30 an hour; for recently-covered non-farm workers to $2.20 an hour, and for farm workers to $2 an hour.

But already, the department report said, inflation has wiped out the step-up in the minimum wage that Congress voted in the 1974 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The $2.30 minimum in January 1976 was worth no more—in fact a penny less—than the $2 minimum when it took effect in May 1974.

Over the same period, the federal minimum wage remained at a relatively low 46 percent of the average hourly earnings in manufacturing. Between 1950 and 1974, every increase in the minimum wage for already-covered workers brought the federal wage floor to at least half the average factory wage.

The annual report noted also that enforcement of the Equal Pay Act, which bans job discrimination based on sex, resulted in payments of nearly $7.5 million to nearly 18,000 workers. An influx of complaints of sex discrimination came from public employes newly brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act. But while about 6,000 such workers were found to be owed $7 million by public employers, a large part of the amount was uncollected as city and state governments pressed their constitutional challenge to the coverage of their employes.

The Labor Dept. said that its efforts to achieve compliance with the equal pay law in higher-paid white-collar employment has not been at the expense of persons in lower-paid jobs. "Thus," the report said, "one-third of the equal pay suits filed in fiscal 1975 involved custodial workers and nursing assistants," resulting in collection of "substantial back wages."

Another section of the report said that wage-hour inspectors had found 17,000 minors employed in 2,466 establishments in violation of the child labor provisions of the FLSA. This was 15 percent higher than in the previous fiscal year. Of these, 2,849 were found working at hazardous occupations.

The report to Congress noted that the record level of complaints regarding minimum wage and overtime violations "necessitated devoting the bulk of the Wage & Hour Division's enforcement efforts to servicing complaints" rather than to inspections of establishments where no workers had complained.

It suggested that "the economic downturn of the past year" was a factor in the increased violations.

Election Act Revisions Head for Vote in Senate

said such an agency could not exercise the powers given it. Ford is insisting that the commission's life expire after this year's presidential election, but the Senate bill would continue it.

The Supreme Court held that Congress could not limit the amount a candidate may spend out of his or her own pocket on a campaign, and the new legislation does not change that since it was based on constitutional grounds.

Another Supreme Court ruling, that Congress can not prevent an individual or organization from exercising a "free speech" right to advocate a candidate's election, would be clarified by the Senate bill. An individual or an organization using voluntary political contributions could take such actions as putting up a billboard backing a candidate—but it could not be done as part of or in coordination with a candidate's campaign. If it were, the funds would have to come out of the individual limit of a $1,000 contribution to any candidate or the organization limit of $5,000.

Among the perfecting amendments the AFL-CIO asked senators to support are proposals to:

- Require individuals contributing $100 or more to list their occupation—a disclosure requirement of present law that the committee bill would drop.
- Lower the bill's limit on individual contributions to multi-candidate political committees. As it now stands, the bill would allow a wealthy individual to give up to his entire $25,000 political campaign limit to a committee set up to help two or more candidates.

The AFL-CIO is supporting amendments that would avoid such a loophole. An individual would still be able to give up to $25,000 to a national political party committee for its entire campaign.

- Give the Federal Election Commission authority to impose civil penalties for non-willful violations of the law.
- Allow either the House or the Senate to reject any portion of rules and regulations issued by the Federal Elections Commission.

The Senate was scheduled to take up the election bill after completing action on another labor-supported measure—amendment of the Hatch Act to end most of the restrictions on political activities by federal workers.

Senate passage appeared certain as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The House passed a similar measure and a House-Senate conference committee will have the job of drafting a final version. President Ford has threatened to veto any major revision in the present law.

At Firm's Annual Meeting:

Stockholders Hear Victims Of Stevens Union-Busting

New York—Stockholders of J. P. Stevens & Co. at their annual meeting received first-hand accounts of the company's long record of union-busting. And a substantial number of them registered their concern.

The meeting in the auditorium of the giant southern textile firm's headquarters in midtown New York heard personal testimony from seven present and former employes of Stevens about the company's tactics.

Two formal proposals presented to the meeting called for a study of the costs of Stevens's long dispute with the Textile Workers Union of America and a separate study of inequities suffered by plant employes.

In a mailing to all stockholders, management had condemned both proposals as "inflammatory" and requested a "no" vote. Nevertheless, the proposals received the support of holders of more than 800,000 shares, representing some 10 percent of total stock ownership.

Paul Swaity, TWUA organizing director, called the vote unprecedented. "For the first time, the reality of Stevens's labor relations was on the agenda of a stockholders' meeting and it was possible to get some enlightened discussion between workers and company ownership," Swaity said following the meeting. "The support demonstrated by the stockholders of proposals questioning company labor policy was very impressive and encouraging."

A few days before the annual stockholders' meeting, the National Labor Relations Board urged the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here to find Stevens in contempt for ignoring previous court orders to stop intimidating and coercing its workers. The case involved the TWUA's organizing efforts at Stevens plants in Wallace, N.C.

In the past 13 years, the NLRB has found Stevens guilty of unfair labor practices in 15 separate cases involving the TWUA. Board rulings against Stevens had been upheld 11 times—three of them by the Supreme Court. Three contempt citations have been handed down against the company for ignoring court orders and continuing to violate federal labor law.

The union has won awards to workers totaling more than $1.3 million for unjust firings and other abuses by the company in its anti-union campaign. Last year Stevens made a $50,000 out-of-court settlement to avoid a court trial of TWUA charges of wiretapping and other spying activities against the union and employes.

Among former Stevens workers who spoke at the stockholders' meeting was Thomas "Buck" Malone who worked for the company for 37 years—"All my life except what I served in World War II." Hampered by breathing difficulties, Malone retired in 1973. He received as his total retirement benefit from the company one lump-sum payment of $1,310 and a plaque thanking him for dedicated service.

It has since been determined that Malone's breathing difficulties may be the "brown lung" disease that afflicts workers after long service in inadequately-ventilated fabric mills. The union has moved to get Malone additional compensation on that basis.

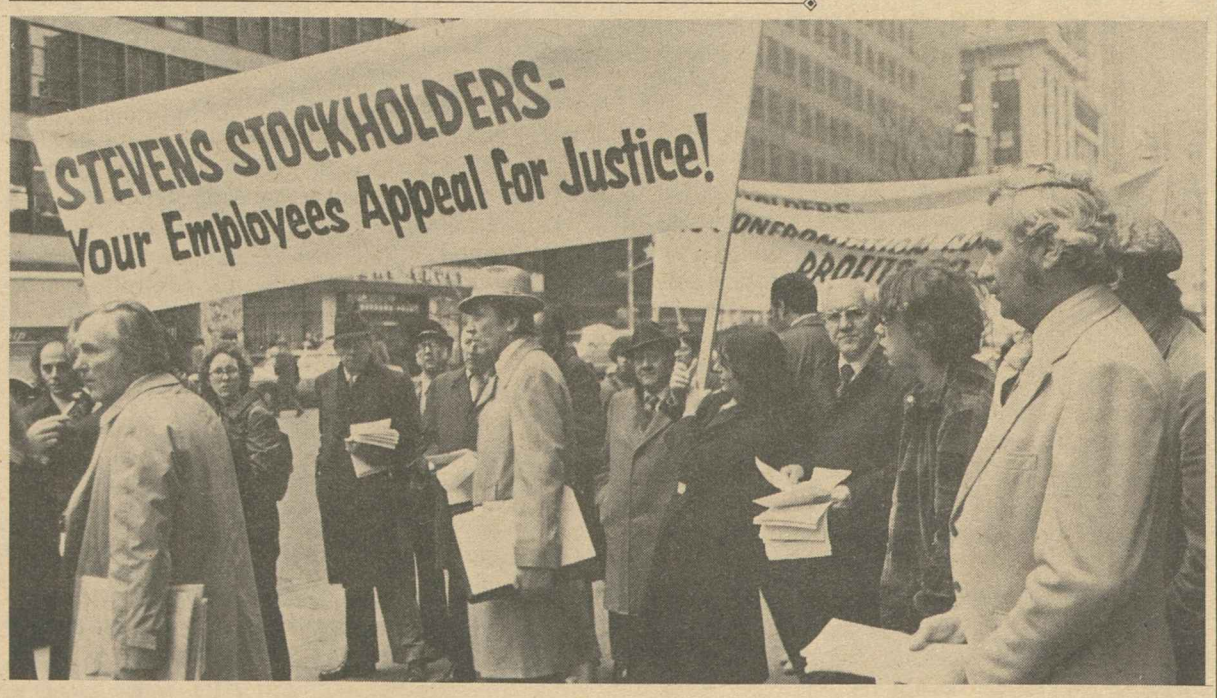
Another plant worker who spoke was Mildred Whitely who worked for the company for 26 years and had opposed the union. She was fired last year after undergoing major surgery which left her unable to perform her former heavy work. The company claimed it had no lighter work for her and fired her when she was a few hours late in filing her request for an extension of sick leave. She received a lump-sum retirement benefit of $1,360 and no plaque.

In 1974, TWUA won a representation election involving about 3,600 employes in the seven Stevens plants at Roanoke Rapids, N.C., but has been unable to negotiate a contract. Swaity told the stockholders that instead of bargaining in good faith, the company is continuing its campaign of coercion, intimidation and other unfair labor practices.

TWUA President Sol Stetin has called on the courts to "impose multi-million dollar penalties against the company for continued and flagrant violations of the labor law and deliberate defiance of court orders."

Top Stevens management, through Board Chairman James D. Finley, insisted that "93 percent of our employes don't want a union" and "we'll continue to do everything in our power to protect our employes."

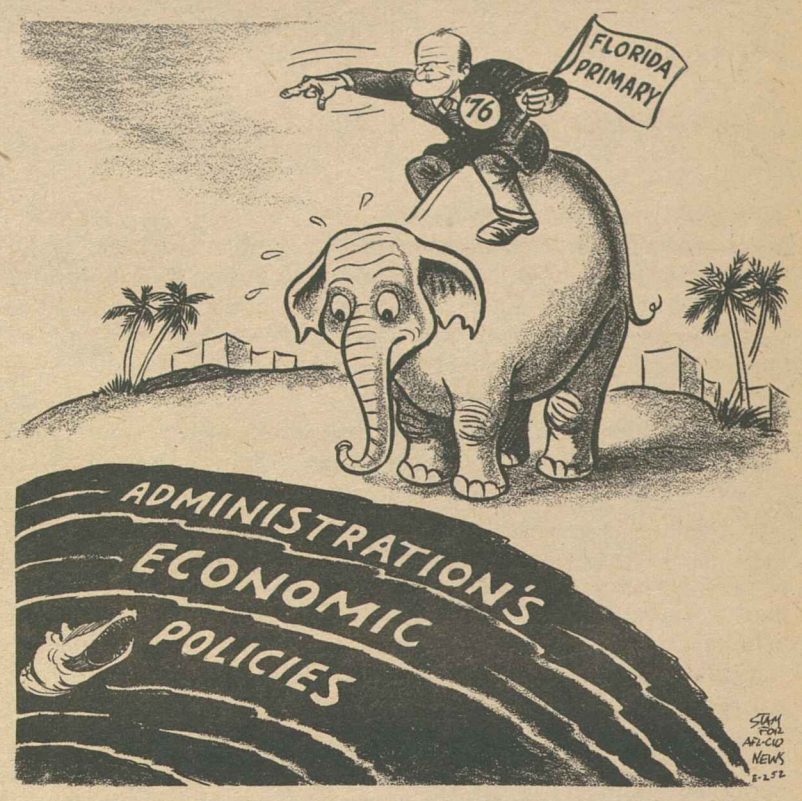
The AFL-CIO Executive Council last month set up a subcommittee to work with TWUA and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. on action "to achieve justice for Stevens workers." Swaity told a news conference after the stockholders' meeting that the results would spur labor's efforts to bring pressure on Stevens management.



Ex-Astronaut Chairman Of Bargaining Institute

New York—Frank Borman, president of Eastern Airlines and former astronaut, has been elected chairman of the board of the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, the labor-management foundation dedicated to making collective bargaining more effective.

Col. Borman's election was announced by the institute's president, William W. Winpisinger, vice president of the Machinists. Borman will succeed former Postmaster Gen. Elmer T. Klassen, who has retired.



Winpisinger also announced the addition of eight new members to the institute's board: Paul Burnsky, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; Malcolm Denise, former labor relations vice president of the Ford Motor Co.; Robert Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Alvin Heaps, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; John J. O'Connell, industrial relations vice president of Bethlehem Steel Corp.; Rex R. Reed, labor relations vice president for AT&T; Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers, and Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts.

Theodore W. Kheel, arbitrator and mediator, is administrative director of the institute.

TEXTILE WORKERS appeal to J. P. Stevens & Co. stockholders at the company's annual meeting in New York to bring a halt to management's anti-union tactics and labor law violations. Stevens has been found guilty in 15 cases involving unfair labor practices in the 13-year struggle of the Textile Workers Union of America to organize the company's workers in several southern states.

'Forward!'

Florida Primary Breaks Wallace's Grip on South

A fellow southerner, former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia, has broken Alabama Gov. George Wallace's long stranglehold on Democratic presidential primaries in the South.

Carter defeated Wallace, 34 percent to 31 percent, in the Florida primary, the third stop in the Democrats' trek through 30 primaries to the July convention. Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, the only other Democrat to make a major effort, was third with 24 percent of the Florida vote.

Among Republicans, President Ford scored his third successive victory over conservative challenger Ronald Reagan, the former governor of California. Ford won 53 percent of the vote to 47 for Reagan in Florida, a state Reagan backers had targeted as conservative enough for a serious challenge to Ford.

The Reagan camp was predicting victory in Florida, by as much as 2-1, before Ford brought the prestige of the presidency into the state two weeks before the election. Previously Ford won more narrowly against a thorough Reagan effort in New Hampshire, then took 63 percent of the vote in Massachusetts where Reagan did not compete.

Among Democrats, Carter's Florida victory followed the emerging formula of victory to the candidate with the best campaign organization. Carter won in New Hampshire with what was judged the superior organization, as did Jackson in Massachusetts.

But for Carter, the victory was of major import because it came over Wallace, who swept the Florida primary with 42 percent of the vote in 1972 and has dominated all Democratic primaries in the South since he first emerged as a presidential candidate in 1964. In 1968, he carried the five states of Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana as a third-party candidate.

Carter fashioned his victory by competing with Wallace across the entire state, which no Democrat could do in 1972. He took as much as 60 and 70 percent of the state's vote among blacks and a CBS-New York Times election day poll showed Carter with nearly one-third of the vote regardless of whether the voters considered themselves liberal, moderate or conservative.

Jackson carried the heavily populated Miami area, including all three congressional districts in Dade and Broward counties which are traditionally dominated by large turnouts among retirees, Latin and Jewish voters.

Carter also had labor support from nine unions, six of them AFL-CIO affiliates, which worked together in trying to curb Wallace's vote. The president of one of the nine, Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, appeared in Florida on behalf of Carter. Jackson was supported in Florida by some of the same unions that were given major credit for fashioning his Massachusetts victory

For Carter, the victory was worth 34 delegates, bringing him to the top of the heap with 70 pledged delegates. He has more coming from the caucus states of Oklahoma and Iowa where he led the early stages of selection.

The Democrats' rule that guarantees delegates to everyone with 15 percent or more of the vote in a congressional district helped Wallace pick up 26 delegates and Jackson 21 in Florida.

Nationwide, Wallace now has about 58 delegates, with his Mississippi caucus victory counted, and Jackson has 55 from the Massachusetts and Florida primaries.

Gov. Milton Shapp of Pennsylvania, former Sen. Fred Harris of Oklahoma and Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona were also on the ballot in Florida, but only Shapp campaigned there and none of the three won any delegates.

Carter pointed his campaign to Mar. 16 in Illinois, where Democratic delegates are listed separately on the ballot and are elected regardless of the outcome of the "beauty contest" among presidential contenders. Delegate slates pledged to Sen. Adlai Stevenson, with the backing of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, and to Gov. Daniel Walker have kept most Democrats from filing complete slates. Wallace and Carter will be joined in the popularity test by 1972 vice presidential nominee Sargent Shriver.

Jackson's next major effort will be in New York, where presidential candidates are not on the ballot and it's up to the voter to know which delegates are pledged to whom.

After Florida, Ford and Reagan were also faced with head-to-head competition in Illinois a week later, with Reagan stating flatly that his chances for a first primary victory over Ford were not good.

A Commitment, Not Scapegoats

THE AFL-CIO BELIEVES that decisive federal action must be taken which would directly meet the fiscal emergencies of state and local governments caused by the economic crisis. Specfiically, we urge:

Immediate Senate passage of legislation which would provide federal funds to the states and localities to protect present public service jobs and provide additional employment in the public and non-profit sectors of the economy.

Rejection and reversal of President Ford's proposals to shift present federal welfare and Medicaid costs to the states and localities. There must be immediate, substantial relief for the states and localities in this financial area which can only be achieved by the federal government's complete assumption of the full cost of Medicaid and welfare.

Improvement of the allocation and entitlement formulas under the Revenue Sharing Act to insure that funds are targeted to areas most in need, particularly the nation's urban centers. The allocation provisions should also be strengthened to encourage increased state use of fairer and more progressive income taxes. Adequate and enforceable federal standards and safeguards must be added to insure that the federal funds are used for programs that reflect national needs and priorities and fully comply with federal civil rights guarantees, labor standards and protections.

Establishment of a new agency like the Reconstruction Finance Corp. to provide government guarantees of state and local bonds, as well as loan guarantees and low-interest, long-term loans for the preservation and creation of jobs in the private sector, including housing.

We call upon Congress to reject proposals to shift responsibility back to the states and localities for problems that are national in scope and effect.

Present federal aid programs should be reviewed in order to increase their efficiency and ensure that state and local governments obtain federal aid to which they are entitled and which they need. Any consolidation or reorganization of existing programs must contain appropriation and adequate provisions—including enforcement procedures—to assure that the national interest is fully served. Federal purposes and performance standards must be safeguarded; the job rights, employment conditions and other benefits of workers directly affected by such actions must be protected; there must be full compliance with federal civil rights guarantees.

The level of funding for public investment and services should be maintained and increased at all levels of government.

Many other measures long advocated by the AFL-CIO to stimulate the economy, create jobs and help meet America's fundamental social needs and problems would at the same time revitalize and strengthen the states and localities.

The financial problems of state and local governments are not insoluble, but they cannot be resolved by Administration rhetoric, media distortion, cuts in public services, or by making public employes scapegoats. Resolution of these problems rests most importantly on a national commitment to end the disastrous economic policies of the Nixon-Ford Administration and return to a full employment, full production, balanced economy.

—From an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on the financial crisis of state and local governments.

Mao Makes Ideological Point With Nixon's Ego-Trip to China

By John P. Roche

WHEN IT COMES to international practical joking, you have to hand it to Chairman Mao Tse-tung. He has clearly decided that the Mandate of Heaven has not been transferred from Richard Nixon to Gerald Ford and, in the same way that we conceived of the notion of "two Chinas," he may be about to sponsor an American separatist movement headed by the former President.

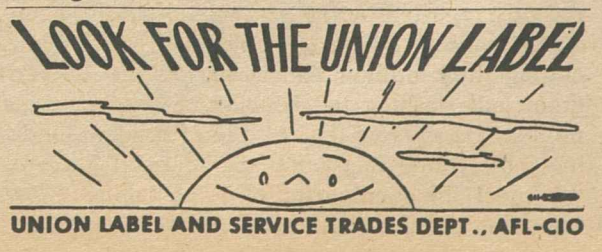
Sen. Barry Goldwater suggested caustically that Nixon ought to stay in China—actually the prospect might be quite tempting. Imagine, he threw a dinner for the Red Chinese leadership, they all came, it was very chummy, and finally they wouldn't let him reach for his wallet! Most Republicans wouldn't go to dinner with him even if he paid.

From the outset the affair was right out of Tis-nei Land. Peking sent a private 707 to pick him up, he was greeted like a Founder of the Party who had participated in the Long March, and the rumor was that as soon as he learned Mandarin Chinese he would take over Chou's old spot, replacing "Acting Prime Minister" Hau Kuo-feng. (Can it be an accident, comrade, that Hau has only been designated "Acting Prime Minister"?)

At last report, he was traveling around China banqueting with the revolutionary chairmen of various provinces—perhaps getting a feel for his future subordinates?

Well, there is no point in going completely off the map. The Chinese are out to make a point: In ideological terms they want Nixonism to dominate American foreign policy. So what if he plastered their Vietnamese comrades and mined Haiphong harbor?

From their cold-blooded viewpoint that was an indication that the United States meant business in foreign affairs. To them, as—for that matter—to most nations in the world, Watergate was a trivial incident. On the other hand, when President Ford and Chairman Kissinger went to Helsinki and signed the "Final Act," Peking interpreted the action as a craven capitulation to Soviet pressure. Nixon did not let his hosts down: In a toast at one of the banquets, he threw a barely disguised barb into the policies of his successor.



The Ford Administration, by overreacting, tended to confirm the Chinese conviction that Richard Nixon is still a serious figure in American politics. If the President had said, "Dick, by all means go and have a great time, and give our love to Pat," the whole event would have been a non-happening. After all, the Communist Chinese vote in American primaries is hardly all that big. To the question, "Will Mr. Nixon be debriefed on his return?" the obvious answer was, "Sure." To the follow-up question, "By whom?" again the correct and simple answer was, "By officials who are qualified to evaluate the information he has acquired." Instead, we had that silly ping-pong game between the White House and the State Dept.

Viewed in a realistic perspective, Richard Nixon is not a serious figure in American politics. He couldn't be elected tree warden in our Republican town. If the Chinese think he is, that is their problem and they certainly have paid for an education. It is inconceivable to me that a picture of Nixon and Mao engaged in deep thinking would change a vote in any Republican primary. Thus, in practical terms, the former President has enjoyed a wonderful ego-trip. Think of it: back in (Chinese) Air Force 1! None of the nonsense he would have to put up with if he made a public appearance in, say, Pekin, Ill.—no pickets, no boos, no GOP politicians suddenly down with the flu.

FOR ONE WHO HAS served as the President of the United States, all roads lead down. In Nixon's case this was immensely emphasized by his ignominious departure, but I recall visiting former President Johnson shortly after he returned to Texas, and his one overriding complaint was, "They have taken out all my phones!" (Probably, only one who understood LBJ's addiction to the telephone could appreciate the enormity of this malevolent act.)

But now, briefly, in the wilds of Tartary, Richard Nixon has been given back the illusion of power. Politically it has been meaningless, but personally he has undoubtedly lapped up every minute of it.

You know? He might just decide to sell San Clemente and return to permanent residence in Peking.

Key Consumer Gains at Stake In Ford's 'Deregulation' Plan

By Sidney Margolius

SOME OF THE MOST important gains in consumer protection may be lost if advocates of what has come to be called "deregulation" have their way.

On the surface, the deregulation campaign is an attack on government red tape and waste. The would-be deregulators say at least some government agencies should be eliminated. Deregulation sometimes also is called "regulatory reform."

Chief proponents of deregulation are President Ford and his various department heads and some businessmen. In fact, Ford has made deregulation one of his main campaign issues.

Some frustrated consumer advocates also have called for deregulation. But they mean something else. They feel that some government agencies are unduly influenced by the industries they are supposed to regulate. Thus, their rate-setting and other activities tend to cost the public extra money and also impair competition. The agencies usually criticized for these reasons are the Civil Aeronautics Board, Interstate Commerce Commission and Federal Communications Commission.

While such reform proposals differ from the "deregulation" sought by the Administration, the problem is that the consumer advocates have given the attacks on regulatory agencies some respectability. The danger is that the baby may be thrown out with the bath water.

As a consumer you need to be especially suspicious. Deregulation could destroy many recent consumer gains such as truth-in-lending; truth-in-packaging; auto, tire and toy safety regulations; increased Federal Trade Commission policing of deceptions; many Federal Drug Administration activities such as regulation of food and drug safety and suspect additives. Also at stake are efforts to improve safety of household and other consumer products through the recently-established Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Unfortunately, the recently-departed chairman of the product safety commission joined the controversy with a statement on retiring that staff members have drawn up a plan to phase out the agency by 1982. "Some agencies can outlive their usefulness," he said.

In actual fact, rather than even nearing the point of outliving usefulness, in its first three years the commission has completed only two safety standards—for bikes and swimming-pool slides—and is facing hard-nosed opposition from industry on proposed standards for power mowers and household aluminum wiring.

One notorious example of dangers from profit-seeking deregulation masked as reform is the current attempt to deregulate natural gas prices, now regulated by the Federal Power Commission. The Ford Administration maintains that deregulation and the resultant higher prices would encourage larger supplies of gas. A study by the Library of Congress estimated that deregulation would cost consumers $5.4 billion the first year and more in later years.

Workers face double jeopardy from the deregulation game, not only as consumers but from greater job hazards if even present skimpy safety regulations are loosened.

UNION OFFICIALS and some Labor Dept. officials themselves have been concerned by Administration attitudes that the government should reduce its role in developing and regulating working conditions related to safety.

Another example of potential harm from deregulation is the safeguards provided by the Securities & Exchange Commission. With widespread corporate bribery being revealed, such activities could run rampant if no agency can require corporations to report on such matters, as well as police the stocks and bonds industry.

Some businessmen themselves have voiced fears of deregulation. A Washington representative for a major communications industry trade association told me, "I'm not sure many businessmen really want deregulation. For example, we wouldn't want to get rid of the SEC."

This is not to say that regulatory agencies should not be made more effective and economical, comments one long-time labor editor. But what the public wants is more efficiency, not less protection.

Sometimes useful regulation can have a deregulatory effect in eliminating industry and local restraints on competition. Such helpful efforts include FTC's action to nullify state laws that absolve lenders from blame for dealer tricks, and also laws that prohibit price advertising of drugs and eyeglasses.

'Vicious Campaign':

Attack on Food Stamp Program Threatens to Spread Hardship

PRESIDENT FORD'S assault on the food stamp program threatens to add hunger to the already long list of hardships that millions of America's elderly, poor and jobless suffer, a union food and nutrition lobbyist warned in a network radio interview.

Arnold Mayer, Washington legislative representative for the Meat Cutters, said the "vicious propaganda campaign" against food stamps launched last summer by top Administration spokesmen and others has now expanded to attempts to gut the program either by changing the law or bypassing Congress and imposing even more restrictive administrative regulations.

Mayer said that attempts to picture the program as a "fraud-ridden . . . ripoff" are without foundation in fact, and that even the Dept. of Agriculture's own figures "give the lie to those charges."

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Mayer said that the food stamp measure recently reported by the Senate Agriculture Committee, unless reshaped, would deal a stiff blow, cutting three million Americans out of the program and slashing the benefits of another three million. He stressed that with the President blocking job-creating legislation and parallel attempts "to knock the unemployed off food stamps . . . we are going to have millions of people unemployed or working short hours and . . . their families going hungry."

Mayer said the labor movement is committed to an all-out fight to protect the food stamp program, which is the "main bulwark against hunger among the poor, among many senior citizens and among the unemployed—millions of unemployed." He said that Senators Bob Dole (R-Kan.), Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and George McGovern (D-S.D.) are among the bipartisan group that will offer amendments for that purpose when the Agriculture Committee bill reaches the Senate floor.

Mayer scored the President's attempt to attract conservative voters in Florida and New Hampshire by lashing out at food stamps and those who get them. He said it is "a slander against Republican voters" to assume that they are "so callous that they will appreciate a candidate who will cause hunger among unemployed families," and predicted that the tactic would fail politically.

Mayer was questioned by Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and David Prosten of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesday over Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN THE NEW DEAL days of the 1930s, President Roosevelt said that one-third of the nation was ill-fed, ill-clothed and ill-housed.

This observation is about the ill-housed—or, more accurately, about those who cannot get housing because they cannot afford it. It is about the estimated 80 percent of the low- and middle-income Americans who need and want decent housing but who cannot afford it.

A lot of laws have been enacted by Congress dealing with housing in America. The government has laid down a policy that all Americans are entitled to decent housing in a decent environment. The government has established that, currently, the nation should be building more than 2.6 million housing units a year to meet this goal.

In 1973 there were 2.5 million occupied housing units lacking some or all plumbing facilities. Another 1.5 million occupied units were dilapidated. This gives the nation about four million occupied substandard housing units.

Since it is national policy to replace such substandard units within a decade, 400,000 units annually would be required to make up the four million in ten years. By adding the 2.25 million units that are needed to meet basic (and always expanding) housing requirements the total annual housing requirement becomes 2.65 million units.

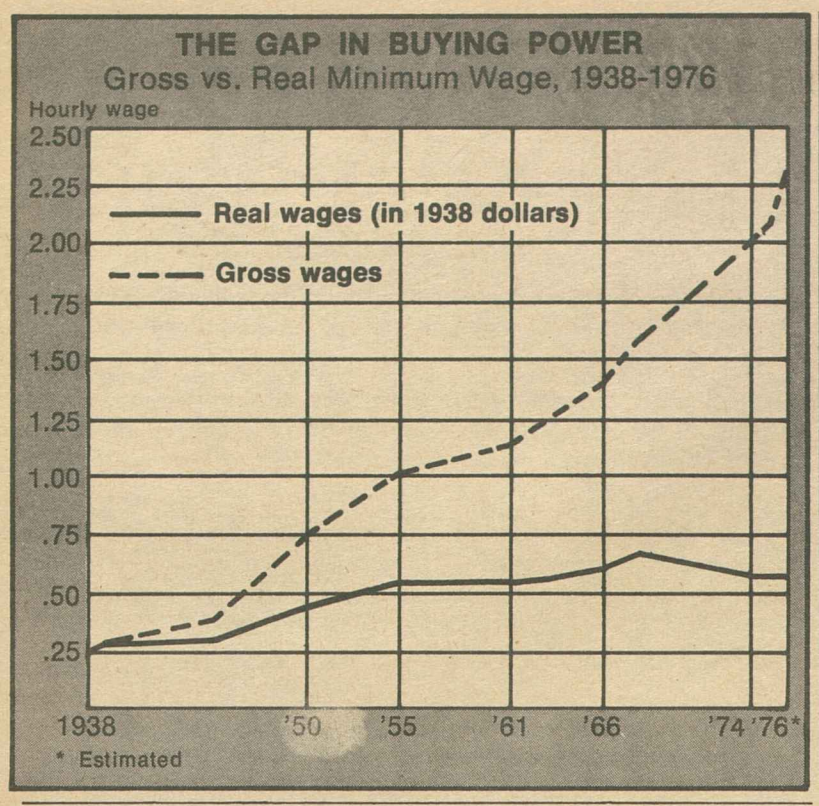
The fact is that because of the recession, unemployment, inflation and high interest rates on mortgages, only about half that number of units is being built.

The recession has hit the building and construction industry harder than any other industry in the nation. The industry actually has been in a depression and needs effective help from the federal government, especially from the Executive Branch.

IT HAS NOT GOTTEN that help and there are no signs that it will get it from the Ford Administration. Leon Weiner, president of the National Housing Conference and a large-scale developer and builder, believes that even with the present inadequate laws, the industry could be given a fresh start if the Administration had "the commitment and the will" to do the job.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) charged at the recent NHC meeting that the Administration's housing program is "bankrupt" of any national strategy. That was about the mildest remark made at the conference. Stronger statements were made by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, chairman of the congressional Joint Economic Committee; by Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, and by Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Meanwhile, 900,000 skilled building and construction workers cannot find jobs. And uncounted millions of low- and middle-income Americans are looking for housing and cannot find any because they cannot afford to buy in today's market. To make matters worse, rents have been going up at a rate of 5 or more percent a year.



The median price for new houses is $42,000. The median price for existing housing is $36,000. That means that half of the houses available cost more than those figures. And mortgage interest rates continue at 9 percent.

One thing that all economists seem to agree on is that if the federal government will take the lead and stimulate the housing industry out of its depression, America will have taken a big step toward getting the whole economy out of the continuing recession.

How to get the government—especially the President and his advisers—to move forcefully on the "housing disaster," as it was termed at the Housing Conference, is the big question.

ADD HUNGER to the hardships suffered by America's elderly, poor and jobless should President Ford's plan to gut the food stamp program succeed, Meat Cutters Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Dale McFeatters, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and David Prosten of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Farm Workers Upheld On Organizing Access

California's Supreme Court upheld the right of the state's Agricultural Labor Relations Board to allow farm union organizers to go into the fields at specified times in order to talk to workers.

Employer organizations had charged that the access rule violated their private property rights, and two state courts had agreed with them. But California's highest court, in a 4-3 decision, found the access rule reasonable and constitutional.

It said the state law giving farm workers collective bargaining rights "is designed to benefit the public as a whole," and property owner rights must be "subordinated to the general welfare."

Justice Stanley Mosk, speaking for the court majority, noted also that the limited restriction on property rights doesn't amount to "a deprivation of fundamental personal liberties."

Cesar Chavez, president of the United Farm Workers, praised the decision as an affirmation of the right of workers "to participate in the democratic process." Grower spokesmen attacked it and indicated that efforts would be made to carry an appeal into the federal courts.

The challenged rule allows union organizers to go into the fields at lunch breaks and for one hour before and after regular working hours.

The all-out grower attack on the access rule was a major factor in a legislative roadblock to funding of the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board. The board, charged with supervision of representation elections and dealing with unfair labor practice charges, has run out of money, and a coalition of Republicans and rural Democrats blocked the two-thirds majority needed to pass an emergency appropriation. There were some indications that the deadlock might soon be broken.

Three dissenting members of the California Supreme Court agreed with the grower argument that the state agency had gone beyond the policies of the National Labor Relations Board in issuing its access rule. It contended that if access were to be allowed at all, it could only be after a case-by-case finding that there was no alternative means for a union to communicate with workers.

The court majority said the differences between industrial and agricultural labor conditions justified a departure from NLRB rules of procedure. It noted that most farms don't have parking lots, cafeterias or other nonwork areas where union organizers can reach employes. Thus a general rule allowing access to the fields is reasonable.

A spokesman for an employer association that had challenged the access rule told reporters that a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision that a union does not have a constitutional right to picket in a privately-owned shopping center would be helpful in an appeal "because property rights are involved in both cases."

Area Parleys Gear COPE For Elections

Labor continued to gear up for the 1976 elections as the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education neared the midpoint of a series of area conferences across the country.

Six more conferences are due by Apr. 9 in what COPE Director Al Barkan has described as an effort at "keeping those newly won congressional seats" from labor's successes in 1974, when COPE-endorsed candidates won a record 70 percent of the races for governor, senator and representative.

"Any conservative who survived the elections of 1974 has the odds with him in 1976," Barkan has pointed out. "By contrast dozens of workers' friends who were elected for the first time in 1974—from normally conservative districts—will be vulnerable this year."

The area conference schedule:

Mar. 21—at Minneapolis for Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota.

Mar. 26—at Chicago for Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Mar. 29—at Oklahoma City for Arkansas, Kansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas.

Apr. 1—at Denver for Colorado, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming.

Apr. 6—at San Francisco for Arizona, California and Nevada.

Apr. 9—at Seattle for Alaska, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon and Washington.

Conferences already have been held in Atlanta, Washington, D.C., Hartford, Conn., and New York City.

'74 Amendments Obsolete:

Minimum Wage Increases Wiped Out Fast by Inflation

The 1974 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act went far to extend coverage under the minimum wage law but did little to improve workers' buying power, Clara F. Schloss, a consultant to the AFL-CIO, points out in an article in the American Federationist.

The amendments provided for a minimum wage of $2.30 an hour to be reached in stages and covered 7.4 million additional workers bringing the total to almost 58 million or 85 percent of all nonsupervisory employes.

But, Mrs. Schloss observes in the AFL-CIO monthly publication, the increases were overtaken by inflation even before the effective date of the new legislation in May 1974.

"The rapid devaluation of the 1974-75 minimum wage rates suggests that consideration must be given to adding a cost-of-living escalator if the minimum wage is to serve as a meaningful floor under wages," the author says.

Throughout the almost 40 years that the nation has had a federal Fair Labor Standards Act, low-income Americans have faced a recurring need to catch up because of eroding purchasing power after each new set of minimum wage amendments, she notes.

Some of the goals set when the FLSA went into effect in October 1938 are slowly being achieved, the article notes, but the recent economic climate in the United States has caused a worsening rather than an improvement in the historic struggle for better purchasing power for those on the bottom.

"The actual minimum wage has increased tenfold between 1938 and 1975 but the real value of the minimum wage over a 37-year period has little more than doubled," Mrs. Schloss says.

Consequently, the AFL-CIO is pressing for new legislation to raise the federal minimum wage to $3 an hour and to require payment of double-time rates after eight hours' work in any day and after 40 hours in a week.

The three central ideas of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 were to set "a floor under wages," a "ceiling over hours" and to "give a break" to children. Its main objectives were to eliminate "labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being of workers," as well as to avoid unfair competition.

The original act set up a minimum wage schedule for employes covered by the law: 25 cents an hour from Oct. 24, 1938, to Oct. 23, 1939; 30 cents an hour from 1939 to 1945 and 40 cents in 1945.

The act also set up maximum workweek standards and established a principle that work above the maximum number of hours per week would be paid for at the rate of at least one and one-half times the employe's regular rate of pay. The maximum standard was 44 hours a week until 1939; 42 hours a week until 1940 and 40 hours after Oct. 24, 1940.

From the very beginning, FLSA legislation has had strong opposition, Mrs. Schloss observes. For the most part the opposition has come from those who have opposed any attempt to establish minimum rates of pay either by law or by collective bargaining.

"Opposition spokesmen have shifted their cries over the years from predictions of general and widespread disaster to forecasts of increased unemployment and more recently to increased unemployment of blacks and teenagers," the author notes.

Despite all the dire predictions, she points out, the FLSA with its improving amendments has done a creditable job of achieving many of the objectives it was designed to achieve.

"It has raised the wages of the lowest paid workers and helped to bring many of them into America's mainstream. It has reduced excessively long hours of work. It has eliminated the worst child labor abuses in factories and on farms, and it has helped industry by expanding the number of workers who are able to buy farm and factory products," Mrs. Schloss writes.

She adds that the accomplishments are particularly noteworthy since opponents of the legislation have succeeded in denying the protection of the law to many of the most depressed groups for long periods of time, and have succeeded in delaying increases in the level of the minimum wage until after the "real" value of the wage floor had been eroded by rising prices.

The most recent amendments to the FLSA, those enacted into law in 1974, came into being after lengthy debates stretching over a three-year period and six years after the FLSA had last been amended.

Mrs. Schloss notes that between the time the $1.60 minimum had gone into effect in February 1968 and April 1974, the month before the new law became effective, the purchasing power of the $1.60 rate had dropped to $1.14.

In calling for legislation to raise the minimum wage to $3 an hour, the AFL-CIO noted at its 1975 convention that inflation had made the present minimum-wage schedule "obsolete."

The federation has expressed support for a bill by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) to raise the statutory minimum wage, in steps, to $3 an hour and to provide for automatic increases to reflect rising living costs after the $3 rate becomes effective.

The AFL-CIO told Congress the measure "will meet the immediate needs of the overwhelming majority of low-wage workers, and will benefit the entire economy by generating additional purchasing power and additional jobs."

Georgine Scores Award To Ford by Contractors

Employers who picked President Ford as their "man of the year" because he vetoed the construction site picketing bill obviously can't tell their friends from their enemies, a union official said.

Ford's policies brought the construction industry "to the brink of depression," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Dept. declared.

Georgine and Ford both addressed the Associated General Contractors convention. Georgine told the employer group that Ford's record on matters affecting construction has been "abominable." Ford was given his award later in the convention.

Georgine suggested that organized labor represented the "real friends" of the construction industry.

He asked the employer group to consider who fought "for a public works program that would put contractors back into business" and "who lobbies Congress to bring down the interest rates."

These and other measures to revive the construction industry are being pressed by the unions, Georgine stressed, and not the Right to Work Committee or the Chamber of Commerce.

"Our industry, our economy, our country stand in despair and yet management praises an individual whose policies helped bring about the disaster," Georgine chided.

Ford told the employer convention that even though the construction industry "has not shared fully" in the economic recovery, things are looking up in a "very encouraging way."

OFFICIAL OLYMPIC BLAZER came with the task AFL-CIO President George Meany accepted as an honorary chairman of the U.S. Olympic Fund Committee. It was presented by Edwin Mosler, right, national committee chairman, and Martin Cohen, a committee member and a retired local official of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who pointed out that the blazer also carries a union label.

Budget Limits Hit:

Ford Policies Seen Dragging Out Slump

"The President's economic report is a blueprint for continued recession-level unemployment and high inflation for several years," the majority declared.

By contrast, the JEC report called for steps to achieve by the end of next year a gain of more than 1.5 million jobs, a reduction of 2 percent in the inflation rate, and an $80 billion increase in production.

Federal spending would be slightly higher under the JEC majority's program than the President's "totally unrealistic" recommendation, Humphrey noted, "but with the higher tax receipts which come from greater prosperity the deficit would be little if any larger."

Key elements in the JEC program include a budget sufficiently large enough to support a sustained recovery, an expanded jobs program to remove workers from the unemployment insurance rolls, lower interest rates, and a voluntary price-incomes policy to break the inflationary spiral.

Humphrey declared that monetary policy holds the key to continued revival of the private economy, and urged that the policy of the Federal Reserve Board be designed to prevent any major rise in short-term interest rates and to encourage reduction in long-term rates.

He expressed concern over the apparent tightening of Fed policy in the last week or so, saying "I hope it is a false alarm and that the Fed will pursue a continuing policy to foster recovery."

Among its main recommendations, the JEC said the goal of economic policy should be to reduce the nation's jobless rate to 6 percent by the end of 1977 and eventually to a rate no higher than 3 percent of the adult labor force.

Until enough jobs are available for all, the committee recommended, unemployment compensation or other income support must be extended. Also, since nearly one-half of all unemployed workers today are under 25 years of age, it urged Congress to develop a comprehensive program aimed specifically at the employment needs of young people.

Another proposal called for continuation "at least through the end of 1977" of the personal tax reductions that have been in effect since May 1975. Without new legislative action, taxes will revert on July 1 to the higher rate that prevailed in 1974.

If economic growth appeared to be dropping below 7 percent annually, the JEC added, an additional tax cut should be enacted to hold down unemployment.

In calling for a price-incomes policy, the committee stressed its opposition to comprehensive price or wage controls, and recommended a voluntary program to hold price increases to a minimum in 1976 and to insure that real wage increases are in line with productivity gains, taking into account the expected rate of price increase.

The JEC majority report also contained an analysis of capital investment needs, recommendations for assisting state and local governments and proposals pertaining to housing, energy, agriculture and small business.

N.Y. Teachers Vote to Sever Ties to NEA

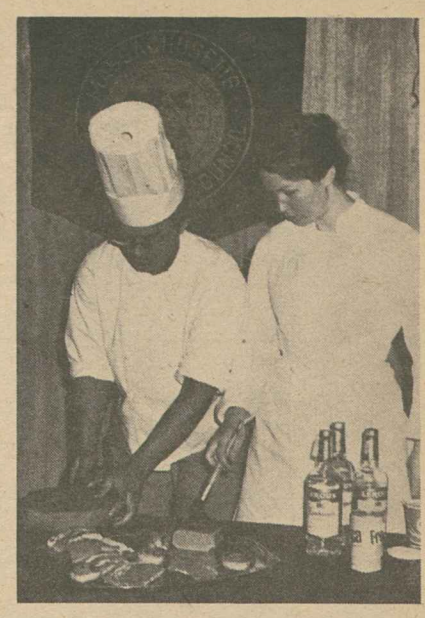
New York — The New York State United Teachers voted to disaffiliate from the National Education Association, ending four years of ties with the organization.

The decision came on Mar. 6 during NYSUT's annual representative assembly here. The vote favoring disaffiliation represented 81 percent of the membership.

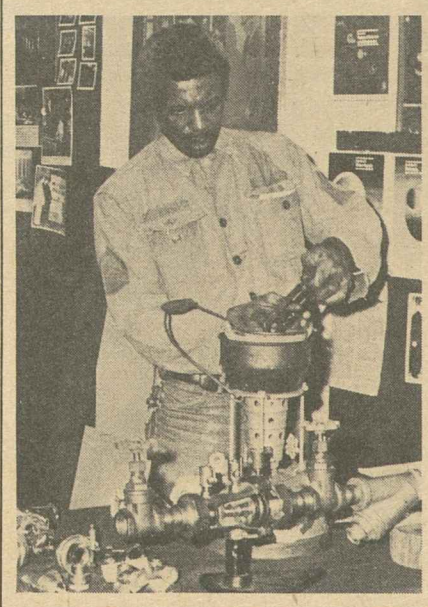
NYSUT was formed nearly four years ago by merger of two organizations, one affiliated with the NEA and the other with the American Federation of Teachers. The New York State Teachers Association, the NEA group, had 100,000 members while United Teachers of New York had about 75,000 members.

Since then, the merged organization has grown to a membership of 210,000. NYSUT was the only remaining state teachers' organization that held affiliation in both the NEA and the AFT.

NYSUT's affiliation with the AFT, and through it to the AFL-CIO, was a root cause of its decision to leave the NEA. The NEA has strongly opposed efforts to bring about a national merger with the AFT that would maintain the ties to the AFL-CIO.



Earlier, Thomas Y. Hobart, Jr., president of NYSUT, accused NEA of committing acts of staff "piracy" by offering substantial pay increases to attract personnel to help set up a rival union in New York State.



Following the disaffiliation action, a group of dissident teachers announced the formation of the New York State Educators Association. John Ryor, president of the NEA, promised financial and organizational aid to the breakaway group.

AFT President Albert Shanker said the new group would be no more than a "spoiler," serving only to hurt the economic status of teachers in New York. "It can never become anything but a minority organization without any real power," he said.

The only teachers organizations that now have dual affiliation with the NEA and the AFT are the United Teachers of Los Angeles and the United Teachers of New Orleans.

WORKING AMERICANS FESTIVAL in Boston became a showcase for the skills and talents of AFL-CIO union members at City Hall. The week-long festival was cosponsored by the Greater Boston AFL-CIO and the city's bicentennial organization, Boston 200. It featured union exhibits, demonstrations and performances.

Labor Press, Label Trades Join In Major 'Buy Union' Promotion

A major campaign to encourage union members to buy union-made goods and services was announced by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and the International Labor Press Association.

The project received an immediate endorsement from AFL-CIO President George Meany, who said: "Over the past several years the labor movement has proved the effectiveness of the boycott weapon to bring justice to workers. We have an equal obligation to postively promote those products and services produced under union conditions and union contracts. That is what this new campaign is all about — to encourage union members to 'buy union.'"

The promotional effort is also designed to inform union members about the unions in the AFL-CIO.

Each month the labor press will receive reproduction-quality, display materials about a union, its members and the products they make or the services they provide. Approximately 550 labor papers with a combined circulation of 20 million will receive the materials.

In addition, special materials are being developed for the hundreds of local union newsletters and machine-duplicated publications.

Meany reviewed the plans and materials for the campaign at a meeting with Sec.-Treas. Earl McDavid of ULSTD and ILPA President Albert K. Herling. He commended the two groups for the program and noted that it is a natural outgrowth of the highly successful Union Industries Show and the campaigns of individual unions.

"I am confident the labor press will make good use of the materials provided by the Union Label Dept. and the ILPA and that this project will achieve its goal," Meany said. "The beneficiaries will be the millions of union members who proudly attach their union label to the products they produce or who proudly display the union shop card where they work or wear a union button as they provide services essential to all of us."

Labor papers are being asked to donate space for the series. Community labor papers will supplement the national material by informing their readers where to buy union goods and services in their community. Local unions and Union Label councils will coordinate these materials with the community labor papers.

"Buying union-made, union-label products is the best investment a worker can make in a sound economy and full employment," McDavid said. "The union label, shop card or button means the workers who make that product or work in that establishment make a decent wage and work in decent working conditions.

"If we can marshal the buying power of union members across America in a positive manner, all workers will reap the economic benefits."

Herling, who is editor of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers News, noted that the labor press has always rallied to the support of boycotts. "We must now accentuate the positive. By making union members more aware of union-made goods and services, we will greatly enhance the effectiveness of boycotts when they are necessary."

Filmdom's Famed 'Oscar' Retains His Union Card

Hollywood, Calif.—The coveted "Oscar"—the screen industry's highest award—will continue to be union-made.

For a time, it appeared that the 60 Academy Award statuettes that will be presented Mar. 29 at the Los Angeles Music Center would be made by a non-union company. The Academy had changed manufacturers, and in this union-conscious film capital it had somehow neglected to make sure the work would be done at a union firm.

The business manager of Jewelry Workers Local 23 in Los Angeles is Oscar Fuss, and he wasn't about to see the statuette Oscars turned out by a non-union firm.

He called on his international president Leon Sverdlove in New York and Earl McDavid, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. in Washington. Help was enlisted from the Screen Actors Guild and the Hollywood Film Council.

In the end, the Academy bowed to the protests and returned the production of its Oscars to the unionized Dodge Co. plant in Carson. To the Jewelry Workers local involved, it was "a great moment for unity in the labor movement."

A. B. Porter Named Disputes Umpire

AFL-CIO President George Meany has announced the appointment of Alexander B. Porter, an arbitrator and attorney with wide experience in the labor-management area, as an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan.

Porter, 49, a graduate of Yale Law School, has served as permanent arbitrator for Republic Steel, Reynolds Metal, Revere Copper & Brass and the Steelworkers. He serves also as chairman of the Foreign Service Grievance Board.

He is a member of the governing board of the National Academy of Arbitrators and of the American Arbitration Association and has served on a number of presidential labor boards, labor arbitration panels and with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Economic Drain Documented:

Multinational Firms Tied to Job Losses

Labor's warning that multinational corporations are hurting the American economy has been borne out by recent studies, the AFL-CIO said.

The initial export of American jobs, technology and capital is just part of the economic drain caused by the foreign operations of U.S. firms, the AFL-CIO told a House International Relations subcommittee. A secondary impact comes when overseas production replaces exports from U.S. plants and when imports from foreign subsidiaries lead to further loss of American jobs.

"U.S.-based multinationals include America's largest financial institutions, manufacturers, shippers, builders, oil producers and service industries. They are defense contractors and government contractors," the AFL-CIO statement noted.

And some of the multinationals, the AFL-CIO charged, through their foreign subsidiaries "join forces with nations that wage economic warfare against the United States."

These were some of the signposts cited by the AFL-CIO:

- Imports from foreign manufacturing facilities of U.S.-based multinationals reached $9.5 billion in 1973 and amounted to more than 20 percent of all manufactured goods imported into the United States.

- Investments of U.S. firms in foreign operations amounted to about 16 percent of domestic investment outlays in the 1967-70 period—and rose to nearly 23 percent in 1974. An even larger proportional increase was reported in manufacturing investments. Many of these foreign subsidiaries replaced the parent U.S. firm as the source of exports to third countries.

The AFL-CIO statement noted an increasing trend towards "co-production" agreements between multinationals and Communist countries. It cited agreements by three major American firms "to transfer U.S. technology and production facilities to Poland, where state-run labor will produce goods for sale in Western European markets."

As for the concept that adjustment assistance can compensate those who lose out when jobs are shifted abroad, the AFL-CIO commented:

"The Trade Act of 1974 has failed to provide adjustment assistance even for those workers displaced by imports. So far, reports show that most workers displaced by imports are not eligible. No adjustment assistance is available for the workers whose jobs are transferred abroad by foreign investors when no imports can be shown to result from that investment. Thus adjustment assistance is not a solution for solving the problems created by multinational investment and expansion abroad."

In one of the ironies of American trade policy, the AFL-CIO noted that the United States has in recent years subsidized the exports of materials in short supply in this country including farm products, logs and scrap steel.

And through direct transfers of new patents and processes, the statement added. "America is now at the last stage of transferring both military and commercial technology abroad at a breakneck pace."

The AFL-CIO statement asked congressional action along the lines proposed by the federation's convention last October:

- An end to all preferential tax treatment for the foreign operations of multinationals.

- Federal monitoring of multinationals to measure their impact on employment, investment and productivity.

- Regulation of exports of advanced productive equipment, capital and technology.

- Restrictions on imports into the United States to help build American jobs and protect the economy.

EARTHQUAKE SURVIVORS begin rebuilding needed community facilities and homes in Santa Maria Cauque, Guatemala, one of the many areas in the country ravaged by the February disaster. Hand tools and other necessities are being provided through a $50,000 contribution approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in cooperation with CARE. The quake left almost 23,000 dead, more than 76,500 injured and 1.5 million persons homeless.

Usery Denies Pressure To Delay Safety Action

secretary for OSHA, to treat businessmen as friends, Ford also said in New Hampshire that he was aware many in business would like "to throw OSHA in the ocean."

Consequently, Meany had written to Usery that "you and Assistant Sec. Corn must make it crystal clear to employers and the White House that enforcement of the OSHA law of the land will be vigorous and fair and that the issuance of standards will not be compromised in an election year — or any year."

Usery replied that "the time required to deal with the complex scientific and technical requirements in developing safety and health standards is the result of many factors but not politics."

Nixon Administration attempts to keep OSHA quiet and inoffensive to business until after the 1972 election were revealed in July 1974.

The Senate report on Watergate brought to light that an internal Labor Dept. memorandum drafted by George C. Guenther, then assistant secretary for OSHA, proposed that "no highly controversial" standards be issued between March 1972 and the November elections.

The 1972 Guenther memo came in reply to a White House demand that every federal agency draw up a "responsiveness plan" on what it could do to aid the Nixon re-election effort.

"An Administration charged with enforcing the law under this system of government must not be able to pick and choose which laws it is going to enforce simply because the head of that Administration is up for election," Meany said in his letter to Usery.

The original newspaper stories Meany cited blamed the delays on the inflationary impact statements demanded by the Ford Administration before such federal actions can be taken.

In a related development, those impact statements have been challenged by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. The union filed suit in federal district court in Washington, D.C., to stop OSHA's consideration of inflationary impact, arguing that the law does not allow such dilution of its safety and health standards.

The suit asks an injunction to end the resulting delays and seeks promulgation within 30 days of OSHA standards for arsenic, noise and 11 toxic substances.

The suit also calls for "prompt completion" of hearings on coke oven emissions and the scheduling of hearings within "reasonable time" for a list of other hazardous substances.

The Labor Dept. memo on which the New York Times story was based cited a September 1975 deadline for new standards on many of those same substances, several of which have known cancer-causing qualities.

The delay from last September was blamed on preparation of economic impact statements.

The timetable for a ruling on levels of allowable noise in the workplace called for a decision in March of this year. The memo proposed it be moved back to 1977.

Public Sector Unions Show Steady Gains

membership. State governments trailed with 39.3 percent organized.

By job function, among all public employes, fire fighters were the most highly organized with 74.4 percent membership, closely followed by teachers with 72.4 percent. Police with 55.1 percent, sanitation workers with 49.7 percent, highway workers with 45.8 percent and welfare workers with 44.9 percent were other highly organized groups.

The Census Bureau relied largely on reports from public agencies as to the estimated numbers of their workers who are organized. The bureau told the AFL-CIO News that there was no information available as to the proportion of workers who are members of unions with national affiliations. But it said that primarily social groups such as recreational associations were not included.

Of the 78,268 governmental units, 11,636 had some sort of labor relations policy—a rise of 8.4 percent over the 1972 total. Of these, 3,814 reported they engaged in collective bargaining, 3,359 said their relations with unions was limited to "meet and confer" leading to a non-binding "memorandum of understanding," and 4,463 units said their policies covered both types of dealings.

The Census Bureau said there were 23,820 written agreements of both types in effect—up 21.9 percent over two years and with virtually all the gain coming in the collective bargaining category. There were 17,161 negotiated agreements and 6,659 "memoranda of understanding."

In government agencies with meaningful union recognition policies, there were 20,860 bargaining units representing 3,695,000 workers or 31.4 percent of all state and local government employes.

The Census Bureau also reported on work stoppages for the 12 months ending Oct. 15, 1974. It listed 471 strikes involving 162,000 public workers with an average duration of 7.3 days.

Teachers and other education workers accounted for more than half the number of public employes involved in strikes.

Congress Urged to 'Countermand' Ford's Economic Retreat Policies

Budget ceilings demanded by President Ford would lead to "even more joblessness and a further decline in the economy," the AFL-CIO charged.

It asked the Senate Budget Committee to "countermand" Ford's call for economic retreat and propose in its place program and funding levels needed to "start America marching forward again."

America's economy "remains weak, vulnerable and badly in need of continued and sustained economic stimulation," the AFL-CIO said. And it needs it now because "the nation can't wait until Jan. 20, 1977, when a new President will be inaugurated."

The AFL-CIO statement expressed concern at a "preoccupation with dollar deficits" by Congress, as well as by the Administration. It reiterated Federation President George Meany's testimony last fall before the same committee asking Congress not to compete with the President in "budget cutting one-upmanship."

As it had in testimony before the House Budget Committee last month, the AFL-CIO outlined a legislative program that included expanded public works and public service jobs programs, housing and health measures, low-interest loans and loan guarantees to stimulate employment, and closing of major tax loopholes.

"America must create some 70,000 new jobs each and every week if we are to approach full employment within the next three years," the AFL-CIO said. "This is the key task of government."

As it has stated in the past, the federation's response to the question of the amount of money needed is simply: "enough."

The statement stressed that whatever amount is needed should be spent to create jobs—"an investment that will put America back to work and ultimately wipe out the deficit completely."

The AFL-CIO statement reiterated labor's position that "true" unemployment is substantially higher than the official government statistics because of the large number of "discouraged" workers no longer counted as unemployed and the millions working part time because full time jobs are not available.

It accused Ford of continuing the discredited economic policies of the past seven years, which have led to recessions, high interest rates and high unemployment.

"These policies have failed miserably," the AFL-CIO said. "The American people deserve better, not another dose of the medicine that made the economy sick."

New Full Employment Bill Backed by Broad Coalition

Goals Achievable, Meany Declares

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO and a broad-based coalition of public interest organizations gave a strong endorsement to a new Full Employment bill that has been introduced by a prestigious group of House and Senate sponsors.

It would commit the federal government to policies designed to achieve full employment within four years, and thereafter to keep the jobless rate from rising above 3 percent.

The bill "makes sense" and is "achievable," AFL-CIO President George Meany said as he expressed the federation's endorsement "without reservation."

Chief sponsors of the bill are Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), whose House Labor subcommittee promptly opened hearings on the measure.

Immediate endorsements came from the Full Employment Action Council, made up of leaders from many fields, and from major Catholic, Protestant and Jewish organizations.

Meany's statement of support was read by House Speaker Carl Albert at a news conference that included, besides Humphrey and Hawkins, other major co-sponsors. Among those taking part were House Banking Committee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

At the House hearings, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Director Nat Goldfinger termed passage of the

Veto Threat Dims Hatch Act Reform

The Senate voted 47-32 to repeal most of the Hatch Act's prohibitions against political activities by federal workers, but a presidential veto threat has diminished the prospects of the labor-sought bill becoming law.

Last fall, the House approved a similar measure by a veto-safe 288-119 margin, and a House-Senate conference will be held to work out differences between the two bills.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and unions representing a majority of the more than 2.5 million federal and postal workers have supported changes in the law that would allow their members to be active participants in the nation's political life, instead of just passive bystanders.

Under the bills that have passed the Senate and House, federal workers would be able to campaign for candidates off the job and solicit

Las Vegas Strike Shuts 'Strip' Hotels

Las Vegas, Nev.—More than a dozen major hotels and casinos on "the Strip" were closed by striking musicians, stagehands, cooks, bartenders and service workers after owners failed to budge from a hard-line position on wage issues and a lockout clause in nearly three months of bargaining.

Six hotel-casinos on Las Vegas Boulevard had reached an interim agreement with the unions and continued in operation. Several other major resorts in downtown Las Vegas are under separate contracts and also remained open.

The walkout began Mar. 11 when 1,000 members of Musicians Local 369 went on strike. They were joined by 300 members of Local 720 of the Theatrical Stage Employes and Locals 226 and 165

Under Ford's Budget:

Congress Unit Sees Job Gap Continuing

The Congressional Budget Office has issued a report showing that President Ford's budget proposals and tax policies for fiscal year 1977 would do little to reduce joblessness or curb inflation over the next 18 months.

If the Administration's plans are adopted, the CBO said, unemployment might be expected to drop to about the 7 percent level by the end of 1977 and remain there indefinitely, or even worsen.

Meanwhile, continuation of Ford's go-slow economic policies might lower the inflation rate by three-tenths of 1 percent after three years, but would have little short-run effect, the agency said.

The analysis was prepared for the House and Senate Budget Committees by the CBO under the new procedures adopted for closer congressional control over the budget. The study examines the possible impact of various alternative budget policies not only for fiscal year 1977 but also through 1981.

"There is general agreement that 1976 is likely to be a year of continuing and fairly substantial recovery," the report said. Assuming a continuation of the government's current spending and taxing policies, the CBO forecast:

- Unemployment ranging from 6.4 to 6.9 percent by fourth-quarter 1977, compared with an official rate of 7.6 percent last month.
- A rate of inflation between 4.7 and 6.2 percent by fourth-quarter 1977, compared with 6.5 percent in 1975.
- A rise in real gross national product of 5 to 6.5 percent from fourth-quarter 1976 to fourth-quarter 1977, compared to a 2.5 percent rise last year.

However, adoption of Ford's "more restrictive" budget policies for the fiscal year beginning this October would produce a reduction in the projected real GNP, along with a drop in the number of employed workers.

Thus, the CBO said, "unemployment by the fourth quarter of 1977 might be as much as six-tenths of 1 percent points higher than under current policy.

"Under pessimistic assumptions about private demand, this might

Steelworkers, Industry Welcome Quota Action

The Steelworkers and industry officials welcomed President Ford's decision to set quotas on specialty steel imports in 90 days should foreign producers fail voluntarily to reduce excessive shipments to U.S. markets.

"The President has recognized the serious injury of uncontrolled government-subsidized specialty steel imports to a vital American industry and to the jobs of 65,000 American steelworkers," the USWA and a U.S. specialty steel producers group said in a joint statement.

Ford's decision modifies the recommendations of the International Trade Commission, which had urged him to impose immediate quotas on stainless and alloy tool steels for five years.

Ford had the option to affirm, reject or modify the commission's recommendations to limit the specialty steel imports to 146,000 tons annually. The imports amounted to 153,000 tons

Fund Increase Sought For Job Safety, Health

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to provide more funds for enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Both programs are being thwarted by lack of trained inspectors and growing backlogs, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee.

He charged that the President's budget proposals for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in the Labor Dept. would result in fewer enforcement positions in the coming fiscal year, when more are needed.

Biemiller and George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, urged a $19.4 million budget rise and 640 new positions in OSHA.

They told the panel that the AFL-CIO's budget proposal was based "to a considerable degree" on the agency's own budget request "which was eviscerated by the Secretary of Labor's office on its way to the Office of Management & Budget."

Of the new positions, the AFL-CIO urged that 100 safety inspectors and 265 industrial hygienists be added.

of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees, which represent nearly 11,000 culinary workers and bartenders at the resorts.

The unions reported that no meaningful discussions with the Nevada Resort Association, which represents the 15 struck hotel-casinos, have occurred since the walkout.

The unions are seeking wage increases averaging about 30 percent over three years—or about $1.35 an hour for most of the resort workers—in addition to improvements in health and pension benefits. The key bargaining goal of the IATSE local is for the reduction of the regular workweek from six to five days.

A major barrier in the negotiations is the insistence of the resort association on a clause giving owners the power to lock out union members at all hotels in the event of a strike against one of them. That authority would come in an amendment to an existing no-lockout clause.

Al Bramlet, president of the Nevada AFL-CIO and secretary-treasurer of the culinary workers local, termed the owners' demand for the new lockout clause "irresponsible."

The unions have been in negotiations with the resort owners since last December. The old contracts expired in late February and early March.

Bramlet said that existing contracts with the downtown hotel-casinos would begin expiring Apr. 1, but that negotiations are being delayed by the owners' stalling tactics. He said the possibility of a settlement coming before the contracts expire is unlikely.

last year and 163,000 tons in 1974.

The USWA estimates that for each 100 tons of imported specialty steel into the United States, one American steelworker's job is lost. Unemployment in the specialty steel industry averaged 30 percent during the past year and ran as high as 45 percent.

In announcing the trade decision, the White House said "orderly marketing agreements" to cover a three-year period would be sought in negotiations. Frederick B. Dent, special U.S. trade representative, said that if the negotiations are unsuccessful, the President would impose quotas by June 14.

Most of the specialty steel imports come from Japan, Sweden, Canada, France, Britain and West Germany.

In the last 15 years, imports rose from 2.6 percent to 18.5 percent of the U.S. specialty steel market, resulting in about 10,000 permanent layoffs and 20,000 temporary layoffs.

The USWA and industry officials had warned that continued increases in imports could wipe out the jobs of 65,000 American steelworkers.

The union and the association of 17 specialty steel producers said in their statement that they are "gratified" by White House efforts to negotiate voluntary reductions, a position that union and industry leaders had proposed in a joint petition filed with the ITC in July 1975.

ADVERSE IMPACT of high unemployment on job training and placement programs of the National Urban League is explored by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Vernon E. Jordan, center, executive director of the organization, and Federation Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard. The discussion was held during a meeting of the league's trade union advisory committee at AFL-CIO headquarters.

Ford, Carter Gaining In Delegate Strength

Chicago—President Gerald Ford and former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter reaped a harvest of delegates in the Illinois presidential primary, marking the second straight key victory for each.

Each had won decisively the previous week in Florida.

Ford topped former California Gov. Ronald Reagan for the fifth straight time, piling up an almost 5-1 edge in the quest for Illinois' 101 convention delegates.

Carter won or was leading for 55 of Illinois' 169 Democratic delegates, but his slates were entered in races for only 85 of them, giving him a remarkable success in the congressional districts he contested.

Democratic Sen. Adlai Stevenson III, a home state candidate backed by Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, won or was leading for 87 delegates. Stevenson-Daley slates were entered in districts for all 155 of the seats at stake in the primary. Fourteen at-large delegates are to be selected later.

In the separate balloting on presidential preference, Ford won 59 percent of the vote to 40 percent for Reagan. Ford has now bested Reagan in primaries in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Florida and Illinois, although Reagan did not campaign in Massachusetts or Vermont. Reagan was leading for only 14 of the 96 delegates elected, with five more to be chosen at-large.

Carter led the Democratic side with 48 percent to 28 percent for Gov. George Wallace of Alabama, the same opponent he beat the previous week in Florida.

Carter's victory was the fourth time in five primaries he has come away with the most delegates and he now enjoys a 2-1 edge over his nearest competitor. Wallace got only three delegates out of Illinois and now has 61 nationwide to 130 for Carter, with more to come for Carter from the caucus states of Iowa, Oklahoma and Maine, where he led in the preliminary selection.

From Illinois, both parties switched focus to North Carolina where almost the same lineups will compete one week later. Carter and Wallace are the only Democrats to campaign in North Carolina. Reagan will face Ford again there, but he has said his campaign will emphasize the "western primaries," which presumably means Texas on May 1 and Nevada, Oregon and Idaho, all on May 25.

For the Democrats, the surviving field will be assembled again on Apr. 6, with Carter, Wallace, Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona and Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington competing in either the New York or Wisconsin primaries that day.

As the result of the Florida and Illinois primaries, Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp and 1972 Democratic vice presidential nominee Sargent Shriver became the latest two Democrats either to drop out of the presidential race completely or suspend active campaigning.

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, former Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina and Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana abandoned their campaigns previously.

In Illinois, Shriver and former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris were the only other Democrats competing and neither won any delegates. Shriver got 16 percent of the presidential preference vote and Harris, who will compete again in the Apr. 27 Pennsylvania primary, got 8 percent.

COPE-Backed Nominees Win In Illinois

Chicago—Labor-endorsed Ralph H. Metcalfe was nominated for a fourth House term in the Illinois Democratic primary, turning an expected close race into a runaway.

Metcalfe, 65, got just over 70 percent of the vote to defeat Erwin France, who had the endorsement of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley. Metcalfe has a record in Congress of 53 right and 4 wrong votes by labor's standards.

The COPE-endorsed candidate also won the Democratic nomination for governor of Illinois when Secretary of State Michael Howlett ousted Gov. Daniel Walker, the first Illinois governor in more than 40 years to be denied renomination by his party. Howlett won with 54 percent of the vote.

Statewide, COPE endorsed candidates in 19 of the 24 Illinois congressional districts and 18 of them won. In addition to Metcalfe and 15 other incumbents, COPE-endorsed Marilyn (Dee) Clancy and Marie Fese won nominations to face incumbent Republicans in November.

Bring Case to Public:

Postal Unions Attack Slashes in Service

The nation's postal unions are mounting a campaign to set the public straight on who is responsible for the ills of the U.S. Postal Service.

"The public blames employes," President Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers Union noted at a press conference. "We reject that idea 100 percent."

Filbey charged that mismanagement by the Postal Service has resulted in poor service, including the widespread reduction in business mail deliveries scheduled to begin Mar. 29.

During the press conference, Filbey announced that APWU's national executive board has voted to use the union's entire strike fund of $300,000, plus $150,000 in strike funds due for the next five months, to finance a nationwide public-education campaign. The goal is to explain management's responsibility for poor postal service and to build support for an increase in the Postal Service's subsidy by Congress.

The union charged that Postmaster Gen. Benjamin Bailar is trying to reduce deficits by planned cuts in service instead of simply going to Congress for more money. Filbey said such cuts violate the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970.

The Postal Service announced on Mar. 10 that business deliveries in nine cities in the East will be cut from two to one a day starting on Mar. 29. Business mail in New York City was cut from three to two deliveries a day as of Mar. 17.

APWU's executive board noted in a resolution that Bailar also is threatening to reduce deliveries everywhere to three days a week instead of the current six. Filbey also charged that management's "constant" changes in work schedules to save money and proposals to shut small post offices are hurting worker morale.

Meanwhile, Letter Carriers President James H. Rademacher announced plans for a publicity campaign by his union. The NALC is preparing information kits on the deterioration in postal service which letter carriers in some 6,000 cities will distribute to the public.

"Our members are going to invite the business community, civic leaders, and every other segment of the American scene to discuss the present Postal Service and its future in dispassionate and objective terms, and not through threats of alternatives in the form of higher rates and reduced services," Rademacher said.

In another development, Mailhandlers division of the Laborers took Rep. Charles Wilson (D-Calif.), chairman of a House Postal subcommittee, on a surprise tour of Detroit's main post office to show him how costly new sorting machinery has damaged thousands of parcels, making many of them undeliverable.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Amending Hatch Act

The Senate on Mar. 11 voted 47-32 approval of a bill supported by the AFL-CIO to amend the Hatch Act and eliminate most of the restrictions on political activities by federal government employes. It would continue to protect government workers against political pressure.

Meany Calls Goals Achievable:

New Full Employment Bill Backed by Broad Coalition

bill a "top priority" for the labor movement.

The two top leaders of the Full Employment Action Council, Coretta Scott King and Murray Finley, promised an all-out campaign for the legislation by "a remarkable coalition" drawn from labor, business, religion, education and civil rights groups. Mrs. King is president of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Center for Social Change and Finley is president of the Clothing Workers.

Bishop Eugene Mario, testifying for the U.S. Catholic Conference, termed the Ford Administration projection of continued high unemployment "unacceptable" and its human costs "intolerable." He cited a statement by Catholic bishops asserting a "universal right to useful employment at just wages."

Representing the governing board of the National Council of Churches, Arthur B. Keys, Jr., said the federal government has a "duty and obligation" to assure a job for every person willing and able to work. He termed full employment a prerequisite for social progress in other areas.

Rabbi A. James Ruden expressed support for the concepts of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill in his testimony on behalf of the American Jewish Committee.

At the news conference on introduction of the revised bill, Albert promised to use whatever political clout the Speaker of the House can muster to push the bill along, and Hawkins held out the hope of congressional action this spring.

Humphrey acknowledged that the legislation will almost certainly face a veto threat from Ford—who has already vetoed some of its ingredients in separate job-creating bills. He predicted that the Full Employment bill will emerge in the presidential and congressional election this fall as "a piece of legislation around which candidates will base their campaigns."

The legislation is close to the criteria set by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month on the recommendation of the federation's Economic Policy Committee. The committee had been asked by the AFL-CIO's 1975 convention to draw up legislative guidelines that would translate "into action" the generalized promise of the Employment Act of 1946, the first government venture into setting national economic goals.

Biemiller testified at the House hearings that the legislation meets the long search for "a reasonable, practical and workable mechanism to turn the promise of full employment into jobs."

The weakness of the 1946 Employment Act, Biemiller said, was the lack of machinery to convert "good intentions" into reality. Thus, during most of the subsequent years, the nation's economy has operated substantially below full employment, production and purchasing power.

Biemiller and Goldfinger stressed the key role of jobs as the source of mass purchasing power and as the measure of whether a person "is a full-fledged participant in society or on the outside looking in."

The goal of bringing unemployment down to 3 percent within four years is "tangible and feasible," Biemiller said.

While the bill alone will not create jobs, he said, it would set up procedures compelling the President, Congress and the Federal Reserve Board to draw up and carry out policies to achieve full employment and balanced economic growth.

For the first time, Biemiller noted, the Federal Reserve system would be required to shed its "veil of secrecy" and "publicly account for its policies."

As for the costs that may be needed from time to time to achieve and keep full employment, Biemiller and Goldfinger stressed that full employment "is the only rational way to balance the dollar budget." There is a much more devasting cost, the AFL-CIO statement warned, in "continued idle plants, idle machinery, idle productive equipment and idle manpower."

The federation's testimony cited the "massive" unmet needs for better education, health, housing, transportation, recreation and culture.

"There is plenty of work to be done in America, and there are plenty of workers ready, willing and able to do that work," the AFL-CIO said. "The only thing missing is the jobs."

U.S., Mexican Entertainers Approve Pact

New York—The Television & Radio Artists and the National Association of Interpreters, a Mexican union of performing artists, have entered into an agreement of mutual protection of their economic rights, AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff announced.

Under the two-year pact, Wolff said, each organization will act on the other's behalf to ensure the rights of its members whenever their work is broadcast or shown in the other country.

The two unions agreed to prohibit the production of films, radio and TV programs, phonograph records, video tapes or cassettes without suitable payments and safeguards to the members of the union in whose jurisdiction the work was originally performed.

They also agreed to collect payments due artists for rebroadcast of their services in the other country and to take any legal action necessary to carry out the accord.

Highlights of Full Employment Bill

The proposed Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act seeks to assure that every American able to work will have the opportunity for a useful job at fair wages.

It establishes a national goal of bringing the unemployment rate down to 3 percent or less within four years—and keeping it there. It sets up procedures for the President, the Federal Reserve Board and Congress to pull in the same direction of full employment, production and purchasing power.

As a starter, the bill directs the President's Council of Economic Advisers to shape both long-term and short-term plans for a full employment economy. The council would be assisted by an advisory committee representing the major groups in the economy.

It requires the Federal Reserve Board, which now has almost unchecked power over the money supply and interest rates, to report to the President and Congress on the policies it plans to follow in order to further the full employment goals—or to justify its refusal to do so.

The bill accepts the fact that government monetary and fiscal policies may not always be sufficient to achieve the full employment goal. Therefore, it directs the President to submit to Congress within 90 days a "countercyclical" program to keep down unemployment when the private sector falters. This would be permanent legislation, triggered by rising unemployment and phased out as the economy improves.

The President is directed to consider in shaping his legislative proposals such ingredients as public service jobs and accelerated public works. The final form of the legislation would, of course, be determined by Congress.

A separate section of the bill requires the President to submit "a permanent, countercyclical grant program that will serve to stabilize state and local budgets during periods of recession and high unemployment."

Other provisions require development of special programs to utilize the nation's economic and human resources in "chronically depressed areas" and establishment of a comprehensive youth employment program. This would be designed to ease the transition from school to work and to provide job training for youth with employment handicaps.

The bill seeks to hold down federal costs in non-priority areas by providing an annual review of 20 percent of the government's continuing programs to determine if they still serve a need.

It also directs the Council of Economic Advisers to keep an early-warning watch for inflationary signs and to recommend actions to promote price stability if inflation threatens.

Congress Urged to Ban Airlines' Strike Compact

The airline industry's mutual aid pact providing support payments to struck carriers has produced some of the worst labor relations in the United States, and ought to be abolished, Air Line Pilots President John J. O'Donnell charged.

"The mutual aid pact causes excessive harm—to airline employes and airlines as well," O'Donnell told a House aviation subcommittee holding hearings on proposals to outlaw the pact.

"It is incompatible with the public interest in general and the transportation needs of the citizens of this nation in particular," he said. He charged that the pact also has "recklessly" increased the length of strikes.

Since 1958, when the pact originated, MAP has grown from a modest agreement involving six airlines to its current membership of 15 of the 20 major U.S. air carriers. The pact provides for payments by participating members of up to 50 percent of a struck carrier's normal daily operating expenses.

O'Donnell said that MAP has destroyed the spirit of the collective-bargaining process. "Normally a strike is the last resort in labor-management negotiations," he said, "but large mutual-aid payments to a carrier have made a strike an economically acceptable alternative for management."

O'Donnell was accompanied by Pat Robertson, president of the Flight Attendants, and Victor J. Herbert, president of the Air Line Employees Association. Both organizations are ALPA affiliates.

Airline strikes, on the average, last much longer than those in other industries, O'Donnell pointed out. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the average duration of strikes for all industry has remained fairly constant for about the last 20 years at 25 days.

The average airline strike, however, continues to increase in length. In 1970, the average airline strike duration was 49 days. In 1971, it was 58.5 days. In 1972, it dropped to 37.7 days but shot back up to 68.1 days in 1973. In 1974, it was 92.5 days.

O'Donnell also noted that the mutual aid pact is really not serving the financial well-being of the industry it was designed to help.

Traditionally profitable Northwest and National—leaders in frequency and length of strikes—have collected $220 million, or 55 percent of total MAP payments since 1969, while three of the top four contributors to the plan have experienced serious financial distress.

Eastern, Pan American and Trans World Airlines all have suffered severe losses in recent years, and currently have petitions for subsidies pending before the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Rep. Glenn Anderson (D-Calif.), the subcommittee's chairman, has introduced a bill to abolish the pact. In all, 31 bills in the House, with 80 cosponsors, and one bill in the Senate, with 11 cosponsors, have been introduced during the 94th Congress to do away with MAP.

Bargaining and Freedom

THOSE WHO READ only headlines probably believe labor and management are constantly at each other's throat and can't agree on anything. That, of course, is the nature of news—conflict is newsier than peace.

So a strike—which occurs in less than 2 percent of all negotiations—is news; the 98 percent settled without a strike are not.

That is my point: Labor and management do agree that responsible and free collective bargaining is the way to settle disputes.

Of course, collective bargaining is not perfect. Labor and management are constantly striving to improve it. For example, in the steel industry, labor and management have agreed on an alternative to the strike—binding arbitration.

It has been successful, but only because both sides agreed. Nobody forced either the union or the companies to agree.

Some editorialists contend the answer to strikes or lockouts is to have the government compel all unions and all companies to settle their disputes through arbitration. But compulsion would be the death knell for collective bargaining, a free trade-union movement and the free enterprise system. It would undermine a basic American freedom.

Only a dictatorship can compel workers to work against their will or force management to sign a contract it does not want. No free American wants any form of totalitarianism.

While strikes sometimes cause public inconvenience, they are an inherent part of the liberties we all enjoy—free speech, freedom of association, the right of contract. The exercise of liberties in a democratic society is not only healthy, it is vital.

As President Dwight D. Eisenhower put it:

"The right of men to leave their jobs is a test of freedom. Hitler suppressed strikes. Stalin suppressed strikes. . . . Each also suppressed freedom. There are some things worse, much worse, than strikes. One of them is the loss of freedom."

So labor and management support free collective bargaining, which has brought to American workers the highest standard of living in the world, strengthened the economy by increasing consumer buying power, and provided a common sense mechanism for resolving problems.

Collective bargaining is not perfect, but it works. And responsible labor and responsible management must and do work to make it better.

A Word Edgewise:

Corporate 'Gifts' to Politicians Raise Questions About Auditors

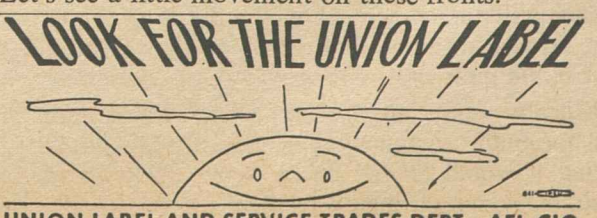
By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE MOST interesting questions that recent revelations about massive corporate contributions to politicians domestic and foreign has raised is, "who audits the auditors?" Just the other day there was a story that the Gulf Oil Corp. has rather plaintively asked the pols who were on its freebee list to return the money so it could be distributed to the stockholders. This was not without a certain mordant charm: I'm not holding my breath waiting for the sinners to come across. But how in the world did Gulf, Lockheed and the other outfits in the dock hide these millions from their auditors and the Internal Revenue Service?

This is more than an abstract inquiry. I have been working for three days, preparing my income-tax data. At the risk of sounding pious, I believe in the maxim that taxes are the price we pay for civilization, and it infuriates me that big corporations can seemingly tuck immense amounts away in secret drawers.

We have in this country a tax system that is largely, and I think remarkably honestly self-enforced. The IRS can only audit a trivial segment of the returns; most Americans are aware of this but (unlike the tax comedy in France or Italy) still play it straight. True, nobody holds a party on Apr. 15 in honor of the Treasury, but that is hardly required: We gripe, file and pay.

This self-enforced taxation is an extremely important symbol of our civic religion. If suddenly in the next month every taxpayer decided to cheat their government, the IRS—even if a million inspectors were added—would be helpless. (In France, the story goes, the last efficient system of taxation was used by Louis XIV's intendants: a portable rack!) Fortunately this won't happen, but when the average citizen reads about those incredible end runs made by the corporations, his willingness to abide by the rules can not help but be eroded.



To return to the auditors, I confess to being an economic innocent. Every year I get various financial statements from organizations holding my retirement annuities. They are invariably detailed, but I don't go through the assets and liabilities carefully—I'm simply not equipped to handle arcane economic matters. So I settle for the bottom line and mutter, "Not bad," or, last year, "Did we take a bath!" At the end of these forms there is a solemn statement by the auditors, virtually signed in blood, that everything is fine. From this I take confidence that the worthy citizens managing my money have not bought a dacha in St. Croix where they retire for the winter, or loaned themselves money to play the commodity futures.

I am not sure I will ever again read an auditor's report without quivering. As a depression kid, I have a kind of economic catastrophe complex (Is our bank on that secret list? How much does the FDIC cover?), but up to now I have had a simple faith in the cleverness and devotion to my interest of auditors.

NOW THE OPTIONS we face in evaluating the auditors of various large corporations are the managers had them bagged up, or they were incompetent. I refuse to believe that, say, $12 million could be hidden under "office expenses," "travel" or "general overhead." Maybe you could sneak a couple of hundred grand into "advertising" or "public relations." But $12 million? I haven't had a course in mathematics since the 11th grade in high school (and got a well-deserved D), but even I could spot $12 million lurking in odd corners.

This is not intended to be jocular; actually it is mind-boggling, and I want something done. There is a federal gift tax, for example, which should be collected from these donors. Stockholders should not be put off by the fact that certain managers have been made to walk the plank. Are we to believe that only one or two of the top executives knew about these illegal disbursements? Maybe, but a more likely hypothesis is that a couple of scapegoats were tossed off the back of the sleigh to satisfy the wolves.

And what about those auditors? If they were in the bag, they should go to jail. If they were incompetent, they should be put out of business. Let's see a little movement on these fronts.

No Single Cause:

Test Scores Decline Triggers New Look at School Policies

The following is excerpted from a column by Albert Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers, in the New York Times on Mar. 14, 1976. The column appears weekly sponsored by United Federation of Teachers, Local 2.

FOR A NUMBER OF YEARS there has been a decline in the college entrance scores. This drop has occurred on all of the tests widely used—the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT), the American College Testing Program (ACT) and such widely used tests as the Minnesota SAT and the Iowa Tests of Educational Development.

Accompanying the decline in scores has been a debate on whether the downward trend is due to some defect in the tests themselves or to a real diminution in student knowledge and skills. Some argue that today's students know as much as their predecessors and that something must be wrong with the tests. Others maintain that the tests indeed show lowered achievement and suggest reasons for it that run the gamut from the breakup of the traditional family to the role of television, teacher militancy, "open" education and the failure to emphasize the "basics."

Two recent studies provide some answers to the questions raised. One study, "Achievement Test Score Decline: Do We Need to Worry?" was sponsored by CEMREL, a national educational laboratory. The study, by Annegret Harnischfeger and David E. Wiley, is available free. The second study was conducted by the American College Testing Program.

Both concluded that the decline was real and not due to a change in the tests or some testing error. Each year's decline is not too significant, but the decline over the last decade is large, among both public and private school students. There is no doubt that students are entering college today with a much weaker background than freshmen had 10 years ago.

The studies do not find a sole "cause" for the drop. However, the CEMREL study does point to one major factor: the courses which high school students are now taking. The lowered test scores are due, in large measure, to the fact that fewer high school students are taking "traditional basic courses of the college-preparatory curricula." Some examples: There has been a drop in foreign language enrollment of more than 7 percent. The enrollment in general mathematics has gone down 15 percent, physics 30 percent. "These course enrollment declines parallel closely the test score decline patterns," the researchers point out: high school English enrollment has dropped more than 10 percent and English test scores by 11 percent.

The study authors do not know what has replaced the traditional high school courses. They found no evidence that any particular "elective or specialty courses" have replaced English, mathematics and foreign languages. Nor have practical courses in vocational education, home economics or business subjects pushed out the traditional academic curriculum. These courses have also dropped in enrollment by as much as 30 percent.

While change in curriculum is given as a major reason for the decline in achievement, other reasons are cited.

- There is a much lower dropout rate. Many students who in the past would have left school are now taking college entrance exams.
- There is increased student absenteeism throughout the country. No matter what the curriculum, students who are not present will not benefit from it.
- A large decline in female scores is seen as a plus. Until recently only better prepared women ventured to go on to higher education. With the recent emphasis on sex equality, many more women have been taking the tests and entering college.

Many other possible reasons for the decline in scores are suggested: the increase in the number of working mothers from 26 percent in 1948 to 51 percent in 1974; the rise in the number of single parent families from 10 percent to 17 percent between 1948 and 1974, the tripling of the number of out-of-wedlock births in those same years.

CERTAINLY, THE QUESTION is far from settled. The decline is real. There is cause for concern. Many of the reasons are not known. Many are beyond the schools' control. But curriculum is within their control. Should the schools place greater emphasis on English, mathematics and languages? CEMREL study authors Harnischfeger and Wiley ask: "Are academic courses with stress on future long-term intellectual and economic benefits, especially in a time of lowered educational payoffs, losing out to courses allowing more short-term satisfactions and immediate gratification?"

Another possible reason for the enrollment drop in traditional courses and lowered test scores—although neither study discusses it—has to do with decisions made by school systems themselves. New York City high schools, for example, used to award a variety of different diplomas to graduating students, depending on which program they had taken. In those years, colleges—and prospective employers—could tell which students had taken tougher programs, which had elected an easier course of study. Some years ago, however, the New York City Board of Education decided that it did not want to so "label" its high school graduates and began to award the same diploma to all students.

It is entirely possible that some students who might otherwise have chosen a more difficult program—and succeeded in it— decided to pursue an easier course, knowing that their diplomas would be no different from everyone else's. The decline in test scores, the current research and the research sure to follow may well succeed in reversing this and other policy decisions.

GOP Opposes Mail Plan:

Voter Registration Bill Gains Despite Ford's Veto Threat

CHANCES ARE GOOD that Congress will soon approve voter registration by mail, but prospects of a veto mean the artificial barriers blocking millions of citizens from the voting booth might not be lifted in this bicentennial year.

That view was expressed by Richard Murphy, legislative and COPE director for the Service Employees, as he stressed that the Republican party is making a determined fight to kill the measure aimed at adding some 20 million voters to the rolls for the 1976 elections. He scored the tactic of making a party-line issue of an up-to-date and fair registration system that would make it possible for millions of poor people and minority citizens, as well as many lower-paid workers, to take part in the political processes.

Murphy said on Labor News Conference that the main arguments against mail registration —that it would be too costly, open the door to fraud and create a huge workload for state registrars—just don't stand up.

He pointed out that registration-by-mail systems now operate in more than a dozen states and cover 41 percent of the total U.S. population. He said that a Ford Foundation study of Minnesota and Maryland—two states that have such a system—showed that the average per-registration cost was $1.54 under the old face-to-face registration, but dropped in 1974 to $1.09 when mail registration began operating.

Murphy said the real basis of stiff Republican opposition to voter registration by mail is that a large portion of the new voters would be Democrats. He said that while that may or may not be the case, "it is the poor and low-income Democrats who have been excluded from the political process, and exclusion is unfair."

He said that if President Ford were to veto this bill, he would be "saying to millions of Americans, 'I don't want you in the political system—I don't want you to vote.' "

WORKING PEOPLE and their families have been getting maimed, killed and diseased in the workplace and their communities ever since the industrialization of the nation.

It took a 10-year legislative struggle to win passage of the law creating the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in 1970. But ever the opportunists, Nixon Administration officials in 1972 saw the fund-raising potential in a lax enforcement of job health and saftey standards.

The Watergate Committee flushed a confidential memo written by Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther in response to a request on how OSHA could help re-elect Nixon.

Guenther wrote that, while he had discussed with a White House fundraiser "the great potential of OSHA as a sales point for fund-raising and general support by employers, I do not believe the potential of this appeal is fully recognized. Your suggestions as to how to promote the advantages of four more years of properly managed OSHA for use in the campaign would be appreciated."

Enter the Ford Administration, which the President promised would try to restore the confidence of people in their government.

In January 1976, the New York Times published a printed draft of part of the Economic Report soon to go to Congress. It charged that OSHA seemed to have had "an insubstantial effect on accident rates" among workers while requiring employers to spend $2 billion to $4 billion to make plant conditions safer.

Inside experts pointed out it was quite premature or even wrong to make such a judgment. The first systematic effort by government to gather data on accidents and disease might be expected to swell the toll of the already estimated 14,000 deaths and more than 2 million disabling injuries each year. It was also noted that the Administration made no reference to the human benefit and social savings that result from safer workplaces.

THE SHOCKER however, was a statement in the draft report that said: "The most important cause of accidents appeared to be behavioral problems of workers and momentary physical hazards not susceptible to correction by inspection."

The outraged reaction from organized labor and others caused the Council of Economic Advisers to delete the attacks not only on OSHA but also on the Environmental Protection Agency. The lame excuse was that the analysis "was not of publishable quality."

But President Ford continued his attacks on the federal regulatory role. He told a business audience during the New Hampshire primary campaign that he knew they would "like to throw OSHA into the ocean." He referred to protective standards as "unnecessary and unjustified harassment of citizens."

The latest evidence that the Administration is persisting was a New York Times report that an OSHA memo dated Feb. 23 disclosed that new standards on cancer-causing materials and excessive noise levels might be postponed until after the November election. The given reason for the delay is an inflationary-impact statement required by a Ford executive order.

AFL-CIO President George Meany demanded a public explanation from Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., expressing shock and concern that this Administration, too, might be trading off workers' health and safety for campaign contributions. Usery denied any political interference in OSHA's work, pledging prompt issuance of standards and vigorous administration of the law.

It will take vigilance by men and women in the workplace and by their unions to demand safer and more healthful conditions.

CONGRESSIONAL APPROVAL of voter registration by mail appears likely, but millions of new voters still may be barred from this year's elections because of President Ford's threatened veto, Service Employees Legislative Rep. Richard Murphy, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by John Grimes, left, freelance labor writer, and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The weekly AFL-CIO-produced public service program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

AFL-CIO UNIONS affiliated with the various world trade secretariats sent representatives to a conference at federation headquarters for a briefing on several international issues involving labor. Above, Ernest S. Lee, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, reviews the current world situation as it affects labor. The briefing included a discussion of the International Labor Organization. The United States notified the ILO last fall that it intends to withdraw unless the Geneva-based organization returns to its original principles.

Housing Parley Focuses on Need For Adequate Federal Funding

New Orleans — Representatives of state and local bodies, international and local unions emphasized the need for more federal funding of housing programs at an AFL-CIO housing conference here.

Delegates at the two-day meeting were especially concerned with the Section 202 housing program for the elderly. The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development has received applications for the funding of more than 1,500 projects under the program with a total of more than 230,000 units.

The conference endorsed AFL-CIO efforts to obtain a supplementary appropriation and greatly increased authorization for this program from Congress.

Carl Coan, staff director of the Senate subcommittee on housing and urban affairs, predicted that in the next few months Congress will be amending housing legislation to remove Administration roadblocks that have made HUD programs ineffective.

One such roadblock, Coan said, occurred with regard to the interest rate that HUD will charge on Section 202 housing for the elderly loans. Congress did not expect HUD to charge the maximum of about 9 percent, and corrective legislation will be introduced, he said.

One panel discussion was devoted to HUD's recently reactivated and revised Section 235 homeownership assistance program. A number of participants pointed out that it is not possible to build homes in their areas within the $30,000 price limit set by the present law.

On the new agreement between seven AFL-CIO national building trades unions and the National Housing Rehabilitation Association, President Joseph T. Power of the Plasterers & Cement Masons said that limited costs, reasonable profits and decent wages and working conditions are likely to result from the labor-management accord.

Power said the aim of the contract is to provide more construction jobs while assuring a decent housing standard in the nation's inner cities.

The agreement, signed last month, stipulates that because of the economics involved in residential rehabilitation, jurisdictional rules and work practices which otherwise would apply to commercial construction will be eliminated and that efforts will be made to develop an appropriate schedule of wage rates.

The new agreement was discussed by a panel that included Ray Dolan, assistant administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division; Richard Allan, a labor relations officer with the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, and Robert Gerber of HUD's Region 5 office.

Henry Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, said that inflation is causing rent hikes at a time when over 15 percent of the nation's building trades workers are unemployed. He pointed to the great deficiency in housing in relation to needs over the past four years.

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers cited the failure of the Nixon and Ford administrations to recognize the goal of 26 million new housing units in 10 years, which was set by Congress in 1968.

Labor costs as a proportion of the total cost of a new home have declined greatly over the past two decades while land and financing costs have risen, Victor Kamber, research director for the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., told conference delegates.

Kamber noted that the pay of construction workers often is misjudged since in most cases they work only 1,200 to 1,500 hours a year due to seasonal factors and frequent cyclical declines in construction activity.

A HUD research effort to evaluate savings in home construction through the use of solar power was described by the project manager, David Moore of Washington.

The study's purpose is to determine the feasibility for consumers of converting solar energy into home heating and air-conditioning power.

Thomas Armstrong, HUD's New Orleans area director, reviewed the community development program.

HUD's Allan told the conference that each American city is being asked by the department to designate a labor representative to administer and monitor possible violations of labor standards under the community development block grant program.

In the event of violations, he said, HUD or the labor representative can take steps to see that funds for the program are withheld.

Texas Delegates Shape Key Election Objectives

Galveston, Tex.—The number one political action goal of the Texas AFL-CIO in 1976 is the election of a new President in hopes of reversing the economic setbacks and political corruption the nation experienced in the eight years of the Nixon-Ford administration.

The public has lost confidence in the federal government because of excessive unemployment, inflation and corruption, State Federation President Harry Hubbard told delegates to the Texas AFL-CIO convention.

"How can we have confidence in a government led by men who say that having 7 million Americans unemployed is acceptable?" Hubbard asked.

He also questioned the failure of the Republican leadership to control inflation while its spokesmen approve the practice of bribing foreign government leaders as "an acceptable way of doing business."

Hubbard said that union members should be fully aware "of what the Republican Administration has done to weaken their unions, undermine their bargaining power and reduce their standard of living."

The COPE report adopted at the two-day convention expressed confidence that the problems of unemployment and the loss of real income "would be solved very quickly with new, Democratic leadership in the White House."

The 750 delegates endorsed the re-election of Sen. Lloyd Bentsen over Phillip Gramm in the May 1 Democratic primary and accepted the recommendations of central labor councils in congressional district races and for the state legislature. Endorsements were also made in primary races for the state railroad commission, supreme court and criminal appeals court.

Endorsements for the Nov. 2 election will be made later by either the Texas COPE or at a special COPE convention called by the state federation leaders.

In key resolutions, delegates called for extension of federal regulation of intrastate natural gas sales, establishing criminal penalties for employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, support of Hatch Act reform, opposition to a new attempt by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welware to close the Galveston Public Health Service hospital, and amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act to ease union restrictions in "right-to-work" states.

In Convention Action:

Woodworkers Press Southern Pay Drive

Montreal, Que.—Delegates to the 29th Woodworkers convention voted to put the full resources of the IWA into a campaign to raise the substandard wages and benefits of forest product workers throughout the South.

A widening differential in wages has dropped the rate for many workers in the South to about half of what the industry pays in the Northwest and in Canadian provinces.

By comparison, the convention was told, the scale for IWA members currently on strike against the Weyerhaeuser Co. in Arkansas, Oklahoma, North Carolina and Georgia is about $2.80 an hour, while those working in forests on the West Coast are earning $5 and $6 an hour.

The 320 convention delegates overwhelmingly endorsed the efforts of the Weyerhaeuser strikers to win a fair contract settlement. About 3,500 IWA members struck the firm in late January after rejecting the company's "final offer" by better than a 2-1 margin.

Delegates voted to defer action on a committee report studying the feasibility of shifting IWA headquarters from Portland, Ore., to Vancouver, B.C.

The proposed move to the Canadian city, which has broad support of IWA Canadian members, has been under study since 1973. Canadian members make up about 50 percent of the union's membership and IWA President Keith Johnson is himself a Canadian.

Supporters of the switch to Vancouver have contended that the move would promote organizing efforts among Canadian workers and help repel raids against existing IWA units in Canada.

Turning to national economic problems, the IWA delegates called on Congress to reduce the interest rate on federally-guaranteed mortgage loans to 6 percent in an effort to spur the construction of 500,000 additional homes annually.

Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., in an address to the delegates, cited the wide range of abuses by multinational corporations and conglomerates that have been allowed to expand their influence without effective government controls.

Announcing their impending retirements at the convention were Sec.-Treas. William Botkin and J. L. Baughman, southern regional director. Baughman will retire in August and Botkin in November.

The union's executive board will select an interim secretary-treasurer to serve out Botkin's term, which expires in September 1977.

The convention also approved the appointments of First Vice President Robert Gerwig and Second Vice President F. J. Viala, who are filling out unexpired terms. All officers will be up for election at next year's convention.

Matt DeMore Dies, Retired IAM Leader

Matthew DeMore, a leader in the National Council of Senior Citizens and former secretary-treasurer of the Machinists, died Mar. 17 in Washington, D.C. He would have been 73 on Apr. 5.

DeMore was a native of Cleveland and joined IAM Local 439 there in 1935, when he was a maintenance machinist at a General Electric plant. He was elected president of the local the following year, became president of IAM District 54 in 1938 and was re-elected to 22 consecutive annual terms. In 1961, he was elected a general vice president of the Machinists and in 1965 he was elected secretary-treasurer, serving until 1969.

After his retirement from the IAM, DeMore was active in the Senior Citizens council. He was first vice president of the NCSC and chairman of Concerned Seniors for Better Government, the separate political action organization.

In messages of condolence to his family and to the Senior Citizens, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland praised DeMore's "lifetime of service to his fellow man." They termed his leadership "an invaluable asset . . . to the entire labor movement and the nation."

DeMore is survived by his wife, Mary, five children, 19 grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

Union Women Set Up Task Force on ERA

The Coalition of Labor Union Women (CLUW) is establishing a task force to rally the nation's millions of female trade unionists behind ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Sixty CLUW executive board members voted to create the task force during their recent Washington meeting "to implement (CLUW's) constitutional declaration" of ERA ratification "as a primary goal."

A resolution on ERA called for the group's members to work within their local unions, state labor federations and international unions "to demand that the records and votes of state legislators on ERA be carefully scrutinized before endorsement or political support is given."

The Equal Rights Amendment would constitutionally guarantee women the same economic and legal rights as men. The amendment must be ratified by 38 states before it can become law and thus far 34 states have given it their approval.

CLUW leaders said the task force "will supply factual answers and rebuttal to the enormous amount of misinformation and scare material" being distributed by the amendment's opponents.

The CLUW board also voted to establish task forces to support health security legislation, occupational health and safety, apprenticeship programs, full employment measures, organizing the unorganized, and one on women and collective bargaining.

The group endorsed a boycott of Russell Stover candies called by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers with the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. An estimated 75 to 80 percent of the company's employes are women.

Unions Prod Congress:

Stronger Labor Law Sought To End Employer Evasions

The National Labor Relations Act is being frustrated by procedural delays that serve employer interests, union witnesses testified at House hearings.

President Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America said congressional action to remedy shortcomings in the law and its administration is long overdue. The TWUA and other unions have been documenting deficiencies in the law at House and Senate hearings at least as far back as 1961, he noted.

While "excellent bills" have been introduced as a result of these hearings, Stetin reminded the panel that no remedial legislation has ever been acted on by Congress.

Two unions representing hospital workers—the Service Employees and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—testified to delays of more than a year resulting from groundless employer election challenges and appeals. Other unions are scheduled to testify later in the hearings that are being held by a House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Stetin said the flagrant union-busting actions by southern textile manufacturers demonstrated that the intent of the law could be frustrated at relatively little cost by employers who refused to accept collective bargaining.

"Nowhere is the evidence of cold-blooded and illegal anti-union activity" by an employer "more shocking, more preponderant, more repeatedly proven before the NLRB and the courts than in the case of J. P. Stevens," Stetin said.

He urged amendment of the National Relations Act to:

- Impose more severe penalties for violations. "Flagrant violators such as J. P. Stevens should, in addition to heavy fines, be put in jail. . . . Penalties should be made severe enough to make it no longer profitable for employers to thumb their noses at the law."
- Disqualify employers who deliberately and repeatedly violate the National Labor Relations Act from receiving business orders from the federal government.

Stetin noted that during the period of the worst law violations by J. P. Stevens, it received government contracts amounting to more than $104 million.

- Require the NLRB to seek injunctions against unfair labor practices by employers who persistently violate the law.
- Empower the NLRB to require a company to bargain with a union that has been prevented from gaining a majority by persistent employer unfair labor practices.

The general counsel of the Service Employees, Les Asher, termed delaying tactics a "coldly calculated strategy by employers" that "undermines both the effectiveness and the integrity of the NLRB."

Asher cited a recent example of delaying tactics by an employer—in this case a Seattle hospital. The SEIU petitioned for bargaining rights in September 1974 and won the representation election held a month later. But employer objections, repeated hearings and requests for time to file exceptions, resulted in delaying the union's certification until last August.

"No union or group of employes can afford to participate in such a lengthy process," the SEIU declared. "It becomes too expensive in terms of foregone wages and benefits. For every day that representation is delayed and negotiations postponed, the worker is financially penalized. On the other hand, the employer benefits from the delay because his labor costs are frozen and he can, through delaying tactics, make the cost of organizing prohibitive."

RWDSU District 1199 testified that the great breakthrough anticipated by the 1974 legislation bringing workers in non-profit health care institutions under the NLRA threatens to turn into "a nightmare" where employers try to keep workers from organizing.

Robert L. Muehlenkamp, the union's organizing director, said employers "learned quickly the new rules of the game"—how to destroy a union's majority by delaying tactics.

Since the coverage was extended, Muehlenkamp testified, the union has won 89 out of 121 representation elections that were held within four months of the date the petition was filed, but lost or withdrew from 75 percent of all cases that took over four months. And it won only two of 32 elections delayed more than seven months, Muehlenkamp testified, even though the union's policy is to petition for an election only when it has 65 percent of the bargaining unit signed up.

Board Bars Bid to Sever URW Units

Akron, O. — A National Labor Relations Board regional director dismissed the petitions of the unaffilated International Society of Skilled Trades to gain bargaining rights for some 7,000 skilled trades workers represented by the Rubber Workers.

In four separate decisions, Bernard Levine, NLRB District 8 regional director in Cleveland, ruled against severance of the employes from Goodyear, Firestone, B. F. Goodrich and General Tire. His conclusions are virtually identical in each case.

The regional director cited evidence that the skilled tradesmen ISST sought to represent "have figured prominently in the maintenance of the existing pattern of representation" by the URW. Another factor weighing against severance was ISST's lack of experience as a "traditional representative" of the employes it petitioned to represent, Levine said.

URW President Peter Bommarito said his union was "elated with these excellent decisions by the NLRB," and said he hoped now that the union could focus its complete attention on its current negotiations with the rubber-tire industry.

JOINT EFFORT of the International Labor Press Association and the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to encourage union members to buy union-made goods and services is reviewed by Federation President George Meany. Making the presentation are ILPA President Albert K. Herling, left, and Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid of the union label department.

'Natural Law' Stressed As Root of Strike Right

New York—Natural law gives all workers—whether they are in private industry or the public sector—the right to strike, Thomas R. Donahue said in a debate at the annual meeting of the American Arbitration Association.

Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, said that some legal scholars may argue that the right to strike was not recognized at common law, nor protected in legal statutes.

"But a natural law right it remains," Donahue stressed. "It flows from man's natural right to life, his right to free speech and of freedom of association."

The right to strike is not something to be granted to public employes, nor extended to them as a privilege, he said.

"To say otherwise is to say that the worker is less equal than other men, and that can't be because he is, by natural law, absolutely equal to all others," Donahue declared.

He was joined in the discussion by Victor Gotbaum, executive director of Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees. They were opposed by R. Theodore Clark, a Chicago-based lawyer, and Sam Zagoria, director of the Labor-Management Relations Service, an arm of several public employer groups.

Donahue noted that in a free society, trade unions and employers are usually able to come to an acceptable agreement that recognizes the interest of both sides, while giving due regard to the general public.

"The right to strike, and the possibility of a strike, is what makes the collective bargaining process work best," he observed.

"It is that possibility that turns conversations into discussion, discussion into negotiation, negotiation into agreement and peace for a fixed period of time. Without it, you wind up with only sterile discussion or heated debate."

He noted that, occasionally, the results of collective bargaining may be untidy, but stressed that society would be served best by laws that recognize the right of public employes to strike.

Donahue suggested that the submission of disputes to voluntary arbitration should be encouraged, but warned that labor could never support the imposition of compulsory arbitration.

Compulsory arbitration is coercion that "substitutes governmental determination for the rights of free men to make their own decisions," Donahue said.

The AAA board of directors re-elected Howard Coughlin, president of the Office & Professional Employees, as chairman of the executive committee and Robert Coulson as president.

Coulson reported that the association administered 25 percent more cases in 1975 than in the previous year.

James Scearce Named for Top Mediation Post

James Scearce, acting director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service since W. J. Usery, Jr., left the director's post to become Secretary of Labor, has been nominated to head the agency.

Scearce, 43, was named by President Ford subject to approval by the Senate.

A native of High Point, N.C., Scearce served as deputy director of the FMCS until Usery's departure last month.

A Republican, Scearce was a public relations manager for Douglas Aircraft Co. from 1958 to 1965 at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida. From 1965 to 1968, he was an adviser on industry-labor relations for the National Aeronautics & Space Administration. During those years both he and Usery were members of the President's Missile Sites Labor Relations Committee.

Scearce served as Usery's assistant during the latter's term as assistant secretary of labor, working on administration of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act, the Welfare-Pension Plan Disclosure Act, the Veterans Reemployment Rights Act, and the federal employes' labor-management relations program.

Later, he was a labor adviser for the Environmental Protection Agency.

AFL-CIO Urges Firmer Standards For Prompt Payment of Jobless Aid

The AFL-CIO charged that Labor Dept. proposals for federal standards of "benefit-payment promptness" under state unemployment insurance programs represent a retreat from the department's 1974 guidelines.

In a written comment on the proposals, Federation President George Meany described the standards as "unsatisfactory" and suggested they be revised and improved before they are adopted.

The proposed government standards would require that after Sept. 30, 1976, states must pay 80 percent of first-benefit payments on all claims by state residents within 14 days of the first week for which a recipient is eligible for compensation.

States also would be required to make 60 percent of first-benefit payments on all interstate claims within 14 days after the end of the first compensable week.

"The AFL-CIO is distressed that the criteria represent a retreat from the guidelines issued by the department in General Administration Letter No. 1504, issued Feb. 7, 1974," Meany said. Those guidelines recommended that states make 86 percent of intrastate first payments within 14 days of the end of the first compensable week, and 67 percent of interstate first payments within 14 days.

"We are unaware of any valid reason for establishing criteria requiring less effort on the part of state agencies in fiscal year 1977 than the 1974 guidelines," Meany said. "We urge the department to revise the criteria to at least maintain the effort required by the 1974 guidelines."

The purpose of the new standards is to put money in the pocket of unemployed workers at the earliest time that is administratively possible. A sharp rise in jobless insurance claims due to the recession resulted in lengthy delays in benefit payments in many states.

Meany also said the AFL-CIO is "appalled" that the proposals are "absolutely silent" on the problem of the 20 percent of intrastate benefit payments and the 40 percent of interstate payments outside the scope of the proposed criteria. He urged that the criteria be revised to provide that 85 percent of intrastate first payments be made within 21 days and 85 percent within 30 days. He said the criteria for interstate payments should provide that 70 percent of first payments be made within 30 days, 80 percent within 45 days, and 90 percent within 60 days.

There still would be a residual group of 5 percent intrastate claimants and 10 percent interstate claimants who are uncovered by the criteria. Meany urged that through subsequent review and evaluation state agencies should be encouraged "to reduce the residual groups to the lowest possible level."

The Labor Dept. proposals also would provide for a complete reporting and monitoring system to determine what states not meeting the guidelines are doing to improve their performance.

Federal Employes To Get Back Pay

St. Louis—Twenty-four members of the Government Employees will collect $46,300 in back pay as the result of a settlement won by their union in a case against the Farmers Home Administration here.

The AFGE successfully contended that the agency had improperly set pay rates, violating regulations of both the Civil Service Commission and the Dept. of Agriculture.

Individual payments under the settlement will range from $1,000 to $6,900.

Ford Threatens Veto:

Hatch Act Reforms Adopted by Senate

funds from neighbors, but not from anyone working under their supervision. Still intact would be portions of the law protecting workers against political pressure.

The Senate final passage vote closely followed party lines, with nearly all Republicans opposed and the bulk of Democrats supporting the bill. (Rollcall on Page 2.)

The Senate did adopt an amendment retaining Hatch Act restrictions on employes of the Justice Dept., the Internal Revenue Service and the Central Intelligence Agency.

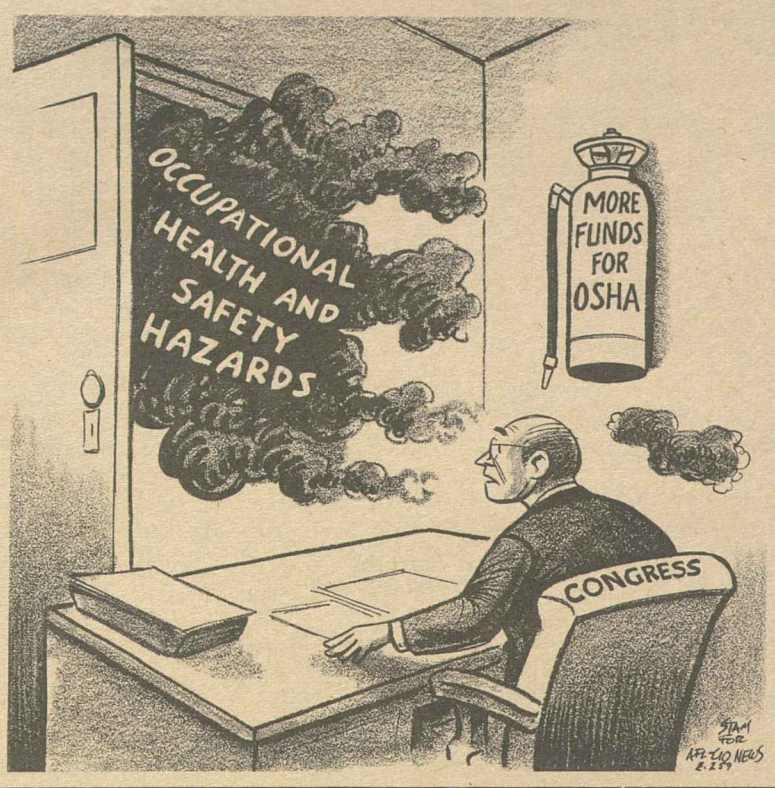
But it rejected an amendment that would have eased political restrictions only for state and local elections while retaining them in federal contests.

An unrelated rider approved as an amendment to the bill would allow Congress to vote to give salaried federal employes their full "comparability" raise without automatically increasing the salaries of Congress members.

The amendment, adopted 69-14, would require separate votes on resolutions disapproving a presidential change in the comparability formula so as to allow a legislator to vote federal workers a higher percentage raise than members of Congress would get.

When the House took up the bill last fall, Administration sources indicated it faced a veto and there has been no suggestion since that the President has changed his view.

In other developments:



- The Senate moved towards passage of a labor-backed bill to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission in conformance with a Supreme Court ruling.

A key ingredient of the legislation is a section overturning an advisory opinion of the commission that would allow employers to solicit their workers for political contributions and payroll deductions for management-sponsored political funds. The new bill would limit employer solicitations to stockholders and management-level employes.

Again, there has been veto rumblings from the White House. In one very close test, an amendment that would have deleted from the bill everything except the reconstitution of the election commission as an Executive Branch agency was only narrowly beaten, 47-46.

- The Senate Public Works Committee drafted what it termed a compromise measure that would scale down the job-creating program of accelerated public works and countercyclical aid to states and cities that President Ford vetoed. But the panel did not deal with the countercyclical grants proposal, and an amendment to put that program back into the bill is likely on the Senate floor. The veto had been overridden in the House, but the Senate vote was three short of the required two-thirds.

Budget Analysis Sees Continuing Joblessness

mean a halt to the decline in unemployment by 1977."

The CBO's analysis was the second economic study from Capitol Hill in a week that warned against the possible adverse impact of the Ford budget proposals. The Democratic majority of the Joint Economic Committee earlier declared that the President's budget could pull the props out from under the current fragile economic recovery.

The CBO report was mandated by the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 "to illustrate a broad range of options" available to Congress.

A "high option" budget formulated by the CBO, which would provide more funds for all programs, both military and social, would involve spending this year of $452.7 billion—$58.4 billion more than President Ford wants to spend.

A "low option" budget was outlined that would mean giving less than they want to both the Pentagon and social program agencies. This budget comes in a $398 billion, but even this "low option" is $3.8 billion more than President Ford has requested.

While the Congressional Budget Office and Ford both started out with the same figures, they arrived at different conclusions on a number of items.

For example, the CBO says that for each $1 billion spent on public service employment programs, anywhere from 73,000 to 121,000 new jobs could be created. Ford says only 50,000 jobs would come from each $1 billion spent.

And while Ford insists unemployment will drop to 7 percent this year if his $394.2 billion budget is adopted, the CBO says the only way this will happen is if the budget goes higher, to $422 billion.

In all their calculations, both the CBO and Ford cited as their source for the number of jobless workers the reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. But, as the AFL-CIO has long argued, there are many more unemployed than BLS acknowledges. The federation put the true jobless rate for February at 10.5 percent rather than the official BLS figure of 7.6 percent.

Labor Seeks Safety-Health Fund Increase

gram, the AFL-CIO noted that the budget for the National Institute for Occupaional Safety & Health—a part of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare—is $2.7 million less than the $37.1 million appropriated for this fiscal year.

Instead, the AFL-CIO witnesses urged an $8 million budget increase and some 50 to 60 new positions, mostly in research and services.

Labor's analysis of the President's budget proposals for both OSHA and NIOSH, the AFL-CIO said, "reveals that they call for marking time in the implementation of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, and deferring the hard policy and program decisions as reflected in budget documents until after the presidential election."

On the wage-hour enforcement budget, the AFL-CIO stressed that complaints from workers reached record levels last year, the backlog rose 8 percent and has continued to grow by 1,000 a month.

In order to both reduce the backlog and resume inspections of establishments generally, Biemiller urged funds to hire an additional 300 investigators.

He also asked the committee to approve the full 12.3 percent funding increase sought by the Administration for the National Labor Relations Board so as to reduce backlogs that are "seriously undermining" the intent of the labor law.

Veterans' Joblessness Double National Rate

Vietnam vetreans have an unemployment rate more than double the national average for their age groups, the Labor Dept. said.

In the key 20- to 24-year age group, 18.9 percent of Vietnam veterans in the job market are unemployed compared with the overall national rate of 7.8 percent for the age bracket.

Major Changes Sought For Estate, Gift Taxes

"The federal estate and gift tax is a largely untapped source of revenue and a badly underutilized means of adding fairness and equity to the nation's overall tax structure," the AFL-CIO said in testimony submitted to the House Ways & Means Committee.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged the committee to consider the following reforms of the gift tax structure:

1. Integrate the present estate and gift tax into a single, cumulative tax applying to all transfers of property after appropriate exemptions and deductions whether made during the donor's lifetime or at death.

2. Eliminate the "enormous tax savings that are realized by the wealthy through generation skipping trusts."

3. Adjust the brackets or rate schedule to achieve a more effective and more progressive tax structure.

4. Provide more protection to the surviving spouse in smaller estates and at the same time curb the disproportionately high benefits that flow to larger estates.

5. Increase the present $60,000 basic exemption and liberalize the present installment payment provisions which apply to estates that include a closely-held business or farm in cases where there is a demonstrable need.

6. Tighten the provisions that permit unlimited charitable deductions from the estate tax base.

7. Tax the appreciated value of assets passed on at death, but permit those taxes as a deduction for estate tax purposes.

Ford's Antitrust Switch Undercuts Justice Dept.

President Ford caved in to conservative pressure and withdrew Administration support from an antitrust bill backed by labor and consumer groups—but opposed by the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Ford's last-minute reversal contradicted earlier Justice Dept. and Federal Trade Commission testimony in general support of the bill. It also brought into question the President's often-repeated promise to take "tough" action against price-fixers.

The bill, which was being debated by the House as the AFL-CIO News went to press, would expand the right of a state to represent large groups of its citizens and bring a civil suit for triple damages against companies that have been found guilty of illegal price-fixing.

Without such legislation, companies that violate the antitrust laws often end up pocketing illegal profits because the amount involved in each transaction and the difficulty of establishing proof of purchase after a long time lapse make it impractical for an individual or small group to bring a suit for damages.

Under the proposed legislation, money collected as a result of such a suit that could not be fairly distributed to the persons actually overcharged would be used for the common good in a related way. Thus, money collected from a price-fixing suit against drug companies might be used for state medical care.

After the bill was scheduled for debate, Ford wrote House Republican Leader John J. Rhodes questioning "whether federal legislation is desirable" or needed. He said the bill was "too broad." And he questioned also the right to collect triple the amount of actual damages from a company guilty of illegal restraint of trade—a civil right that is in present antitrust law. Ford said the triple damage section is based on an assumption, "no longer justifiable," that the fines levied on companies violating the law are inadequate penalties.

Key provisions of the bill had earlier been endorsed by the assistant attorney general in charge of antitrust enforcement and by the director of the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition.

The legislation is supported by the National Association of State Attorneys General and stems from court decisions holding that new legislation is needed to allow a state that has not itself been harmed by an antitrust violation to sue in its capacity as a "protector of the people" on behalf of those who were shortchanged.

The House Republican Policy Committee has taken a stand against the bill.

Gap in Pay Comparability Expected to Reach 12%

A 12 percent increase in federal civilian and military pay will be needed this year to achieve comparability with workers in private industry, according to projections of the Congressional Budget Office.

In its first annual report laying out options for Congress to consider in approving a budget for fiscal year 1977, the CBO said $5.9 billion is needed in October to raise federal salaries to the level of the private sector.

The 12 percent rise would include a 3.7 percent "catch-up" to compensate for the 5 percent limit, or "cap," imposed on raises last year.

The agency, which was established to provide non-partisan analysis to help Congress develop budget policies, also projected that annual raises averaging 8.6 percent would be required over the next five years to maintain comparability. Fiscal year 1977 begins on Oct. 1.

President Ford's restrictive budget recommended a 4.7 percent average increase in October, with a minimum of 3 percent and a maximum of 5 percent.

Meany Asks Fast Action On Jobs Bill

By John R. Oravec

The wide gap between the intent of the 1946 Employment Act and the nation's high level of unemployment must be closed with passage of full employment legislation this year, AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

Full employment is the only economic policy that makes any sense, Meany said in an address delivered by Federation Vice President I. W. Abel at a dinner honoring the Joint Economic Committee of Congress on the observance of the 30th anniversary of the employment law.

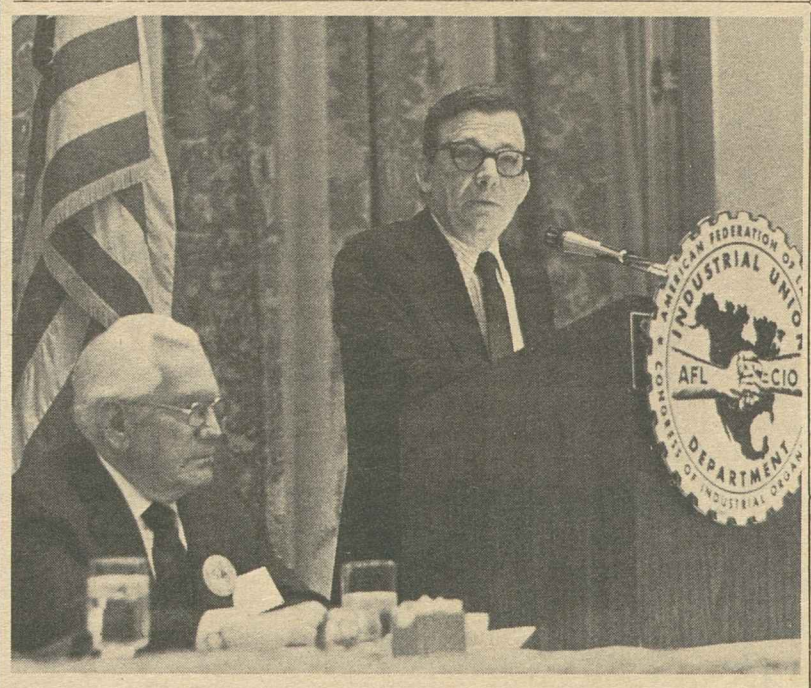
The 1946 measure made a commitment toward full employment, Meany noted, but it's effectiveness was compromised at the time of its passage and subsequently by the Nixon-Ford Administration's policy of sacrificing jobs in the inflation-unemployment trade-off.

Meany told the 750 guests at the dinner sponsored by the National Committee for Full Employment that the fight for passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act cannot wait until 1977.

The labor-endorsed legislation was introduced by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, and Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.). The measure embraces AFL-CIO objectives of reducing the nation's jobless rate to 3 percent within four years and would establish government policy to hold it at that level.

"Unlike 1946," Meany said, "we will not accept a meaningless, empty commitment alone. We want a commitment with specific procedures leading to substantive programs.

"We will not accept 4 percent or 5 percent or 6 percent unemployment as 'full employment,' despite the efforts of some Administration officials and economists to change the rules because they can't make the grade."



Meany stressed that a full employment economy cannot be achieved with a single program, or by the government or business alone. It will require the efforts of all segments of the economy, he said, but it must start with government.

The full employment law requires specific steps and programs that Congress must force the Administration to implement, Meany said.

"The past seven years are proof that Congress cannot rely on the good judgment and good will of a President to properly administer the law when America has a President who has neither," he said.

Nuclear Power Held Vital To Needs of U.S. Economy

NUCLEAR POWER development is essential to America's productive growth, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told delegates to an Industrial Union Dept. energy conference. IUD President I. W. Abel, left, also addressed the two-day meeting.

Independence Goal Stressed by Kirkland

By James M. Shevis

Rapid development of nuclear power is a "must" without which the nation's economy would falter while the United States became more dependent on foreign sources of energy, speakers at an Industrial Union Dept. conference here stressed repeatedly.

"America cannot stand idly by, leaving its well-being in the hands of undependable, irresponsible foreign sources," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told some 200 delegates from IUD unions at the two-day meeting.

While all domestic fuel sources must be developed, he said, the nation's greatest reliance in the immediate future must be placed on coal and nuclear energy.

Kirkland noted that nuclear energy is the target of a well-organized drive to ban its use.

"The basis of that campaign is that nuclear energy is not safe," he said. "We do not agree with that assessment." The occupational safety record of the nuclear industry is outstanding when compared with competing energy industries, Kirkland declared.

"In the more than 20 years that nuclear energy has been in use there has been not one death due to radiation effects," he observed. "But the safety record of the nuclear industry is no guarantee for the future.

"That is why we insist that safety standards must be the most stringent, the most uncompromising for any industry."

The slate of speakers included other labor leaders and representatives of the academic and scientific communities who reported on the economic viability of nuclear energy, the relationship between nuclear energy and jobs, congressional attitudes toward nuclear energy,

Election Act Bill Passed By Senate

The Senate broke a deadlock and passed a compromise bill to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission so as to remedy constitutional defects that had been found by the Supreme Court.

While the Senate bill makes other changes in the present campaign financing law, it is not as broad-ranging as a bill approved by the House Administration Committee and scheduled for House debate shortly.

Until Congress completes action, presidential candidates will not be able to receive further payments of federal matching funds. The Supreme Court's temporary permission for payments to continue while the remedial legislation was being drafted expired on Mar. 22.

Republicans initially had sought merely to reconstitute the election commission as an executive agency, with members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, in order to meet the Supreme Court's objections to having a law administered by a body made up largely of members appointed

Union Position Backed:

Seniority Upheld In Job Bias Cases

By David L. Perlman

A worker who has been denied a job because of race discrimination is entitled to retroactive seniority as well as back pay to the date of the job application, the Supreme Court ruled in a 5-3 decision.

That's what the AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers had urged in a joint brief to the Supreme Court.

The labor brief upheld the right of a worker who has been the victim of illegal discrimination to be restored to his or her "rightful place" on the job roster.

Steelworkers President I. W. Abel said the union was "gratified" that the Supreme Court had provided a "full remedy to employes who have actually suffered from discrimination at the hands of their employer without undermining the integrity of seniority systems."

The unions opposed and the Supreme Court decision did not embrace any type of preferential seniority treatment for minority group members who were not themselves discriminated against by the company.

Abel stressed that the decision gives no support to the views of those who advocate—"in the name of civil rights"—that seniority systems be scrapped in order to set up job quota rights for members of minority groups. The remedy directed by the Supreme Court is restricted to those individuals who were actually discriminated against.

The award of seniority back to the date of the illegal refusal to hire, union attorneys said, is the same remedy that has been prescribed by the National Labor Relations Board and by arbitrators for other types of employer misconduct.

The Steelworkers entered into the case because workers at the trucking company involved had been represented at the time of the hiring dispute by the formerly independent District 50, which has since become part of the Steelworkers. The AFL-CIO joined in the brief because of the general significance of the case to the labor movement.

Abel noted that there are "sensitive and delicate legal and moral

Clothing, Textile Unions Agree on Merger Plan

A plan to merge the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and the Textile Workers Union of America will be submitted to conventions of both unions this spring. It carries the unanimous endorsement of the executive boards of the two unions.

If the merger agreement is ratified, the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union will be launched in June with more than half-a-million members. The ACWA will bring 350,000 members into the merger and the TWUA will add 160,000.

The agreement on merger was announced by President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing Workers, and President Sol Stetin and Sec.-Treas. William M. DuChessi of the TWUA.

Their joint statement stressed the close "family" relationship between the two unions for nearly 40 years. The ACWA and its then-president, Sidney Hillman, helped start the Government Employees Win USIA Staff Election

The Government Employees union has won bargaining rights for some 2,100 foreign service employes of the United States Information Agency.

The AFGE victory came nearly a year after the union filed a petition with the Employee-Management Relations Commission of the Board of the Foreign Service, challenging the American Foreign Service Association for the right to represent the professionals on the USIA staff.

In a worldwide secret-ballot election concluded on Mar. 22, AFGE received 853 votes to 504 for AFSA and 75 for no representation.

The commission is expected to certify the results formally after the expiration of a brief post-election challenge period. Following certification, AFGE Local 1812 will represent all of USIA's more than 4,000 general schedule and foreign service employes.

Bruce Gregory, president of the local, attributed the victory to AFGE's proven record of representing the interests of the agency's nearly 2,000 Civil Service employes, "and our accomplishments over the years on behalf of foreign service employes in Congress, the courts and in individual grievance cases."

U.S. MERCHANT FLEET revitalization and the expansion of American oil reserves through the use of empty U.S. tankers drew solid support from delegates to the Marine Engineers convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. MEBA President Jesse M. Calhoon chaired the sessions.

Meany Asks Fast Action On Full Employment Bill

"Government must have an arsenal of weapons designed to first reduce today's high unemployment and then keep it down."

Under mistaken advice, unemployment became an instrument of national economic policy, Meany observed: "To cut the 4.2 percent inflation rate of 1968, the advisers prescribed higher unemployment. And when they got unemployment to the highest levels since the Depression, inflation soared into double digits."

"To cut the inflation rate, they prescribed more unemployment," he said.

Meany pointed out that when Richard Nixon became President, the nation's unemployment rate was 3.3 percent — the results of eight years of effort by the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations in their commitment to full employment. And if the Nixon-Ford policymakers had kept the jobless rate at the 1969 level, America would have a budget surplus today, he stressed, adding:

"Now, they won't tell you they are for unemployment. Instead, they say they are against inflation. Higher interest rates and higher profits are not inflationary, they say, but putting people back to work is."

Meany warned that Ford would attempt to characterize full employment programs as "leaf-raking," although the nation has extensive needs for energy development, plant modernization, the building of transit systems, housing, hospitals and cultural centers.

"These needs are much more than leaf-raking," Meany said. "They are needs that a true full employment program would fulfill."

Ford's election campaign commercials on television are also hailing the reduction in the official unemployment rate to 7.6 percent as proof that his policies are working, Meany noted. That comes to 7.1 million workers officially unemployed, although the true jobless rate is 10.5 percent of the workforce with 9.9 million workers unemployed, he said.

The grim jobless statistics illustrate the failure of the "trickle-down" theory of economics practiced by Chairman Arthur F. Burns of the Federal Reserve Board and Alan Greenspan, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Meany observed.

Humphrey, addressing the dinner guests, pointed out that the United States is experiencing the highest unemployment of any nation in the industrialized world. He said it is essential to eliminate the waste of unemployment that costs the nation's economy $200 billion a year.

Hawkins told the gathering that unless a full employment economy can be achieved, equal opportunities for the minorities are mere window dressing.

Other speakers at the dinner included Coretta Scott King, widow of Dr. Martin Luther King, and President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers, who jointly head the National Committee for Full Employment.

Court Orders Jobless Aid in Strike Layoff

A three-judge federal court ordered Ohio to pay back unemployment benefits to employes of two steel companies who were laid off as an indirect result of a Mine Workers strike against coal mines owned by their employers.

The portion of the state law that the court found unconstitutional has since been repealed by the legislature. The court ruling, subject to a possible appeal by Ohio to the Supreme Court, would result in payment of about $1 million to 1,250 affected U.S. Steel and Republic Steel workers who had been denied benefits before the law was changed.

Under the previous law, benefits could not be paid if a worker's unemployment was the result of a strike against his employer. The law was amended last December to authorize payments of benefits to workers who are "not financing, participating in, or directly interested in such labor dispute."

The court decision held that the workers who had been denied benefits before the law was changed had been deprived of their 14th Amendment right to equal protection and due process of law. It said the state could deny benefits to a worker unemployed because of a labor dispute involving his own union. But the assumption of personal involvement could not be made in the case before the court.

Steelworkers Gain Tappan Unit of 1,050

Mansfield, Ohio — Production, maintenance and office employes of the Tappan Co. here voted overwhelmingly to affiliate with the Steelworkers.

The 1,050 Tappan employes were previously represented by the Independent Stove Workers Union. Tappan manufacturers kitchen ranges and home appliances here and at seven other facilities.

AFL-CIO Pamphlet Looks at Congress

A detailed legislative report on the first session of the 94th Congress covering more than 75 issues discussed and voted on in 1975 is available from the AFL-CIO.

"Labor Looks at Congress, 1975" is the latest in a series of reports on Congress prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation. The 116-page booklet deals with labor's views on the issues before the first session and charts the courses of legislation through various congressional stages.

The booklet, Publication 77Q, is available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division. Single copies are free; orders up to 100 are 50 cents each; larger orders are priced at $45 per 100.

Trades Sue On Highway Job Hazards

Alexandria, Va. — Federal and Virginia state highway officials were accused in a federal court suit of failing to correct unsafe working and driving conditions in construction areas of heavily traveled Interstate 495, a beltway around Washington, D.C.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court here by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Center for Auto Safety, charges that the government highway administrators violated their own safety requirements.

The number of accidents on the beltway stretch involved has increased 100 percent since the new construction work began, the Center for Auto Safety said. It noted that the National Transportation Safety Board identified hazards on I-495 and called for improvements six months ago, but little has been done.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine expressed concern for both motorists and construction workers who face the beltway hazards.

The plaintiffs urged the court to direct both federal and state highway authorities to take immediate acion to reduce the hazards. The suit asks the court to:

- Order the Virginia Highway Commissioner to bring all traffic control devices and practices into compliance with federal standards.
- Require that any further federal funds allotted to the beltway be used first to bring construction sites into federal compliance.
- Bar the Dept. of Transportation from approving future projects throughout the country unless they can be built without jeopardizing the safety of workers and motorists.

Energy Safeguard:

Marine Engineers Back Oil Reserve

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A call for a strengthened American merchant marine and for creation of a U.S. strategic oil reserve using American tanker ships and storage sites was issued by the 94th convention of the Marine Engineers.

Calling the development of a strong American maritime industry "essential" to carrying out an effective program of sufficiency in energy and other raw materials, the MEBA delegates recommended that "a fair share of U.S. oil and raw materials imports be required by law to be transported by U.S. flag ships."

They asked that tax loopholes involved in the shipping process that benefit multinational corporations and foreign countries should be speedily closed.

The resolution pointed to a growing dependence on foreign supplies of oil and industrial raw materials and warned that "we cannot avoid dependency on foreign countries and the giant multinational corporations unless we eliminate their ability to cut off our access to supplies of essential raw materials."

Recalling that President Ford had vetoed a bill to ensure that at least 30 percent of foreign oil would be imported to this country in American flag tankers, President Jesse M. Calhoon voiced hope that "perhaps with a new President and new leadership in Congress we can get this country moving again. We can't survive with divided government, between the Legislative and Executive Branches."

Calhoon told the delegates that "this nice clean man" — Gerald Ford — "has put the country on dead center, tolerated terrible unemployment, and played into the hands of the multinational corporations."

In a series of constitutional changes, the convention decided that future elections of MEBA officers will be at the union's biennial conventions rather than through long-extended periods of voting by mail. The union's president, secretary-treasurer and executive vice-president will serve four-year terms starting in 1978.

The call for quick creation of a strategic oil reserve noted that in October 1973, during the Mideast war, "the United States was at the mercy of the Arab nations." Late in 1975 Congress authorized the strategic reserve of petroleum, and plans call for the storage of at least 150 million barrels of crude oil and petroleum products within three years.

MEBA has strongly endorsed the plan. In addition, it recommended that reserve oil tankers be anchored off the coasts of New England and the Port of New York carrying at least 35 million barrels of crude oil and oil products. New England is more heavily dependent than other sections of the country on oil imports, and the reserve would be available for quick distribution in the northeastern states in case of a shortage.

In other actions affecting the merchant marine, the 101-year-old union of licensed officers opposed efforts by the Ford Administration to weaken the Jones Act, which limits intra-U.S. shipping trade to American flag vessels.

With low-wage foreign flag vessels—including those of the Soviet Union and China—gobbling up the lion's share of international shipping, the intra-American trade is vital to preserving even today's diminished United States merchant marine, the convention said.

The delegates also went strongly on record against further federal subsidies to state maritime academies—six altogether—because few of their graduates enter the merchant marine.

President John Leyden of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, an affiliate of MEBA, voiced appreciation he had received from Calhoon and other MEBA officers in building up PATCO from a "struggling little organization" of around 3,000 members. PATCO now has nearly 14,000 members, Leyden reported.

NLRB Bars Coverage For Interns, Residents

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that interns and resident physicians at hospitals are students rather than employes and are not entitled to the protection of federal labor law in organizing to bargain collectively.

By a 4 to 1 vote, the board dismissed a petition for a representation election among the interns, residents and clinical fellows at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center of Los Angeles which was filed by the Cedars-Sinai Housestaff Association.

The organization is a branch of the Physicians' National Housestaff Association, which claims a national membership of 18,000 interns and residents in some 100 teaching hospitals across the country.

The majority decision was issued by Chairman Betty S. Murphy, and Members Howard Jenkins, Jr., John A. Penello and Peter D. Walther. Member John H. Fanning dissented, asserting that the housestaff members performed a service for the hospital for which they were compensated, and were therefore employes as well as students entitled to representation under the National Labor Relations Act.

The board majority held that "interns, residents and clinical fellows are primarily engaged in graduate educational training . . . and that their status is therefore that of students rather than of employes."

"They participate in these programs not for the purpose of earning a living. Instead they are there to pursue the graduate medical education that is a requirement for the practice of medicine."

In his dissent, Fanning challenged the majority ruling as "not grounded in the statute, the law, or reason," and said "there is a pathetic irony in what my colleagues do today."

He said the one group so singularly involved in the 1974 congressional amendments expanding coverage of the NLRA to nonprofit private hospitals, "both in terms of its immediate relationship with the delivery of medical services and in terms of its recognitional interests, is today, by fiat, read out of the Act."

500,000 Jobs Lost:

Labor Urges Closing Of Tariff Loopholes

The AFL-CIO pressed Congress to close loopholes in the tariff laws that have cost the American economy at least 500,000 jobs.

Research Director Nat Goldfinger asked a House Ways & Means subcommittee to initiate repeal of two sections of the tariff code that make it highly profitable for companies to ship components to low-wage nations to be assembled by pennies-an-hour labor. The finished product is then returned to the United States virtually duty-free. Any tariff is applied only to the value added by foreign labor.

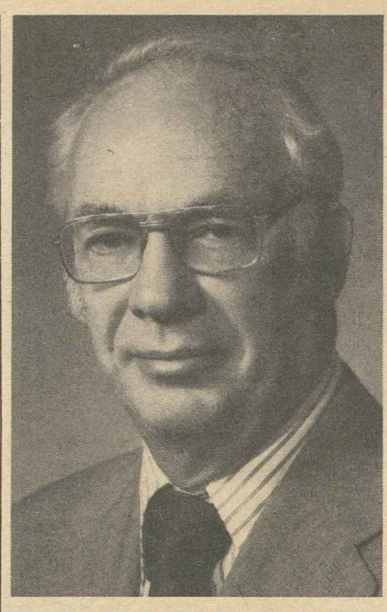
Goldfinger charged that "these provisions offer extra tax incentives for U.S. companies to expand production abroad, for sweatshop jobbers to contract-out work to the cheapest labor in the world, and extra preferences for foreign imports into impacted U.S. markets."

He said job losses in the United States have hit industries as diverse as clothing and machinery, television sets and toys, aircraft and automobiles. He cited layoffs in communities such as Chula Vista, Calif., and Tazewell, Va., as well as big cities including Philadelphia, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Goldfinger reminded the panel that government economists "poo-poohed" the AFL-CIO's warning of job losses from assembly plants being established in Mexico just across the Texas and California borders.

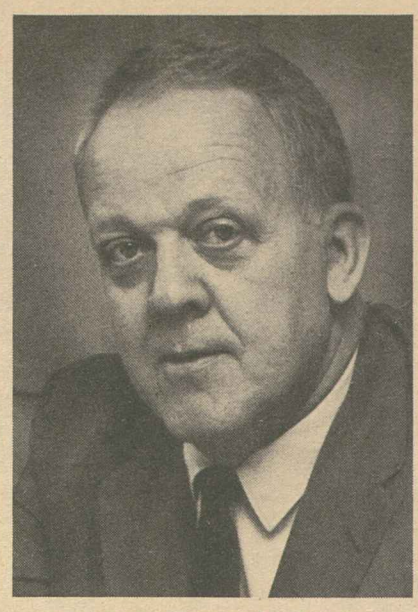
In 1967, he noted, the job threat was dismissed because "only" $20 million worth of imports were involved, from 33 plants in Mexico with about 4,000 workers.

But by 1974, this had grown to 450 plants in Mexico with more than 100,000 workers and nearly $1 billion worth of U.S. imports. Other nations, paying even lower wages, are also expanding as labor sources for U.S. companies, Goldfinger stressed.



The U.S. companies "often seek to justify their actions as improving the living standards in other countries," he noted. But they show "little concern for the American workers made jobless, many of whom are blacks, chicanos, other minorities and women."

As for raising living standards elsewhere, Goldfinger told the subcommittee that "U.S.-based multinationals are now employing prison labor in Colombia; there the wage is even lower than the $1.33 per day paid to non-prison workers."



Further, "if wages don't remain low enough to suit the U.S. multinational firms, they simply move on to another haven, closing down plants, throwing workers out of jobs and leaving behind a legacy of the ugly American."

Goldfinger, who was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, made clear that the repeal of the tariff loopholes would not solve America's trade problems. Labor has sought other measures "and will continue to do so," he said.

But he stressed that the tariff provisions that the AFL-CIO wants eliminated encourage industry to "flee the country and erode the nation's industrial base."

PAUL JENNINGS

DAVID J. FITZMAURICE

IUE Elects Fitzmaurice To Succeed Jennings

The executive board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has elected Sec.-Treas. David J. Fitzmaurice to succeed Paul Jennings as the IUE president effective June 1.

Jennings, 58, cited a serious health problem in submitting his resignation, which the board accepted with "deep and profound regret." It also praised him for his contributions in unifying the union and in the development of coordinated bargaining efforts. The IUE and 12 other national unions are preparing for major contract negotiations with General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Corp.

Jennings plans to continue handling special duties for the IUE and his activities on the federation's Executive Council and with the Industrial Union Dept.

IUE Vice President George Hutchens of Toronto, Ont., was elected to take over the secretary-treasurer's post June 1. Hutchens was chief steward of IUE Local 512 in 1946 and has been president of the union's Canadian district since 1952.

Fitzmaurice, secretary-treasurer since July 1968, has been a member of the IUE more than 35 years. He is 61.

A native of Charleroi, Pa., Fitzmaurice moved to Cleveland in 1941, when he went to work for GE. He was elected chief steward of IUE Local 707 in Cleveland in 1941 and its president in 1949. In 1960, he was elected president of IUE District 7, which covers a seven-state area.

Fitzmaurice has played a key role in coordinated union bargaining with GE since 1969. As secretary-treasurer, besides his responsibility for IUE's financial operations, he has also supervised the union's organizing and public relations and publications programs.

Jennings has headed the IUE since April 1965 and was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council later that year. He was first elected to union office as a local shop steward in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1938. Following military service in World War II he was elected to a number of offices in what is now IUE Local 450.

After the CIO chartered the IUE in 1949, Jennings served on the union's administrative committee and was elected executive secretary of IUE District 4 in 1950.

As an AFL-CIO vice president, Jennings serves on the federation's civil rights, economic policy, ethical practices, legislative and COPE committees. He also is chairman of the IUD's World Trade Committee.

The current four-year terms of IUE officers expire later this year. Elections will be held at the union's convention in Miami Beach in September.

Lower Food Costs Slow Consumer Price Rise

Retail prices edged up slightly in February and real spendable earnings remained practically unchanged, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The one-tenth of 1 percent rise in the consumer price index was the smallest increase for any month since September 1971. It followed a rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in January and an average monthly increase of six-tenths of 1 percent in the last three months of 1975.

Still, the CPI in February was 6.3 percent higher than it was a year earlier.

The slowdown in price increases over the month was due primarily to declines in prices of many types of food, the government said. Gasoline prices also fell while charges for consumer services continued to rise but at a slower pace than in January.

Food prices fell a seasonally adjusted 1 percent in February with grocery-store prices down 1.5 percent. BLS said a sharp decline in beef prices—5.9 percent after seasonal adjustment — was a major source of the large drop in food prices.

In addition, pork, poultry, fresh fruit, fresh vegetable and sugar prices continued to move down. Prices of dairy products also declined after seasonal adjustment for the first time in nine months.

Prices for some foods, such as coffee, rose last month, as did the cost of restaurant meals and snacks away from home. The cost of non-food commodities edged up three-tenths of 1 percent during February while the cost of services continued to rise rapidly, moving up seven-tenths of 1 percent.

BLS said the downtrend in the indices for gasoline and motor oil and fuel oil and coal, which began in late 1975, continued last month with declines of 1.5 percent and six-tenths of 1 percent, respectively, after seasonal adjustment.

Sharp increases in auto-insurance rates accounted for much of the 1.3 percent rise in transportation services. Charges for household services other than rent rose six-tenths of 1 percent, following a rise of 1 percent in January.

In its report on earnings in February, BLS said that real spendable earnings—take-home pay stripped of the effects of inflation—for a worker with three dependents edged up to $92.22 from $92.21.

10-State Pact Signed With Big Dress Firm

Atlanta—The Ladies' Garment Workers have negotiated a new master contract with Jonathan Logan covering 7,500 workers at 32 plants in 10 states stretching from Pennsylvania to Florida and from Alabama to Arkansas.

The 39-month agreement provides wage increases that are identical to those in the accord reached earlier this year with the dressmaking industry. It also sets the expiration date of the contract to coincide with that of the Dress Joint Council agreement and the union's children's dress contract.

Negotiated here by a union committee headed by Executive Vice Pres. Wilbur Daniels, the Logan settlement covers the company's Act III, Butte Knit, Modern Juniors and Misty Harbor divisions.

In New York, ILG President Sol C. Chaikin said the new agreement brings Logan into the mainstream of outerwear negotiations and moves the union closer to its goal of concluding a single contract covering all women's and children's outerwear garments in the future.

"This agreement, the recently renewed pact in the children's dress industry and the renewal of the Dress Joint Council contract synchronized expiration dates," he observed.

"All three contracts set up step increases totaling 23 and 25 percent during their term. Furthermore, by the end of that term—the middle of 1979 for all three—both the minimums and the yields of the three agreements will have drawn closer."

The wage increases are payable in four steps, starting with a 5 percent raise retroactive to Mar. 1. Another 5 percent boost is due on July 5. A 7 percent increase is scheduled for June 6, 1977, and a final 6 percent raise will go into effect on June 5, 1978.

Besides higher piecework minimum rates and yields, the contract provides another paid holiday starting this year, giving Logan workers a total of nine. In addition, improvements were made in company contributions toward the union's health and welfare and retirement funds.

Logan manufactures a variety of apparel. The new pact is expected to provide a pattern for subsequent negotiations with other firms in the South where most Logan shops are located.

Fasser Takes Job As Postal Umpire

Assistant Sec. of Labor Paul J. Fasser has resigned his post to go into the private labor-arbitration field. Fasser, a former Steelworkers' official who joined the Labor Dept. in October 1970, will work as associate impartial umpire with the U.S. Postal Service and four postal unions beginning Apr. 1.

Two Unions Draw Up Plan For Merger

CIO's Textile Workers Organizing Committee in 1937. Two years later, it had grown into a fully autonomous union.

In recent years, both unions have sought to stem the tide of job-destroying imports from low-wage nations. And both have battled union-busting employers in the South and Southwest.

The merger agreement will be considered by the TWUA at the union's regular biennial convention which will open May 31, 1976, in Washington, D.C. The Clothing Workers, whose regular convention would not be until 1977, will hold a special convention in the same city on June 1.

If both conventions ratify the merger, the delegates will come together in joint session.

Under the agreement, the president and secretary-treasurer of the ACWA at the time of the merger will hold the same offices in the new union. The president of TWUA at merger will become the senior executive vice president of the combined union and head of its textile division. The TWUA's secretary-treasurer will be named executive vice president.

In announcing the merger plan. the union officers said it is time for "fellow-workers in the textile-apparel industry" to join their resources to deal with common problems.

Both industries, they noted, have lost "tens of thousands of jobs" to imports and bargain with "huge conglomerates that in many cases now own both apparel and textile manufacturing plants."

The "best way" to halt the job decline, the union leaders said, "is to amalgamate our resources to bring together in one labor organization the workers who produce the basic fabrics and those who transform the fabrics into the apparel product."

The statement looked towards a major southern organizing drive, perhaps involving other unions. And it foresaw greater effectiveness in pressing for common goals such as full employment, health and safety standards, health security, tax reform and political action.

Mary C. Erb Dies, Pioneer Staff Member

Mary C. Erb, a staff member for the AFL-CIO and the former AFL for 55 years before her retirement in 1971, died in Washington after a long illness. She was 76.

Mrs. Erb joined the staff of the AFL on July 10, 1916, under the federation's first president, Samuel Gompers. She served as a research associate in both the Dept. of Research and, following merger, the Dept. of Social Security. Among her major achievements was the compilation of the AFL Encyclopedia Reference Book.

In a message of condolence to Mrs. Annette Carroll, her sister-in-law and closest living relative, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland cited Mrs. Erb's "valuable service to the labor movement through some of the most difficult and interesting periods of its growth." She was, they said "a personal link to our past heritage" and "one of those to whom the labor movement is deeply indebted."

An Investment in America

ESTABLISHING a full employment economy will require the concerted effort of all segments of the economy, but it must start with the government.

There is no single program that will achieve full employment. Relying on business alone won't do it; neither will relying on government alone.

Although the AFL-CIO was the first advocate of a federal public service employment program on the theory that the government should be the "employer of last resort," we recognize that such a program is not "the solution" to continued high unemployment.

Government must have an arsenal of weapons designed to first reduce today's high unemployment and then to keep it down.

America needs development of its energy resources. It needs to modernize its plants, build mass transit systems, housing and water and sewer systems. It needs zoos and libraries and concert halls and hospitals and laboratories. It needs policemen and fire fighters, doctors and sanitation workers.

They are needs that a true full employment program would fulfill.

ALL THIS COME under the broad heading of an investment in the future. An investment in America that will build a healthy economy.

It is an investment that maximizes the most precious resource in this country—its people.

There is no lack of a will to work in America. There is only a lack of jobs.

A job is a key measure of a person's place in society—whether as a full-fledged participant or on the outside looking in. Work is the source of individual fulfillment. It is positive, constructive activity that builds self-esteem and strengthens the nation as a whole.

Full employment is the only economic program that makes any sense. Jobs are the solution to poverty, to hunger, to filling the ever-present needs of breadwinners to feed, clothe and shelter their families. From jobs comes the tax revenue the government must have to provide essential services and programs to help its citizens.

It has been pointed out many times before—but it bears repeating—that if the unemployment rate today was at the same level it was in 1969 when the Burns-Nixon-Ford team arrived on the scene, there would be a budget surplus in America.

That alone should convince the most diehard budget balancer of the need for full employment in America.

So, we declare that the battle for real full employment has begun in earnest.

Unlike 1946, we will not accept a meaningless, empty commitment alone. We want a commitment with specific procedures leading to substantive programs.

We will not accept any other definition of full employment than a job opportunity at a decent wage for each person able and seeking work.

—From an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany prepared for a dinner of the National Committee for Full Employment.

A Word Edgewise:

Kissinger Plays Game Crudely In Debate Over Foreign Policy

By John P. Roche

SECRETARY OF STATE Henry Kissinger's recent Boston speech, accusing various unnamed irresponsibles of playing politics with crucial issues of foreign policy, reminded me of the girl who slapped her boy friend in the face for whistling a dirty song.

For almost eight years Kissinger, first in his White House role, then wearing two hats, and now as Chairman over at Foggy Bottom, has ruthlessly tailored American policy to meet the political needs of first Richard Nixon and then Gerald Ford. He accuses his critics of giving psychological aid and comfort to the enemy (or are the Soviets still "potential adversaries?"), when the fact is that one of our problems has been discovering precisely what our policy is, and much of the criticism has focused on the point that following Kissinger's trail would break a blacksnake's back.

Of course politics has never "stopped at the water's edge," though incumbent Presidents—whether Democratic or Republican—like to peddle that slogan. Indeed, I would argue that foreign policy deserves top priority in an election year: As President Kennedy once observed, you can lose 10 battles on domestic issues and live to fight another day—in foreign relations you can only lose one big one.

In other words, I don't blame Kissinger for trying to engender bipartisan unity (behind him). I have written precisely the same speech for top Democratic officeholders and recognize that American politics is a body-contact sport. However, I refuse to take his message seriously and feel that under the circumstances I have earned the right to reply. Readers with good memories will recall that a time when the Chairman was virtually beatified by the press, I was noting here that I had never seen him walking on the Charles River.

My indictment of Kissinger falls under two headings. The first is that he has played bad politics with our foreign policy. Let us look at several examples. The opening to China was doubtless a useful enterprise, but the cost was appalling: The Japanese, the only great power in Asia, went into a state of "shokku," Nixon got a great view of the Great Wall, and then, in the Shanghai communique, we accepted in principle Peking's sovereignty over Taiwan. What did we get in return? A revival of Mah-jong, "Women's Wear Daily" featuring Mao suits, and a continuing series of demands from Peking that we deliver Nationalist China on a platter.

In overall terms, we appeared as penitents going to the "Hall of the Barbarians" (as the Chinese called their foreign office into this century) in search of absolution or something. In fact, the Chinese needed (and still need) us much more than we do them, but the TV shots of the Nixons (and later the Fords) being cheered by Chinese masses were a political ploy for the benefit of the American electorate.

Similarly the Moscow agreement of 1972, in which Brezhnev and Nixon seemed to sign a worldwide nonaggression pact, was a total fake designed for the American voter in an election year. The SALT agreement had definitional holes you could drive a T-54 tank through, but we had to have an agreement, any agreement. Why? Domestic politics.

AGAIN, LET ME REPEAT that I expect foreign policy to be injected into politics, but not badly, stupidly. In 1966, for example, I urged President Johnson to make a speech from the Manila Conference just before the congressional elections. He gave me a kindly, sad look, observed that the Democrats were going to lose 40 seats in the House and that he didn't want this to appear as a repudiation of his Asian policy. He refused to set himself up, whereas Kissinger has almost developed the self-gambit into an art form.

Second, not only has he played bad politics with our foreign policy, then, but he has done it crudely. Maybe a diplomat is an honest man sent abroad to lie for his country, but he should do it—if he must—in such a fashion as not to be caught.

Does anybody at this time know precisely what Kissinger promised to whom in the Middle Eastern holding pattern? Just as we are told there are absolutely no secret codicils, half a dozen more turn up. These are dismissed, like Nixon's promise to Saigon, as "informal." Let's debate foreign policy but, for openers, let's find out what it is—except "Elect Ford."

Political Handicapping:

Track Record on Primaries Puts Press Among Also-rans

The following column—"Politics and People—An End to Prophecy"—appeared in the Wall Street Journal Mar. 18, 1976. Reprinted by permission of the Wall Street Journal. © Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All rights reserved.

By Alan L. Otten

MOST POLITICAL REPORTERS predicted that Jimmy Carter, gaining momentum from his earlier New Hampshire victory, would win the Massachusetts Democratic presidential primary. Mr. Carter came in fourth.

Most political reporters said George Wallace would convincingly win the Florida Democratic primary. Mr. Carter won that one.

After initially suggesting a solid Ronald Reagan victory in the Florida Republican primary, most political reporters spotted a surge in President Ford's strength, and by primary time, were forecasting a resounding Ford triumph. Mr. Ford's final 53-47 victory wasn't really all that resounding.

At the risk of being drummed out of the Political Pundits Union, I'd like to urge a tight rein on the press's proclivity to prediction—particularly in early primaries and particularly those with a crowded field. In these contests, winners can be hard to pick, as the recent track record indicates.

Vermont Royster wrote recently about the way politicians and reporters manage to explain away each primary result, however it turns out—much like stock analysts interpreting the market's daily ups and downs. At least in post-election analysis, though, analysts have real facts to go on: actual voting results in sample precincts, or interviews with voters leaving the polling places.

The political forecasting business is something else, however, and the pressure on the press, from readers and from editors, is insistent. How big will Jackson win New York? Who'll take the California primary in June? Won't the Democrats finally nominate Humphrey, after all? Who'll win the big one in November? You cover politics, don't you—how come you can't answer such simple questions?

Yet the unknowns are almost always enormous. The 1968 outlook changed abruptly when Robert Kennedy was killed. Early forecasts about 1972 were completely upset by Chappaquiddick, and later ones by the shooting of Mr. Wallace. In early 1973, a favorite political question was whether Spiro Agnew could be denied the GOP presidential nomination in 1976.

This year, again, great uncertainties remain, and possibilities for abrupt changes in outcome. California Gov. Edmund Brown's sudden decision last week to enter his state's Democratic primary has unexpectedly altered all bets on the way that one will go, and a dozen other last-minute developments could further revise the outlook for the two nominating conventions and the final election.

A few people may really need early answers to some of these questions. A few political activists may want to calculate which candidate to try to stop, or which bandwagon to jump aboard. A few businessmen might be helped to make an important decision if they knew just who would win in November. Most people, though, really won't suffer too much if they have to wait for the actual results. What's really at stake, after all, is the press's own credibility. That's shaky enough at best; how much more damage is done when its forecasts so regularly go sour?

Divination is always a tricky business, but never more so than during the primaries. A reporter who's just spent two weeks of his time and many hundreds of his newspaper's dollars covering a particular primary may find it embarrassing to confess he really doesn't know who's going to win, but that may be the only honest course. Polls and local politicians simply aren't reliable guides to primary outcomes.

For one thing, public opinion is especially fluid then. Surveys find masses of undecided voters, right up to the last moment. People are still either completely disinterested or are just beginning to look at the candidates. Early inclinations change easily; opinions aren't nearly as set as they are in October.

Turnout is another tremendous uncertainty in primary voting, far less predictable than in the November election. The candidate with the more activating issue or better organization does proportionately better in the spring than in the fall. Burns Roper of the Roper Organization points out still another problem: Budgets for pre-primary polls are much smaller than those for national election polls; the pollster's sample isn't nearly as large as it ought to be.

And then the predictions so greatly affect the way the actual outcome is interpreted. The candidate who gets fewer votes than the pollsters and press anticipated is judged to have done "surprisingly" poorly, and the candidate who does better than they forecast is reported to have done "surprisingly" well, even if he loses. George McGovern's five percentage point victory over Hubert Humphrey in the 1972 California primary came off almost as a loss because an earlier poll had predicted a 20 percentage point spread.

ALL THIS IS certainly not an argument against intensive press coverage of the primaries. If a candidate or his manager predicts a particular result, and he isn't too obviously trying to stack the deck, he should be quoted that way. Poll figures should be reported, as long as they're coupled with strong caveats about the undecided and fluid voters.

Of course the press must continue to look closely at what the candidates are saying on the issues, and how well they're bearing up under the campaign strain. It must scrutinize the strengths and weaknesses of each—who seems to be catching on and who is bombing out, who has an efficient organization and who has a lousy one, whose media campaign is strong and whose is weak.

But all this is still quite different from predicting winners or the order of finish or the specific percentages needed for a good showing. When a reporter's predictions go sour, he tends to get cautious for a week or two, but he's soon back at the old prediction stand.

Picking primary winners is about as scientific as picking winners at the race track. There's a certain amount of form to go on, and the 6 to 5 favorite may finish first one day, but the next time out he may be having an off-day and lose to a longshot. Race track regulars understand all this, but readers of political stories may not. The press should get out of the handicapping business.

Entire Industry Threatened:

Imports Sock Apparel Trades

UNCHECKED IMPORTS that convert substandard foreign wages and working conditions into fat profits for U.S. retailers could all but wipe out the nation's textile apparel industry, President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers warned on Labor News Conference.

Imports have slashed some 300,000 jobs from the apparel industry in the last three years, Finley said, stressing that "if imports were permitted to grow at the rate they are" now, as much as 80 percent of domestic production would be lost. He said that trade adjustment assistance to unemployed or underemployed workers who can demonstrate a heavy adverse impact of imports on their jobs is only stop-gap help.

"Basically, it supplements unemployment compensation," he noted, "but even if everyone got it, it wouldn't answer the problem of people and their jobs."

Finley said the so-called free trade doctrine the United States followed in the years immediately after World War II was a great benefit then, but "makes no sense at all" in the much different world of managed state economies, multinational corporations in 1976. He said the time is gone when "we were the dominant world economy, our factories and technologies were by far superior, all markets were open, we could get raw materials and sell our products."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM, a plan that has helped America's 10 million unemployed survive the recession, is under strong attack by the Ford Administration and conservative elements in Congress. The conflict is, in many ways, a microcosm of the larger liberal versus conservative battle under way in this presidential election year.

When Nixon/Ford economic policies drove the unemployment rate to a 30-year record high of 8.9 percent in May 1975, those policies were responsible for setting yet another record: food stamp enrollment, at 9.2 million when joblessness hovered around 5 percent in 1973, soared to 19.6 million in 1975, the highest point in its 10-year history. The program, despite often-charged but rarely substantiated allegations of recipient "rip-offs" and abuse, is obviously fulfilling a much-needed role.

Under today's Agriculture Dept. regulations, there is no maximum gross income level at which persons become ineligible for food stamps, so long as allowable deductions bring gross income within the range of net income eligibility—$570 a month for a family of four, or $6,840 a year. Welfare recipients are automatically eligible for the stamps.

Labor has argued for more generous eligibility standards but the Ford Administration wants the tide to flow in another direction.

While supporting weakening legislation in Congress the Administration also is traveling another road. President Ford is attempting again, as he did in 1975, to legislate by "administrative action," trying to put into force new regulations that would cut off 5.3 million persons entirely and reduce benefits for another 5 million.

The Agriculture Dept.'s administrative changes in the regulation of the food stamp program, according to the White House, are aimed at families with incomes between $8,000 and $10,000. Others, however, believe the cuts would go much deeper, affecting working families with incomes in the $6,000 to $8,000 range.

The plan faced an immediate challenge in Congress, and an ad hoc coalition of up to 100 labor, church, civil rights and other groups has joined in a suit to block adoption of the regulations. The new regulations are scheduled to take effect by June 1.

BUT EVEN IF the proposed cutbacks are headed off, food stamp supporters will still have to face the prospect of a battle on Capitol Hill. The Senate Agriculture Committee has approved a bill that contains many elements of two earlier pieces of anti-food stamp legislation proposed by the Administration and by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.) and Rep. Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.).

The committee bill would cut 3 to 4 million persons from the food stamp program and make another 3 to 4 million persons pay significantly more for the same amount of stamps they previously received.

The bill retains the requirement that a family buy a certain amount of food stamps to get its "bonus" stamps. A major complaint about the program is that participants have had to pony up cash—$100 to purchase $166 worth of stamps, for example—and that much cash is hard for a poor family to scrape together. A liberalized amendment to be offered would eliminate this "cash-on-the-line" requirement and would end food stamp vendor abuse in the program since no cash would ever enter any vendor's hands.

Another amendment would call for twice-yearly increases or decreases in two income-eligibility factors in keeping with the cost of living index. The government has traditionally used poverty line figures—the program's basic eligibility standard—that are more than a year old and the amendment would guarantee the use of regular, more up-to-date statistics.

Other liberalizing amendments would deal with attempts to modify limits on the amount of assets a food stamp applicant can have and still participate in the program, and an easing of the mountain of paperwork that would be called for in the committee bill.

LOW-WAGE IMPORTS flooding U.S. apparel markets are wiping out American jobs and jeopardizing the future of the American clothing industry, President Murray H. Finley, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Lloyd Schwartz of Fairchild Publications and Sara Fritz of United Press International. The program is aired Tuesday on Mutual radio.

NATIONWIDE CAMPAIGN promoting the union label of the Ladies' Garment Workers features the appearance of ILGWU members in prime time television commercials and supporting advertisements in the print media. Before the TV camera for a taping session above are Lillian Armour, left, of Local 223, Waterbury, Conn., and Emma Danko, Local 225, Hazelton, Pa.

ILGWU Ad Campaign Spreads Union's Message Across Nation

New York—On Mar. 29, television sets in millions of American homes will be tuned to the Academy Awards. At several intervals during the ceremonies, the home audience—one of the biggest for any single show—will hear members of the Ladies' Garment Workers talking about the meaning of their union.

Sponsorship of another awards show on Apr. 18—the Tony Awards—will conclude the union's "rookie" season as a sponsor of television specials, including the Flip Wilson show, the Waltons Christmas special, Jackie Gleason's Anniversary Honeymooners, and Lola Falana.

It's all part of a massive promotional effort by the ILGWU, to spread its message into the homes of American workers and consumers. The cost? About $2 million, of which close to $1.5 million will have been spent on television and radio and the balance on print media and subway and bus ads.

Was it worth the money? ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin says yes. "Judging by every means available at this stage of the game to determine impact," he said, "we feel that the promotional campaign more than justifies itself." He adds that the union will have a professional poll taken on the campaign's results and will most likely continue the effort next year.

The three one-minute TV spots used so far have already captured the attention of the country as evidenced by a steady stream of phone calls and letters to ILGWU offices seeking the words and lyrics to the catchy tune, "Look for the Union Label."

Comments from media professionals have been favorable, and among trade unionists the campaign has had a deep impact, Chaikin reports.

The ILGWU feels that part of the advertisements' appeal is that they are simple and direct. Most important, however, is that the messages are delivered by people who know what they're talking about—members of the union.

Executive Vice President Wilbur Daniels, who is in charge of the campaign, feels that this has been the key element in solving the problems unique to a trade union project that is selling no product and, in effect, is an appeal to the consumer's conscience.

The campaign has three purposes. Initially, it seeks to create a clear and sympathetic image of ILGWU members: that they work hard for modest incomes; that most of the women are homemakers with families to care for; and that they are not a mobile labor force, so if they don't work in garment shops, they're likely not to work at all.

Once that's accomplished, the ILGWU hopes to persuade women to buy apparel with the union label by pointing out that the label is the shield protecting the real union members who are speaking to them.

For the future, the union feels that it is building a reservoir of good will to be tapped when needed in such campaigns as the effort to win repeal of Item 807 of the tariff schedules. This loophole allows millions of dollars worth of apparel to re-enter this country at a very low tariff rate because the goods were styled and cut in the United States before shipment abroad for production.

Although the television ads are the expensive component, the union's campaign is really a multimedia drive, with the audio portion of the messages broadcast throughout the day over radio stations in New York City. This serves to reinforce the once-monthly TV exposure, as do the ads run in major and specialized newspapers.

The ILGWU is considering extending the radio spots to other major cities, as well as the bus and subway ads that appear around holiday shopping time. Rounding out the campaign are the ads in specialized magazines, including Ms., Ebony and the Sunday Times fashion supplement, plus specific messages geared to the trade and labor press.

Paula Green of the Green-Dolmatch Agency, which produces the ads, feel that the ILGWU messages have unique color and pace because of the use of actual members. "Without a doubt," she said, "the use of people from the shops gives meaning to the messages because the viewer cares about them."

Labor Backs Bill to Control Strip Mining

A new strip mining bill approved by the House Interior Committee is strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

The bill is a modified version of legislation that President Ford vetoed last year. It would set environmental standards for surface mining of coal. Mining companies would be required to reclaim all stripped land and pay a 35-cents-a-ton fee on strip-mined coal to finance reclamation of strip-mined areas previously abandoned.

In a letter sent to all House members, Biemiller charged the Administration used "fabricated statistics and misleading economic assumptions" to justify Ford's veto of the earlier bill. The President claimed the legislation would curtail needed coal production and cost jobs.

The House last June fell three votes short of the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto. The new bill includes some compromise provisions, such as a stretchout of the time allowed for compliance and eased restrictions on riverbed impact in the western states, which sponsors hope will bring added support.

Biemiller termed the new measure "a sound step forward." He predicted that experience with its implementation will lead to "further strengthening and improvements."

College Faculties Back Unionism

More than two-thirds of college faculty members favor unionism, according to a survey conducted by Dr. Seymour Lipset of Stanford University and Dr. Everett Ladd, Jr., of the University of Connecticut.

They polled 3,000 randomly-selected faculty members across the nation and found support for collective bargaining on the campus had risen to 69 percent, up from 66 percent in 1973 and 60 percent in 1969.

If a bargaining election were held on their campus, 81 percent of the faculty would vote for a union at two-year colleges, 75 percent at four-year colleges, and 61 percent at universities.

Wage Controls Denounced:

Labor Protests Fail To Budge Trudeau

Ottawa—Trade unionists from across Canada massed on Parliament Hill to denounce the federal government's anti-inflation program. But Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said there will be no lessening of wage controls.

"Our position is firm," he told a delegation of 300 union leaders, who on Mar. 22 presented the Canadian Labor Congress's annual memorandum to his cabinet while 25,000 demonstrators marched outside. Parliament Hill security guards described it as the biggest demonstration there since the depression thirties.

It coincided with similar demonstrations and walkouts from coast-to-coast. In Quebec province alone, a million school children had the day off as their teachers walked off the job to oppose wage controls. And in the capital cities of every province, the provincial federations of labor presented the CLC memorandum to the provincial governments.

The Trudeau government's anti-inflation law was passed last October, pushed through Parliament by the governing Liberal Party's majority in both the House of Commons and the Senate.

It sets a limit of 8 to 10 percent on most wage settlements in the first year, with lower limits in the second and third years. Inflation had been running at 10 to 12 percent in recent years, and unions had just started to negotiate catch-up increases.

CLC President Joseph Morris, who led the leadership delegation, pointed out to the government that in its first six months the program has produced "a steady stream of decisions reducing wages agreed to in collective bargaining."

The law was also supposed to control some domestic prices but, Morris added, "as far as we know it has yet to produce a single decision rolling back a price increase."

The memorandum said the government is destroying social, economic and political freedoms and taking the initial steps "to transform a free society into an authoritarian state."

It described the anti-inflation program as "unparalleled in its callous and brutal treatment" of workers.

Prime Minister Trudeau was obviously unmoved. He said the government has no intention of asking Parliament to repeal the law. Inflation has reached "crisis" proportions and sacrifice is necessary, he insisted.

The CLC brief said the program "makes a mockery" of the idea of sacrifice, "for we fail to find adequate controls on dividends, interest rates, professional fees and land speculators."

Morris, in an address to the demonstrators after the presentation of the memorandum, said the Canadian labor movement "is in the battle for its life."

"It has been forced by the actions of the Trudeau government to become a political movement rather than primarily an economic organization," he said.

Wurf Assails Court Ruling On Residency

A Supreme Court's decision upholding the right of a municipality to require city workers to live within its boundaries is "discriminatory and impractical," President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees declared.

"Can you imagine the outcry if private employers were given the power to order their employes to live in certain areas?" Wurf asked.

The high court upheld the firing of a Philadelphia fire fighter who moved to New Jersey, rejecting his claim that his constitutional right to travel had been impaired. The decision did not deal with the wisdom or desirability of a residence requirement, which public employe unions have fought in many cities, but only with its constitutionality.

Wurf said he sympathized with municipalities which believe their employes should live in the jurisdiction in which they work but "from an economic standpoint such a policy is impractical" because of today's housing market.

Retroactive Seniority Awarded Bias Victims issues" when workers must compete for "too few jobs in a recessionary economy."

He said the court had arrived at "an appropriate resolution of those claims" in the case that was before it. But, he stressed, the only "wholly satisfactory answer" is to create enough jobs in the economy so that everyone can be employed.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., wrote the majority opinion, joined by Justices Potter Stewart, Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall and Harry A. Blackmum.

Brennan held that the grant of retroactive seniority was fully in accord with the section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act that allows federal courts to take "appropriate" action to remedy discrimination, "which may include, but is not limited to, reinstatement or hiring of employes, with or without back pay . . . or any other relief as the court deems appropriate."

To provide remedies short of back seniority, he contended, would leave the victim of discrimination still at a disadvantage.

Partially dissenting opinions, by Justices Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and William H. Rehnquist, and by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, found the majority opinion too sweeping.

Powell saw justification for "benefit-type" seniority grants, such as the right to a longer vacation or other prerogatives of service. But he said the case should have been sent back to a lower court to consider whether retroactivity in seniority for layoff purposes was the most equitable solution for all parties affected.

Burger agreed generally with that position and suggested the possibility of a monetary award as a substitute for "competitive-type seniority relief."

The court's newest member, Justice John Paul Stevens, did not participate.

Kirkland Stresses Energy Independence:

Nuclear Power Held Vital To U.S. Economic Needs

and what the states are doing about nuclear-energy development.

In a panel discussion on the nuclear-energy safety question, scientists Norman Rasmussen of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Bernard Cohen of the University of Pittsburgh stressed that the risks to workers and the public from potential accidents in nuclear-power plants are very small. Only Dr. James McKenzie, a member of the Union of Concerned Scientists, in a highly technical argument held that nuclear energy might be unsafe.

Rasmussen recently directed a study for the Atomic Energy Commission that found that the likelihood of being killed in any one year in a reactor accident is one chance in 300 million while the likelihood of being injured is one in 150 million.

The study judged the likelihood of a core melt accident as one in 17,000 per reactor per year. "With 100 reactors operating, as is anticipated for the U.S. by 1980," the Rasmussen study observed, "this means that one such accident would occur, on the average, every one and three-quarter centuries."

Conference Chairman Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers, noted in his opening remarks that if the U.S. can get 200 nuclear-generating stations on line by 1985 it will reduce the nation's oil requirements by six million barrels per day.

"That's just about the quantity of oil we're importing now," he said, "so you can see the importance of expanding our use of nuclear energy as rapidly as possible."

IUD President I. W. Abel, discussing the fundamental role of energy in the country's economic life, noted that an ample supply of energy is essential to production. Production is essential for jobs, "and without jobs our country would be in chaos and ruin," he added.

Organized labor is committed to a policy and program to serve that objective, Abel declared.

"If we're going to have full employment we're going to need 3 percent annual growth in energy," President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers observed. "Unless we have nuclear energy we're not going to have 3 percent growth in energy."

Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, charged that anti-nuclear advocates are essentially anti-growth or slow-growth proponents.

"That means jobs will not increase, and in some industries there'd be layoffs" if these critics of nuclear power got their way, he said. "Moreover, prices would rise and some sharply."

While conservation represents "one small answer" to the nation's energy scarcity problem, it will not alone solve the crisis, Goldfinger said. There still will be the need for increased energy in the next 15 to 25 years because of greater consumption.

He cited recent Bureau of Mines estimates showing that the use of coal will rise from its present 18 percent of total energy supplies to 21 percent by the turn of the century, and noted that coal in itself is not the answer to the problem.

Nuclear power will have to supply a large part of the rest of the country's total energy needs, Goldfinger said. According to the Bureau of Mines, nuclear power is expected to rise from less than 2 percent at present to about 28 percent by the year 2000, "a spectacular increase," he observed.

This could generate about 1.5 million jobs in construction, manufacturing, transportation, warehousing and distribution, Goldfinger said.

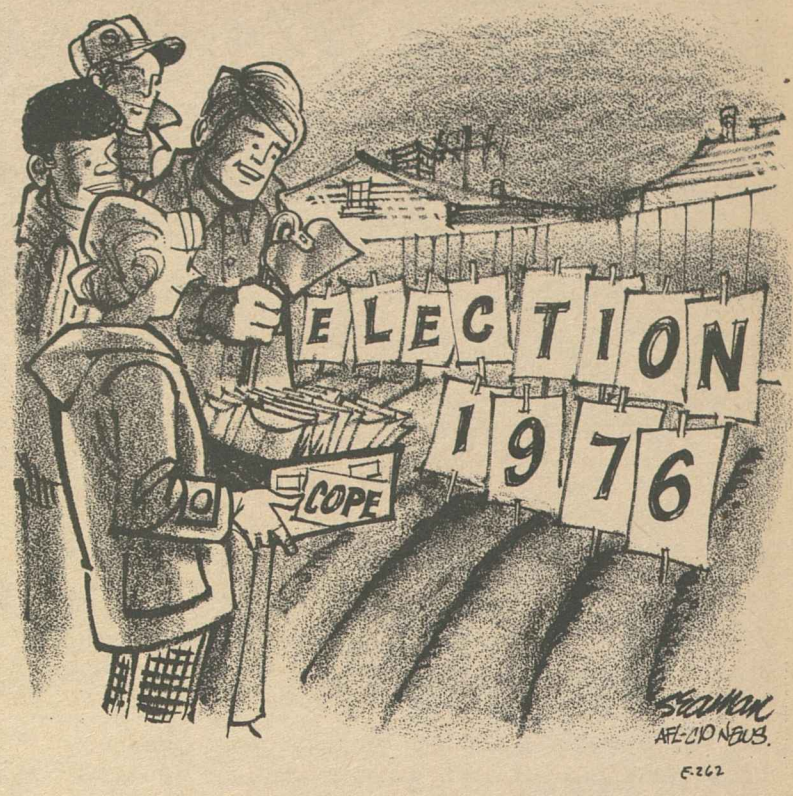
"If you pull the plug on nuclear energy, you're just pulling the plug on the whole economy," he said. Unless the nation moves ahead rapidly to develop nuclear power "we'll all be in trouble" regarding employment, buying power, living standards and "our whole way of life," Goldfinger said.

IUD Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman, reporting on efforts to halt nuclear-energy development, said a series of initiative petitions in 16 states seeks to impose "onerous restraints" on both existing and proposed nuclear facilities.

He warned that if California's Proposition 15 to impose a moratorium on nuclear-energy development is approved by voters on June 8 "state after state, caught in emotionalism, will follow suit."

"It is a reaction to what I believe is an hysteria," Clayman said. "It is almost a popular fashion to be for the elimination of nuclear energy."

The effect of the various state-proposed restrictions on nuclear power would be to raise the cost of electricity, Prof. Walter Meyer of the University of Missouri warned. This would hurt consumers and workers and produce a ripple effect throughout the economy that would raise the price of all goods and services, he said.



Rep. Mike McCormack (D-Wash.) said there is neither moral nor intellectual justification for the current obsession with hypothetical hazards of nuclear energy.

"The campaign to undermine nuclear energy is, in effect, a campaign to cause additional unemployment," declared McCormack, who heads a House subcommittee on energy research as well as two subcommittees of the congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

"Cutting back on nuclear-energy production will mean increased unemployment among American workers, not only those involved in the construction of the nuclear plants themselves, but, far more important, those involved in permanent industries which will require the energy produced," he said.

The chance that a person will be killed from a nuclear accident in a nuclear-power plant in 1980 when the U.S. is expected to have 100 plants on line is about one in five billion, or the chance of being struck by a meteor, McCormack said.

The Best Seed

North Carolina Upset Keeps Reagan In Race

Conservative Republican challenger Ronald Reagan brought the 1976 presidential primary season its first upset when he captured 52 percent of the vote in North Carolina.

President Gerald Ford appeared to be on the brink of eliminating the former California governor before the North Carolina race netted Ford only 46 percent of the vote and 25 delegates to Reagan's 28. Reagan had lost five in a row to Ford, including a particularly damaging loss in the Reagan target state of Florida two weeks before.

Former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter continued his string of primary victories in the Democratic voting in North Carolina, topping Alabama Gov. George Wallace 54 percent to 35 percent.

Carter has now won five of the first six primaries and heads into the critical Apr. 6 elections in Wisconsin and New York far ahead of the field. His 167 delegate total is followed by 134 "uncommitted" in second place.

In North Carolina, Carter picked up 36 delegates to 25 for Wallace as all 61 were decided by the primary.

Arizona Rep. Morris Udall, Washington Sen. Henry Jackson and former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris were also on the ballot in North Carolina, but none put on a real campaign there. None won any delegates and Jackson was the only one with as much as 4 percent of the vote.

Both Udall and Jackson will be competing in Wisconsin and New York on Apr. 6, however.

Both Apr. 6 primaries have undergone late rule changes.

The Democrats' compliance review commission voted to let Wisconsin use its primary results to select delegates, even though the "open" format allows crossover votes from the other party. Thus the resurgence of Reagan, if it keeps Wisconsin Republicans interested in their own race, may have a bearing on the Democratic results.

In New York, no votes are cast for presidential candidates, but an 11th hour change by the state legislature will allow their names to be listed behind that of the delegates pledged to them.

Harris plans a full effort in the Apr. 27 primary in Pennsylvania, now billed as a "showdown," presuming the Wisconsin and New York results are mixed.

Neither the Ford nor Reagan camp offered an immediate analysis of the reversal of form in North Carolina. The results in both parties show it to be a very conservative state, with Reagan getting 101,448 votes for his 52 percent and Wallace 210,000 for his 35 percent in a losing cause.

Carter's victory in North Carolina was his third straight in head-to-head competition with Wallace, and the second in the South. After 12 years as a solid force in Democratic Party affairs, always in the South and often elsewhere, Wallace was left with a campaign in disarray.

Carter's lead in delegates is reckoned in different ways since the caucuses in Oklahoma, Iowa, South Carolina and Maine are in different stages of development — and Carter is a major factor in all of them.

In Oklahoma, for instance, 24 delegates are currently counted as uncommitted, but the leader of those slates, Gov. David Boren, has endorsed Carter since the Feb. 7 precinct caucuses. At this point, 20 percent of the Democratic convention delegates have been chosen.

April Schedule for Labor Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will conduct six institutes during April, four at the Silver Spring, Md., campus and three at other locations. Two international unions will use the campus for staff training. The schedule:

Negotiated Pensions—An institute for union officers and representatives who negotiate pensions and insurance plans and for labor trustees of pension and insurance funds. Topics include analysis and interpretation of fund reports, investment of trust funds, requirements of the new Federal Pension law. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 4, through Thursday, Apr. 8.

Civil Rights—An institute co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. for union civil rights representatives. Topics include minority participation in trade unions and in society, affirmative action programs, equal employment opportunity for women and minority groups, Equal Pay Act and government policies related to employment and civil rights. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 11, to Thursday, Apr. 15.

Teachers—A program conducted by the American Federation of Teachers for staff training on political education, Tuesday, Apr. 13.

Education Techniques—An institute for union officers, field staff, union educators and others whose duties include setting up education conferences for stewards, local union leaders, local committees and active women, etc. From 4 p.m. Tuesday, Apr. 20, to Friday, Apr. 23.

Railroaders—An institute for United Transportation Union general chairmen. Topics include claim and grievance processing, preparation and presentation of board cases, pre-hearing analysis writing, mock board cases, economics of the railroad industry, legal problems, group process, UTU legislative and poltical activities and newsletter writing. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 25, to Friday, May 7.

The off-campus institutes for April are:

Collective Bargaining Techniques—An institute for union officers and staff representatives who negotiate with management. Topics include preparing for bargaining, membership attitudes, analysis of key contract clauses and a review of new contract benefits. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 4, to Friday, Apr. 9, at the University of California, Berkeley.

Occupational Health & Industrial Hygiene—An institute for union leaders who train and work with local union safety committees. Topics include occupational health problems, OSHA, recognition and handling of health hazards, using noise measurement equipment, protective devices and bargaining on health issues. From 9 a.m., Monday, Apr. 19, to Friday, Apr. 23, at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

Employment Testing—An institute for union representatives in industries where personnel testing is a problem. Topics include procedures for dealing with testing programs, evaluating tests, systems analysis of testing, union experience in testing, union approaches to testing problems, equal employment opportunity and testing bargaining on selection and promotion, and alternatives to testing. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 25, to Thursday, Apr. 29, at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

More information on these and other institutes may be obtained from Fred Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Phone 301/431-6400.

More Vetoes Threatened:

Labor-Backed Bills Advance in Congress

Three labor-supported bills advanced in Congress despite Administration sniping and warnings of presidential vetoes.

The first showdown will come on a child day care center bill the Administration tried unsuccessfully to sidetrack. But the House voted 317-72 final approval and the Senate followed with a 59-30 vote.

The legislation would give an extra $125 million to the states, to be used to help day care centers that serve children of low-income working parents meet new federal staffing standards. It would encourage the hiring of welfare mothers as aides at day care centers, thus combining useful employment with needed adult supervision for the children.

A 1974 law required the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to set federal standards that the day care centers must meet, but HEW said it will recommend that the President veto the funding bill.

A more certain candidate for veto is a House-Senate conference agreement on revisions of the Hatch Act that would allow federal workers to participate more actively in the political life of the nation.

Dropped from the final version was a Senate-passed "rider," unrelated to the rest of the bill, that would have allowed Congress to vote to give federal workers their full "comparability" pay raises without automatically boosting the salaries of House and Senate members.

Awaiting Senate action is a House-passed bill that would allow states to sue companies that violate antitrust laws on behalf of all of the people who have been overcharged or otherwise harmed by the illegal actions. When it would be impractical to reimburse each individual affected, the money collected would be used for the common good in some related way. Triple damages would be collected where a violation was found "willful" and actual damages otherwise.

The Administration originally had supported the bill. But when powerful business organizations launched a campaign against the legislation, President Ford decided the bill was "too broad" and he couldn't support it.

During the debate, Republicans replied to Democratic taunts about Ford's latest cave-in to business pressure by asserting that the Justice Dept. support for the bill represented only the views of some "faceless bureaucrat."

But in fact, the support had been expressed at congressional hearings by the assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, a presidential appointee.

On the key vote, the House rejected a Republican motion to send the bill back to the Judiciary Committee. The vote was 223-150.

COMMON POSITIONS on issues to come before the 1976 conference of the International Labor Organization opening in June are discussed by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Labor Minister Benny Berg of Luxembourg at federation headquarters.

Union Delegates Press ILO on Human Rights

Geneva—Trade union members of the International Labor Organization's Governing Body called on the ILO to assign top priority to the defense of human rights throughout the 128-nation agency's programs.

Reviewing the ILO's long-term program planning, the workers stressed that it is the ILO's duty to insure that human rights are not sacrificed to economic development.

The Governing Body, an executive council of 56 worker, employer and government representatives, tackled head-on a specific human rights issue by charting plans to impose sanctions against the ruling Ethiopian military regime.

Visibly angered by the failure of the Ethiopian rulers to respond to ILO requests for information on the fate of Beyene Solomon, arrested president of the Ethiopian Trade Union Confederation, Joseph Morris, president of the Canadian Labor Congress, threatened to seek "termination" of the ILO's relations with Ethiopia.

A deputy worker delegate on the Governing Body, Solomon has been imprisoned since September 1974 without ever having been brought to trial. No explanation has been given for his detention.

"If we can not do anything for our own people," Morris told the executive group on behalf of its worker members, "then we can not do anything for anyone."

Irving Brown, the AFL-CIO European representative who serves as U.S. worker delegate, seconded Morris by saying such "drastic action" as the halting of all aid by the ILO and its member states to Ethiopia might have to be sought if the Ethiopian government failed to respond satisfactorily.

The Governing Body directed ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard to make one more attempt to get Ethiopia to face up to its responsibilities as an ILO member state before returning to the issue at its May meeting.

In discussions on ILO programs, the workers also stressed the importance of reinforcing the "tripartite" basis that sets the ILO apart from all other international organizaions. This is the ILO founding principle that brings trade union and employer representatives into all the agency's bodies with full rights along with the governments of member states.

The Governing Body simply noted a factual preliminary report by the director general on a study of working conditions in the Arab territories occupied by Israel since the 1967 war while awaiting a peace settlement. The study was triggered under ILO rules when the 1974 assembly of member states adopted an Arab-inspired resolution accusing Israel of discrimination against Arab workers.

The refusal of the ILO official to draw anti-Israeli conclusions before completing his study had provoked the ire of some Arab delegates. This brought a sharp warning from Brown that any attempt to pass judgment on Israel before the ILO fact-finding machinery had followed its normal course would cause a "crisis not in the Middle East, but right here in the ILO."

Chemical Test Proposal Gets Full Support

Chemicals should be tested in laboratories, not on workers and the public, the AFL-CIO said in a strong endorsement of a Toxic Substances Control bill the Senate will soon take up.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged all senators to support the legislation drawn up by the Senate Commerce Committee and "oppose any crippling amendments."

The bill would require the Environmental Protection Agency to assure that new chemicals are pretested and would set up a priority for testing chemicals now in use that are suspected of being hazardous to human health or the environment.

Biemiller termed the legislation "far overdue." He cited the "horrors" to workers and the environment caused by such substances as vinyl chloride, kepone, mercury and lead PCB's.

"It is high time that chemicals and not people should be put to the test," Biemiller said.

He said the labor movement feels so strongly about the legislation "because workers too long have been treated as human guinea pigs" and "called upon to pay for a job with their lives or their health."

More than 100,000 workers die each year from occupational illnesses, Biemiller said, based on an estimate by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. He said it is not asking too much of the chemical industry to commit less than 1 percent of its gross income to testing intended to bring down that toll.

Pension Guide Outlines Role Of Trustees

An interpretive bulletin outlining fiduciary responsibility under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 has been issued by the Labor Dept., and is now available to union members and officials who are trustees of pension funds.

Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, suggests that the booklet will be of special interest to union pension trustees since "there is considerable confusion as to who is a fiduciary and particularly to what extent they are liable for the actions of other fiduciaries" under ERISA.

Under ERISA, trustees of pension and health and welfare plans are required to meet new and strict standards of conduct in the administration of such plans.

They must perform their duties solely in the interest of the plan participants and "with the care, skill, prudence and diligence under the circumstances then prevailing that a prudent man acting in a like capacity and familiar with such matters would use."

Thus, under the law, "a fiduciary could be held liable for losses caused by other fiduciaries not only if he knowingly participated in or condoned their action but simply if he were not 'prudent' in his duties as a fiduciary," Smedley points out.

Copies of the new bulletin may be obtained by writing the Office of Employee Benefits Security, Labor-Management Services Administration, Labor Dept., P.O. Box 176, Washington, D.C. 20044.

Senate Approves Compromise To Revive Federal Election Panel

by Congress. And the White House indicated Ford was prepared to veto any bill that went beyond that.

After two weeks of Senate debates that included a series of close votes and adoption of amendments that displeased many senators on both sides of the political aisle, leaders of both parties worked behind the scenes to shape a compromise that was the framework for the bill the Senate finally passed.

It had more pluses than minuses, from labor's viewpoint. Thus, it significantly modified the controversial opinion of the present Election Commission which would give employers a free hand to solicit political funds from their workers and even collect the money through a checkoff.

Under the Senate bill, companies that set up political funds would be free to solicit their stockholders, management officials and supervisors. Unions, of course, could continue to seek voluntary political contributions from their members.

The bill would allow a company to send up to two political fund solicitations a year by mail to the homes of its employes. But to avoid any suggestion of pressure, any money collected would have to be under conditions that make it impossible for the employer to know the names of the workers who contributed. A union, in turn, could if it wished make a similar mail solicitation of workers not in the bargaining unit, stockholders or supervisors.

One section of the compromise bill imposes a complex disclosure requirement on organizations that take political positions, although not to the burdensome extent that would have been required by an amendment the Senate had earlier added to the original bill.

As originally adopted, it would have required companies and all membership organizations, including unions, to disclose the amount spent on internal communications to members that involve political endorsements. This could have involved intricate breakdowns of costs of regular communications such as newsletters and posed a real threat of discouraging political action to avoid a technical violation of the law.

The less drastic but still cumbersome version finally adopted would apply only to expenditures over $1,000.

Included in the bill is a "nonproliferation" restriction on political fund-dispersing committees. Thus, a company with 50 plants could only hand out funds through a single political committee, subject to the limit of $5,000 to any candidate or multi-candidate committee. A union likewise could not set up separate committees in each of its locals but would have to make its donations from a single political committee.

The Senate bill contains a provision intended to limit matching funds in primary elections to persons making a realistic bid for a party's presidential nomination. It would deny any federal funds to a candidate who failed to poll at least 10 percent of the vote in the first two primaries in which he or she participated. The intent was to prevent organizations promoting causes from running a candidate in a party primary in order to tap the federal campaign fund.

The Senate bill would also modify a portion of the Supreme Court decision that voided previous legal restrictions on the amount a presidential candidate could spend out of his own pocket.

The bill limits personal expenditures to $50,000 for those candidates who accept federal funds. A candidate who waived federal funds would not be limited. The court had indicated that such a distinction would be valid.

The bill would expand the present bipartisan six-member commission to eight by adding two seats for political independents. And it would set up a study of the presidential nominating system to develop recommendations on creating a uniform procedure to replace the present combination of primaries, party caucuses and state conventions.

The House is expected to take up the bill under a rule limiting the number of amendments that can be proposed.

Labor Spurs All-Out Fight To Save Food Stamp Plan

Election Act Bolstered By House

By David L. Perlman

The House defeated all anti-union amendments and passed, 241-155, a bill to revive the Federal Election Commission and rewrite some of the ground rules governing the financing of political campaigns.

A congressional conference committee now faces the job of resolving differences with a Senate-passed bill, a necessary prelude to final passage by Congress and a presidential decision on whether to sign or veto the measure.

Both the House and Senate versions reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as an Executive Branch agency. That non-controversial section of the bill is in accord with a Supreme Court decision that only a presidentially-appointed body can exercise all the powers Congress delegated to the commission — including disbursing tax funds for presidential campaigns.

The House bill nullifies and the Senate bill alters substantially an opinion by the election commission that corporations could solicit rank-and-file workers for a management-controlled political fund, and even set up a checkoff to collect the money.

Under the House bill, an employer would be flatly barred from soliciting political funds from rank-and-file workers. The Senate bill would allow twice-a-year mail solicitations under procedures that guarantee that any contributions are anonymous. Unions would have similar rights to solicit stockholders, management or others not in the bargaining unit.

Protection of workers against being dunned for political contributions by their employers was a major issue to the labor movement and a key vote in the House came on a Republican-sponsored motion to merely reconstitute the election commission in line with the Supreme Court decision. It would have left intact the pro-management solicitation rule.

The House voted 246-153 against that motion.

Another key vote from labor's standpoint came on the issue of a union's right to communicate with its own members without the chilling effect of an intricate reporting requirement whenever a union newspaper, letter or meeting notice could be construed as aiding a candidate for federal office.

Republicans in both the House and Senate had sought to impose such a "disclosure" rule, even

16,000 Gain In Las Vegas Settlements

Las Vegas, Nev.—A two-week strike against 15 casinos on the Las Vegas strip ended with tentative agreements reached with two unions and continued negotiations on non-economic issues with a third.

The settlement, carrying wage increases estimated at 35 percent over four years, has been ratified by the Musicians, recommended for ratification to an Apr. 7 vote of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees, and rejected by members of the Theatrical Stage Employes on non-wage matters. However the stagehands' union authorized its members to return to work if they are recalled as the casinos reopen while further talks are under way.

Eastland Bill Criticized:

Strict Curbs Sought On Hiring of Aliens

An immigration bill being considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee would curtail jobs for American workers and "seriously undermine" wages and working conditions, the AFL-CIO testified.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the immigration law should be strengthened by penalizing employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens — often at substandard wages and working conditions. Such a bill was approved last fall by the House Judiciary Committee but hasn't yet been scheduled for floor action.

By contrast, Biemiller said, a bill introduced by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) would open the door to further abuses. It would make it easier for employers to bring in aliens for both farm and non-farm jobs for which, supposedly, there is a shortage of domestic workers at the prevailing wage scales.

Biemiller told the Senate committee that this would be a big step toward reconstituting the "bracero" program that Congress killed in 1962. Until then, employers were able to contract to bring workers from Mexico for peak-season work under conditions that perpetuated low wages.

Biemiller suggested that the Eastland bill's backdoor bracero program would be "even more dangerous than the old one as a result of the lack of standards and controls to protect the workers."

The AFL-CIO testimony particularly objected to a proposal to allow aliens to come to the United States to work temporarily at jobs that are permanent in nature.

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO "strongly agrees" with the Labor Dept. position that an alien admitted temporarily to the United States should not be used in a permanent job.

Such a worker, Biemiller noted, would be "wholly at the mercy of his employer. If he joins a union or objects to his wages or working conditions he may be sent back to his own country on the slightest pretext."

But Biemiller objected to a Labor Dept. proposal to change a provision of the present immigra-

Meany Hits Cutback By Regulation

Food stamps are "the only alternatives to hunger" for millions of Americans, the AFL-CIO declared in a three-front defense of the program against Administration and congressional attacks.

AFL-CIO President George Meany called on the Agriculture Dept. to withdraw proposed new regulations that would curtail food stamp benefits for an estimated 11 million persons. About half of them would be dropped from the program entirely.

Meany also strongly protested the department's plan to toughen a present requirement that persons able to work must take any suitable job that is available. Present regulations exclude hazardous jobs, allow a worker to refuse a job paying less than $1.30 an hour, or one that would require him to quit or refuse to join a union.

He termed the attempt to repeal these modest safeguards "a blatant attack on the labor movement." The attempt to change the program through regulations is "particularly untimely," Meany said, because Congress is in the midst of acting on food stamp legislation.

Meany served notice that "the AFL-CIO is committed to an all-out fight to save the food stamp program" for the "millions of poor, unemployed and other low-income American workers who must have food stamps to feed their families."

Critical Needs for Health Security Documented at Regional Hearings

The nation's critical need for a comprehensive federal health care program was made clear at regional congressional hearings in Chicago and San Francisco, the first of two of a scheduled series.

Witnesses testifying for workers, older citizens and the needy before the Health subcommittee of the House Ways & Means Committee called for prompt passage of the labor-endorsed National Health Security bill.

More Americans could receive far superior care under a federally administered program in addition to cutting $20 billion from the nation's overall health care bill annually, the panel was told.

President Thomas F. Miechur of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers testified in Chicago that workers who are now covered by union-negotiated health plans need the additional protection of Health Security.

Miechur told the panel chaired by Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) that the negotiated health plans are of little use to workers who have lost their jobs.

"With the current depression in the building industry, many workers with even 10 or 12 years seniority have been laid off and have lost their hospitalization protection," he noted. "It is the rare family that can pay out of its pocket some $100 a month for health insurance out of its unemployment compensation benefits."

Miechur said that even under some of the better health insurance plans working union members have, the coverage is often inadequate for many medical situations. He cited the additional payments for services that are only partially covered by the plans or not provided at all.

Hatch Act Reforms Face Veto by Ford

Congress gave final approval to a labor-supported bill that would lift most of the Hatch Act's restrictions on political rights of federal workers. But the margin in both the House and Senate was less than the two-thirds that would be needed to override an expected presidential veto.

The bill passed by Congress would continue to protect government employes from political arm-twisting by their superiors or the administration in power. But it would allow them, on their own time and away from government offices, to campaign and otherwise support candidates.

Under the Hatch Act, passed in 1939 to insulate government workers from political pressure, federal BACKPAY SETTLEMENT totalling $1.6 million that the Ladies' Garment Workers won for 784 employes at the Kellwood Co. plant at Little Rock, Ark., brings joy to union members who will share in the record NLRB award. Joining in the jubilation is ILGWU Vice President Frederick R. Siems, director of the union's central states region.

ILGWU Wins Back Pay For 800 Firing Victims

Nearly 800 members of the Ladies' Garment Workers will share in a $1.6 million backpay settlement from Kellwood Co. for illegal firings during a 13-month strike in the mid-1960s.

The settlement, approved unanimously by the five-member National Labor Relations Board, is one of the largest in NLRB history.

The ILGWU has been pressing the case against Kellwood's Ottenheimer Division of Little Rock, Ark., for the past decade. Kellwood must make a full payment of $1.5 million to 753 employes within 120 days. The company must also pay an additional $100,000 to 31 other persons who had not been located or who have undetermined amounts due in the settlement.

ILGWU Vice President Frederick R. Siems, director of the union's central states region, said that the settlement represents a "final and complete victory for the union."

The long-running dispute between ILGWU Local 589 and Kellwood began during a 1965 organizing drive that was marked by a vicious anti-union campaign and harassment of union supporters by Kellwood, Siems recalled.

After a majority of the workers at the Little Rock plant voted for ILGWU representation, negotiations got under way for a contract. But little progress was made during 50 meetings between union and company representatives. The negotiations collapsed when management negotiators walked out.

The strike began in October 1966 when Kellwood refused to continue negotiations. After 13 months on the picket lines, members of the local voted to end the strike in November 1967 and asked to be rehired with full rights and privileges. The company refused to comply.

An NLRB trial judge in 1969 found the company guilty of unfair labor practices for its pre-strike anti-union conduct and its failure to bargain in good faith. Kellwood was directed to resume negotiations with the ILGWU and to rehire the strikers with backpay.

The decision was upheld by the NLRB, the U.S. Court of Appeals, and finally by the Supreme Court in 1971.

The company has since rehired all but 19 of the strikers and, as a part of the settlement, has agreed to rehire 16 of the remaining 19.

Residency Ruling By Court Assailed

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. expressed alarm over the Supreme Court's recent decision upholding the right of a municipality to require city workers to live within its boundaries.

PED President William H. McClennan, charging that the ruling amounts to "economic blackmail" over the lives of workers, declared that the history of the Supreme Court shows it is not infallible.

"As evidenced by decisions in recent months," he said, "we detect a dangerous trend by the court aimed at severely limiting personal freedom and privacy."

Kirkland Stresses Need For Positive Leadership

New York—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland called for restoration of positive national leadership capable of dealing with domestic and world problems. "Big issues need big answers," Kirkland declared at a dinner sponsored by the Social Democrats, USA, at which he received the annual Eugene V. Debs award.

Kirkland was cited for his "total commitment to the cause of working Americans and devotion to the ideals of freedom and democracy." The presentation was made by President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers who called Kirkland "a man of high purpose, great talent and dedication in the Debs tradition."

Kirkland specified health care and energy among domestic issues on which the nation has failed to make necessary commitments of effort and resources.

"Great problems will not yield to small programs," he told the audience of about 750 labor, civil rights and community leaders. "We of the AFL-CIO still believe it is more expensive to default than to perform."

On international affairs, Kirkland said the foundation of U.S. policy has been to "feed, appease and divert" in reaction to Soviet initiatives.

"That is where Henry Kissinger has most conspicuously failed," he declared. "His policy has been to make book with the other side; to bob and weave. This has left the forces of freedom in total disarray.

"The primary objective of our foreign policy must be to consolidate the forces of freedom," he said. "We must put the question to our friends: where will you stand? They must stop taking refuge in abstention.

"What counts is not whether we win in the voting but who is on our side. We will prevail if we build on that concept." This, Kirkland reminded the gathering, has been the basis of AFL-CIO policy in the international labor bodies.

Among those who participated in the tribute to Kirkland were Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), and Daniel P. Moynihan, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in a message read to the gathering by his executive assistant, Thomas R. Donahue, praised Kirkland's record of service to the trade union movement and through it to "the cause of social justice at home and abroad."

Presiding at the dinner was Bayard Rustin, chairman of the Social Democrats, USA, and director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute. He called Kirkland "a rare human being, combining a commitment to social progress and an identification with the needs of common people with a deep and abiding interest in international democracy."

Eugene V. Debs, whose career the award commemorates, was an early union organizer and political activist. He was imprisoned and deprived of his citizenship during World War I. An AFL-CIO resolution adopted by the 1975 Convention called on Congress to restore full citizenship to Debs, who died in 1926.

California, Oregon Initiatives:

Bids to Ban Nuclear Power Ignore Cost in Jobs, Energy

San Francisco—Less than two years after the United States suffered its worst energy shortage in history due to the OPEC natons' oil embargo, voters in Califonia and Oregon are facing statewide referendums on whether to prohibit the use of one of the cleanest and cheapest alternative sources available—nuclear power.

In California, Proposition 15, the Nuclear Power Plants Initiative, qualified for the June 8 primary election ballot following a campaign initiated by environmentalist groups including the Sierra Club and Friends of the Earth.

It would bar nuclear power plant construction and prohibit the operation of existing plants at more than 60 percent of their original licensed core-power level one year after its enactment unless federal liability limits are removed.

After five years it would require the derating of existing plants by 10 percent a year unless the effectiveness of safety systems and waste disposal methods is confirmed by a two-thirds vote of both houses of the state legislature.

Both the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the California AFL-CIO have called for defeat of the measure.

The Oregon measure, which is almost identical to California's Proposition 15, will be on the November ballot. Moreover, signature drives to qualify similar anti-nuclear power measures are under way in a number of other states, including Colorado, Maine and Montana.

Proponents of Proposition 15 maintain that it is just a safety measure designed to force utilities and the nuclear industry, which have long been subject to stringent federal safety standards, to prove that nuclear power is safe.

But they argue for it in somewhat different terms. For example, Dr. Harold Sandler, a professor of medicine at Stanford University, declares it would "erect a barrier between the atomic industry and the wanton destruction of the human environment on earth."

Opponents point out that such a claim ignores the fact that nuclear energy development is proceeding rapidly in many other nations around the globe where there is neither the inclination nor the will to stop it even if that were desirable.

Led by California's former governor, Edmund G. "Pat" Brown, the opposition warns that Proposition 15 is a nuclear shutdown measure that would "severely damage the ability of utilities to provide adequate electricity to meet California's industrial, commercial, agricultural and residential needs" and that it would cost the public billions of dollars and thousands of lost jobs.

In announcing its opposition to Proposition 15, the California AFL-CIO executive council described it as "an unwise, unnecessary measure that would force the shutdown of existing nuclear power plants in the state.

"The fact is nuclear energy is safe," the council said. "No member of the public has ever been injured or killed in the 20-year history of nuclear energy in the United States."

Asserting that the impact of Proposition 15, if approved, would be "devastating," the council said it would:

- Impose a no-growth economy on California, thereby increasing unemployment in a state already burdened by about 1 million jobless workers.
- Increase the state's dependence on foreign oil controlled by the multinational oil companies and the Arabs.
- Place further fuel cost hardships on low and fixed income citizens.
- Force California to burn coal to generate electricity, thereby increasing air pollution and worsening the environment.
- Force the abandonment of plans for mass transit and water pollution control facilities because of energy shortages.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, in supporting the California federation's stand, declared at its February meeting:

"At a time when the domestic supply of oil and natural gas is diminishing, the nation must make every effort to conserve energy and to develop alternate sources of energy, including coal, shale oil, solar and geothermal, as well as nuclear. Even a partial limitation on nuclear energy would seriously hamper the quest for American energy independence."

Among the many objections to the initiative voiced by opponents is the fact that it was drafted with no regard for its economic consequences. The state attorney general's office noted this in the last sentence of the official summary of the measure which will appear on the ballot. It states:

"However, if this initiative should restrict the operation of existing nuclear power plants, and the courts should uphold such action, there is a potential for substantial state damage claims from the owners of the plants."

The cost of shutting down the state's three existing plants and abandoning plans for others has been estimated at more than $2 billion.

The cost factor was spelled out in detail recently by Donald E. Reardon of the U.S. Energy Research & Development Administration (ERDA) in testimony before a California Senate Committee on Public Utilities, Transit & Energy.

"The California family of four could look forward to paying a total bill of $7,500 (over the next 20 years) above what they would have to pay if nuclear energy were kept available," he said. "The total cost to the citizens of California over the next 20 years would be about $40 billion."

Reardon said these extra costs would result "directly in higher electricity bills" and indirectly in "higher costs for goods and services passed on to us by commerce, industry and agriculture."

On the safety issue, Dr. Norman Rasmussen, director of an exhaustive two-year study of atomic safety for the federal government, has testified that a person is about as likely to be harmed by an atomic accident as to be hit by a meteorite.

Another major objection to the measure is the requirement that both houses of the legislature must confirm by a two-thirds vote the effectiveness of all safety systems of nuclear plants and also that there is "no reasonable chance" that any radioactive wastes could escape under any circumstances, including an "act of God."

This was one of the considerations that led the Los Angeles Times to oppose the measure in a lead editorial, Feb. 22. Noting that "everyone wants safe nuclear power plants and protection from radioactive wastes," the Times said:

"But the approach of Proposition 15 is less an assurance of safety than an assurance that nuclear generating plants in California would cease to function.

"The negative votes of 14 members of the California Senate—one-third plus one of the membership—or 24 members of the (80-member) Assembly could stop the use of nuclear power in California. Fourteen persons who are not even required to have the technical qualifications needed to assess safety questions could bring to a halt a multibillion dollar industry that employs thousands and that provides essential electrical power to the state.

"Giving veto power to a small legislative minority is wrong in most circumstances. In the case of complex technical questions on nuclear safety, it is absurd."

Prospects of getting Congress to remove the existing federal liability limits are unlikely since Congress just a few months ago approved a 10-year extension of the Price-Anderson Act which limits total liability to $560 million. This makes it even more likely that nuclear power plant construction would be halted if the measure is approved.

At GE, Westinghouse:

Meany Hails Unity In Electrical Talks

The 13 unions of the coordinated bargaining committee set to open contract talks this spring with General Electric and Westinghouse have the full support of the AFL-CIO in their effort to reach "just and honorable settlements," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

"I am confident that the CBC and its steering committee will once again demonstrate strong and unified leadership on behalf of the 175,000 union members" employed by the two electrical firms, Meany said in a statement issued in conjunction with Unity Day.

Thousands of GE and Westinghouse workers showed their support of their negotiators by wearing "Unity" buttons to work and attending local rallies on Mar. 31.

The unions have not yet spelled out specific bargaining goals, but the general outline of their proposals emerged from a series of grassroots meetings held around the nation earlier this year.

Negotiations with GE will begin in New York on Apr. 20, two months before the June 27 expiration date of current contracts. Talks with Westinghouse will start in early May against a July 11 deadline.

In his remarks, Meany noted that 10 years of experience have proved the value of the unity and mutual support developed by the unions represented by the GE-Westinghouse coordinated bargaining committee.

"The weakness and fragmentation of earlier decades have vanished," Meany said. "The outstanding gains won by these unions and their members, working together, have truly brought a greater measure of justice to the employes of these two giant electrical companies."

The CBC's goals will not become public until just before talks begin less than three weeks from now. However, at the grassroots meetings in January, there was a consensus on the following major proposals:

- A wage increase that will recover the losses inflicted by the lid on the cost-of-living escalator clause in the current contracts, plus a substantial "real" increase.
- An uncapped cost-of-living escalator, calculated and paid on a more equitable basis.
- Greatly improved pension protection.
- Conversion of the "ineffectual" GE-Westinghouse jobless benefit plans into full-fledged supplementary unemployment benefits.
- Broader protection against the costs of illness, including comprehensive dental care, fully paid by the companies.
- Longer vacations, more holidays and increased personal time, with the removal of qualifications, restrictions and administrative tangles that often reduce these benefits to less than their stated terms.
- A union shop, or the maximum degree of union security permitted by law.

These proposals were reviewed by the CBC steering committee on Mar. 4 and, after a day of discussions, they were adopted.

AFL-CIO affiliates represented by the CBC are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Firemen & Oilers, Carpenters, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Unaffiliated members of the CBC are the Teamsters, Auto Workers and the United Electrical Workers.

CANADIAN TRADE UNIONISTS march en masse at Parliament Hill to protest Prime Minister Trudeau's wage control policy as the Canadian Labor Congress delivered its annual memorandum to the government. The march of 25,000 trade unionists was described as the biggest demonstration in Ottawa since the 1930s. Similar protests were held in provincial capitals across Canada.

CLC Leaves Two Agencies Over Controls

Ottawa — The Canadian Labor Congress has withdrawn from two major areas of cooperation with the federal government as it steps up its campaign against wage controls.

On Mar. 23, its executive council decided to pull its representatives off two advisory bodies—the Economic Council of Canada, which advises the government on economic policy, and the Canada Labor Relations Council on which labor, business and government leaders seek long-term solutions to labor-management differences.

Leaders of the CLC, which represents 2 million Canadian workers, had told the government they would not cooperate in its anti-inflation campaign because they believe it controls wages but has no effective mechanism to control prices. They made this clear in a submission to the cabinet on Mar. 22, while 25,000 rank-and-file union members demonstrated on Parliament Hill in support of their stand.

CLC President Joseph Morris said its participation on the Canada Labor Relations Council was no longer relevant because of limitations placed on collective bargaining by the anti-inflation program. He said participation on the Economic Council of Canada had become an "embarrassment."

However, the CLC would keep its representatives on other advisory bodies such as the unemployment insurance advisory committee and the manpower consultative committee, at least for the time being, because they "are not major policy forums," he said.

ILG Leader Named To Jobless Aid Panel

Wilbur Daniels, executive vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, has been named to a two-year term on the Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Insurance by Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr. The panel, which has five representatives each for workers, employers and the public, is headed by Carolyn Shaw Bell, a Wellesley College economics professor.

Other labor representatives on the council are President Robert W. Macfarlane of the Idaho AFL-CIO; James O'Brien, assistant director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; Ken Morris of the Auto Workers, and David A. Sweeney of the Teamsters.

Louisiana Convention Hits New R-T-W Bid

Baton Rouge, La.—A new move to outlaw the union shop in Louisiana came under sharp fire from delegates to the State AFL-CIO's 21st annual convention here.

Noting that a concerted effort is underway by the Louisiana Association of Business & Industry to re-enact a so-called right-to-work law, the delegates declared in a resolution that such an effort "can only have a detrimental and costly effect on Louisiana's economy and its labor-management relationships."

Other resolutions adopted during the four-day meeting urged the Louisiana legislature to approve the proposed Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and to provide increased state support for the general welfare program and assistance for dependent children.

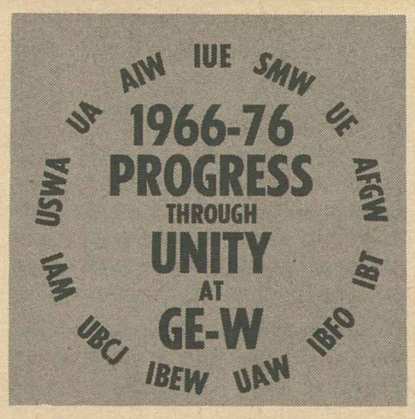
AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in an address to the delegates, challenged the Administration's assessment that the economy is in good shape. He accused the President of using "selected rose-colored statistics" to paint an inaccurate picture.

"If Ford, Burns, Simon and company are returned to power," he said, "we can look forward to four more years of high prices, high profits, high unemployment—four more years of hardship for many and good times for a few, four more years like the last seven."

Kirkland observed that President Ford has forecast great things for the nation this election year, "but when you read the fine print, you find he means only a tiny reduction in the unemployment rate, a tiny reduction in the inflation rate, but a 32 percent increase in corporate profits."

Delegates heard other speakers and chose officers for the coming year, re-electing President Victor Bussie, Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Sr. and First Vice President A. P. Stoddard.

On the "right-to-work" issue, the convention noted that Louisiana voters repealed the state's "work" law in 1956 after it had been on the statute books only two years. Since then, the resolution observed, the climate of labor relations in Louisiana has steadily improved.



Manufacturing production workers in the state average more than $50 per week than similar workers in Mississippi and $47 per week more than those in Arkansas, both "right-to-work" states, the resolution pointed out.

In 1974, it said, Louisiana ranked the eighth highest of all 50 states in percentage increase in personal income.

The ERA resolution called on the state legislature to adopt the amendment "so that Louisiana can join with the 34 other states which have spoken out in favor of equality for all of its citizens." Only four more states must ratify the ERA before it becomes law.

Earlier, actor Alan Alda appealed to the delegates for support of the ERA campaign, which he described as a "people's movement." He noted that men are being shortchanged as well as women by being married to persons not allowed by society to fulfill their potential outside the home.

Among other resolutions adopted were those to strengthen federal laws regulating the U.S. maritime program, increasing postal subsidies to prevent further curtailment of postal service, and one calling for passage of the national health security bill now before Congress.

N.Y. Subway, Bus Pact Beats Strike Deadline

New York — The Transport Workers reached tentative agreement on a new two-year contract covering 32,400 employes of the New York Transit Authority and its subsidiary, the Manhattan and Bronx Surface Transit Operating Authority.

The pact, which is subject to ratification by union members, was reached at about 4 a.m. on Apr. 1, an hour before the union had scheduled a strike of the city's bus and subway systems.

Also reaching agreement were some 2,300 workers in Queens and Staten Island who are represented by the Amalgamated Transit Union.

President Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers told newsmen the agreement was the best the union could have worked out with or without a strike.

New York has been in a deep financial dilemma for the past year. City and state officials are engaged in a program of fiscal retrenchment and last fall a state financial emergency act ordered a wage freeze for public employes.

The agreement includes a cost-of-living escalator clause that provides for adjustments in pay every six months. COL increases will be geared to changes in the metropolitan New York consumer price index, with the first adjustment made on July 1.

For each three-tenths of a point rise in the CPI, transit workers' pay will increase by one cent. Under the old agreement, their pay went up a total of 22 cents an hour as a result of cost-of-living adjustments.

In addition, the union won the right to reopen wage negotiations in the event that any other city union receives better benefits during the city's current fiscal crisis.

The transit authority also agreed to pay workers step increments that had been frozen.

At the same time, the union blocked the authority's attempts to implement a wide range of retrogressive actions that would have taken away many gains previously won.

The two sides agreed to set up a joint steering committee to study ways to increase productivity.

State-County Adds Illinois Units of 15,000

Springfield, Ill. — The State, County & Municipal Employees have won two more collective-bargaining elections in units of Illinois state workers totaling nearly 15,000.

The elections, held during the first two weeks of March, were for professional and paraprofessional employes of human-services classifications in Illinois state agencies.

The election among the professionals involved 11,090 employes, and included social workers, employment security personnel, psychologists and other professionals in the human-services area. The paraprofessionals' election was among 3,856 mostly technical workers.

Dick Wilson. AFSCME state coordinator here, said the union received 84 percent of all the votes cast by the professionals and 92 percent of all those voting in the paraprofessionals' election.

AFSCME has won five elections covering a total of 42,000 state workers in the past 18 months.

The Cost of Illegal Aliens

WHILE THERE IS disagreement as to the number of illegal aliens who may be present in the United States and who may be holding jobs which would otherwise be available to the millions of Americans and permanent residents now in the ranks of the unemployed, there can be no doubt that the number is significant and that it has been growing, not declining. The Dept. of Labor has released a study estimating that there may be as many as 8 million illegals in the country.

The problem today is not, as it used to be, limited to agricultural employment. Fully 40 percent and maybe as many as 50 percent of the jobs held by illegal aliens are in industry and commerce as well as in related industries. No longer is the employment of illegal aliens restricted to states along our southern border but extends to all parts of the country and in most metropolitan areas.

The alien who comes to the United States, legally or illegally, does so because of the work he can find here, work which is more satisfactory than anything he can get at home even if the pay for the work he gets here is at the lowest end of our wage and salary levels. Both the jobs and the pay he receives are better than he can get at home. Unfortunately, this makes him an easy prey for the unscrupulous employer looking for cheap labor.

WE HAVE MAINTAINED, and we believe that the record makes clear, that the illegal alien's need for the work he obtains and his liability to be deported at any time upon discovery results in serious discrimination and exploitation, both at his expense and indirectly at the expense of other workers. The illegal alien is in constant danger of loss of job and deportation if he is discovered or his presence is made known to the Immigration & Naturalization Service. If he entered in violation of law, he may also be subject to fines and imprisonment.

In these circumstances, he is in no position to complain when his employer pays him poorly or treats him unfairly. As a result, his employment is characterized by substandard wages and denial of rights and benefits normally associated with employment in America. The net effect of the illegal's presence in the job market has been to depress and maintain low wage levels and substandard living conditions for American citizens, permanent residents and illegal aliens alike, where they are employed in large numbers.

In addition, of course, the availability of a substantial supply of illegal aliens able and willing to work for substandard wages and working conditions also results in loss of jobs and employment opportunities for American workers. Obviously, too, the effectiveness of the rights of union organization and collective bargaining are seriously undermined. At the same time, all too many illegal aliens who are unable to find jobs or who lose jobs end up on relief and become a burden on the community in terms of medical care and other social services.

We must be aware that the opportunity to continue the policy of welcoming immigrants to our country is seriously threatened by the increasing numbers of persons who enter or remain in this country illegally, take jobs needed by our own unemployed, and undermine domestic labor standards by working at low wages and under substandard working conditions. Failure to correct this situation helps neither the citizen, the permanent resident, nor the alien seeking a better life in our fortunate land.

Mutual Genocide No Solution To Northern Ireland's Discord

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE OCCUPATIONAL hazards of a columnist is the temptation to become an omniscient busybody. Normally this is harmless enough: The advice I pass out on a regular basis —whether sound or not—is generally ignored by the recipient. However, there are times when it is in my judgment wise to shut up.

For example, I have conscientious scruples, arising from my respect for the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution, about discussing at the trial stage sensational cases such as that of Patty Hearst, the various conspiracy indictments launched by former Attorney General John Mitchell or, for that matter, the trials of Mitchell and the other Watergaters.

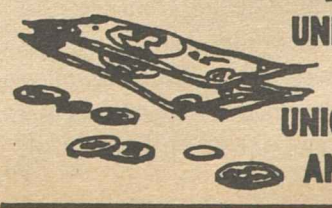
In the same sense, about three years ago I took the pledge with respect to the shambles in Northern Ireland. Sen. Edward Kennedy, New York City Council President Paul O'Dwyer and other Irish-American politicians were, I thought, passing out a good deal of singularly harmful advice, much of it consciously or unconsciously providing aid and comfort to hard-line Irish Republican Army types.

I suppose that sentimentally most Irish-Americans would like to see the "six orphans" part of a united Ireland, but they would not have to pay the butcher's bill. And it is perfectly clear that if the British troops were pulled out of the North the consequence would be a blood bath.

It may be great sport to toss grenades in pubs, put land mines in roads and generally shoot up the neighborhood. There evidently are Protestant and Catholic extremists who get their kicks in this fashion. But who are the victims of this ideological gangsterism? The overwhelming mass of human beings who, whether they go to Catholic or Protestant services, want nothing more than to be left in peace.

Without denying for one minute the injustices enforced on the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland over the past half-century, the gerrymandered election districts, the stark prejudice of the former Stormont parliament dominated by flinty eyed Protestants, the solution is not mutual genocide.

I have broken my pledge, but justifiably. On St. Patrick's Day the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, Liam Cosgrave, spoke to a joint session of the U.S. Congress. I have read a lot of political speeches, but by every standard Cosgrave's was superlative. For background, the pressures on the Irish Republic and its political parties are dreadful to contemplate: the Irish Republican Army and its offshoots are constantly demanding that the South go to the rescue of Northern Catholics.



Fortunately the Irish citizenry and its leaders have shown no taste for extremism, so the gunmen have taken a different tack: They have moved their activities to England, hoping, by their bombing, to lead the British government to cry "a curse on both your houses" and pull the troops out of the North. The consequence, they think, would force the Republic to intervene.

COSGRAVE POINTED OUT that the Protestant majority in Northern Ireland does not now want to be part of a united Ireland and went on to emphasize "that those who live in Ireland today belong in Ireland as of right, whether by origin they be Ulster Scots, Anglo-Norman, or Celts (and) the Irish Government, acting for the people of Ireland, repudiates violence as a means of achieving unity."

Then he laid it on the line to American irresponsibles: "The fact is that . . . approximately 1,400 people have been killed . . . the equivalent in terms of relative population to 200,000 deaths in America. . . . There are in (the U.S.) some people who contribute in the most direct way possible to violence in Ireland. . . . What they are doing, whatever their motives . . . is helping to kill or maim Irish men and women of every persuasion in Ireland. They are clearly and directly postponing any possible hope of realizing the traditional aim of Irish nationalism . . . the establishment of harmony and a sense of common identity between 'Protestant, Catholic and Dissenter' in Ireland."

Thank you, Mr. Cosgrave—and amen.

Challenged by Ford:

Congress Faces Major Test Of Will, Leadership in 1976

The following is the foreword to "Labor Looks at Congress 1975," a report prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

THE FIRST SESSION of the 94th Congress was the most frustrating and infuriating and, at the same time, the most active in the memory of any labor legislative agent.

We had hopes that a progressive Congress, following the strong liberal majorities elected in both Houses, would rebuild the economy, dragged into recession by Republican "trickle-down" economics. Those hopes died aborning. Gerald Ford, the first unelected President in the history of this Republic, used his congressional experience to build a record of executive obstructionism without parallel.

The year ended in the same manner as 1974, with Gerald Ford vetoing one of the major labor goals for that session. In 1974 it was the Energy Transportation Security Act. In 1975 it was situs picketing. In 1974 he vetoed a bill he had strongly supported as a congressman. In 1975 he vetoed a bill he had promised, publicly and privately, to sign.

On both occasions, Gerald Ford proved himself vulnerable to right-wing and business pressure. On situs picketing, he also proved that his word that he would sign the bill was without value.

By the end of 1975, the Ford presidency had been reduced to simplistic sloganeering designed to garner him votes from the most conservative members of his party in presidential primaries. Thus he attacked social programs, government, legitimate regulation, while championing big business and economic determinism. As AFL-CIO President Meany has said, the Ford Administration has not taken one action that would be viewed as unfriendly by big business and the banks.

The Congress, despite its liberal credentials, was not equipped to handle such a frontal assault on legislative prerogative. Because the Congress is composed of 535 men and women from differing backgrounds, philosophies and regions, it can not lead as one. Only the Chief Executive can. When the executive proposes retreat, it is difficult for the Congress to rally behind one idea, one program.

But that difficulty is no excuse for an elected Congress permitting an unelected President to ride roughshod over it.

In 1975 the Congress displayed a distressing lack of will and leadership in responding to the Ford challenge. He succeeded in forcing the Congress into defending the status quo, rather than fighting for necessary solutions to pressing problems.

The virulence of the President's attacks on social programs left many progressive representatives and senators speechless. By sniping at these programs, the President hoped to create public apprehension about them. It is clear that the White House will not point out the positive benefits of these programs. But members of Congress can and should and, in 1975, routinely failed to do so.

By cowering before this presidential attack, the Congress ignored the fact that, combined with the tax cuts it passed over Administration opposition, it was social security, unemployment compensation and food stamps which helped prevent the recession caused by Ford economics from becoming a depression.

The first session was a confrontation of ideologies—the negativism of the President and the progressive programs of human compassion. The result was an appalling lack of progress.

The budget was a prime example. The Congress, fearing presidential rhetoric, failed to step forward with a program to provide the economy with the stimulus necessary to move the country toward full employment. The Congress engaged in budgetary oneupmanship—trying to see who could cut the deficit the most—instead of using the budget as a means of ending the recession. The Congress failed to state the obvious truth—that today's expenditure would be an investment in tomorrow's economic health—an investment that would ultimately eliminate the budget deficit.

In foreign policy, the Congress sniped at some decisions of the Executive Branch without ever coming to grips with the phony policy of "detente" which has caused many of America's foreign policy reversals in the past two years. The Congress appeared trapped by the simplistic statements of the President and his Secretary of State that anyone who opposed "detente" was somehow advocating war. It failed to note that appeasement, which is the essence of "detente," has never worked, for no dictator is ever long appeased. Rather, appeasement whets his appetite for more.

WHETHER 1976 is to be a repeat of 1975 depends on Congress. If it summons up the will and provides the leadership, the Congress can get America moving again. If it fails, then majority rule—the foundation of democracy—will have flunked one of its greatest tests in the 200-year history of this country.

At stake is the future of America. For labor's part, we will continue to fight for progress for America, a balanced full employment economy and a foreign policy based on the defense of liberty. We will oppose regression and appeasement with all the vigor at our command.

And we will record the actions of the individual members—not their words—as the guidepost for union members when they go to the polls this November.

How to Buy:

Wide Abuses Found In Truth in Lending

By Sidney Margolius

TRUTH IN LENDING is one of the most helpful laws passed in recent years to protect consumers against credit deceptions. Enacted after a long, hard fight, this law makes it easier to know two of the most important facts about credit costs. One is the number of dollars you pay extra if you borrow or buy on time. The other is the "annual percentage rate" or APR charged on the loan or installment purchase. The APR gives you a yardstick for comparing the percentage rate among different dealers and lenders. Various sources of credit may charge anywhere from 10 to 36 percent per annum interest.

But this law may not do you any good if you don't know about it. A congressional committee revealed last year that an experimental survey in Seattle found about half of the consumers questioned had some awareness of the Truth in Lending Act. But a much lower percentage was aware of any specific requirements.

Judging from reports by the Federal Trade Commission and congressional investigators, and some of my own experiences, you're most likely to encounter violations of the law in financing a mortgage, buying used cars, furniture, rugs, appliances or jewelry on installments, or getting a small loan.

Sometimes phone solicitors for credit cards are untrained people who can't give you the legally required information about the true annual rates even when pressed for it. One solicitor told me that the interest charge was 1½ percent. When asked if that meant 1½ percent a year, she didn't know. When asked how the bank could charge 1½ percent when it paid 5 and 6 percent on deposits, she said they didn't explain that to her. She finally agreed it must be 1½ percent a month. Asked what the annual percentage rate then would be she said 15 percent. When it was pointed out that there are 12 months in a year, she agreed it must be 18 percent.

One of the most important regulations is that not only must the sales contract state the annual rate but answers to oral inquiries about the annual credit cost must be stated in terms of the annual percentage rate. Thus, this big lender itself was responsible for this violation of the law in failing to instruct its solicitor in the required information.

Judging from cases on record you also may need to be especially careful in credit dealings with door-to-door salesmen. The FTC investigated practices of the Mutual Home Equipment Co. which sells cookware, dishes, blankets and other household goods. Among practices in the FTC cited were failure to disclose the annual rate even in its contracts.

You also may need to watch out if considering a contract with a "health spa" although there seems little reason to pay for exercise since there are many ways to get it free, including housework. The Health Spa International Inc., has been cited by the FTC for Truth in Lending violations.

So has the huge Gulf Oil Corp. The FTC complained that Gulf claimed in merchandise ads that there was "no charge for credit" and "no finance charge." But the FTC said Gulf should have stated, "The cost of credit is included in the price quoted for the goods and services."

OF ALL RECENT VIOLATIONS, most have been in home sales and mortgage loans. Scores of builders, real estate dealers, and mortgage companies around the country have been cited.

Typical violations include failure to disclose the broker's or finder's fee as a prepaid finance charge, and failure to itemize the different items in the finance charge, and to disclose accurately the annual rate.

One violation of special concern, since it may involve consumers already in money trouble, was a failure to disclose annual percentage rates on second mortgages.

Second most frequent areas of violations is among furniture, jewelry and rug dealers. But even several companies that finance auto-insurance premiums have been charged.

Poor Pay the Price:

Slash in Food Stamps Called Election-Year Political Tactic

THE FORD ADMINISTRATION was accused of skirting Congress to impose new regulations on the food stamp program without waiting for the outcome of bills now pending on Capitol Hill.

Rejecting the Administration's claim that new rules are needed to curb widespread abuses, AFL-CIO Community Services Rep. Ray Andrus said that the real motive is so-called budget-balancing with a view to the November election. "Only a small portion" of the regulations now out for comment are "directed at the alleged problems of people who are not entitled to food stamps getting them" or correcting abuses by vendors who handle food stamp sales in the local communities, he asserted.

The real aim of the proposed regulations is to cut more than 6 million people from the program, a great many of whom are among the most needy in the nation, he said, including many of the elderly, the disabled, the blind, the functionally illiterate and non-English-speaking, as well as unemployed workers.

Andrus said on Labor News Conference that abuse-correction is such a small portion of the new rules that it is "like straining a barrel of soup to get a gnat."

He said that while the labor movement accepts the requirement of current regulations that food stamp recipients who are able to work must be available to take jobs, it strongly objects to tightening that rule by adding the "broad and ambiguous" mandate that they must be "regularly engaging in activities directly related to securing employment." He said that is such a "loose proposition" that there is no way to know if it means "eight times a month, 10 times or twice a day."

Andrus also took issue with the proposed elimination of safeguards against disqualifying unemployed workers for food stamps if they refuse jobs that pose dangers to health or safety, or workers who reject a prospective employer's demand that they resign from any union membership or agree not to join a union. "The no-union-membership rule," he said, could be used to block strikers from ever qualifying for food stamps, as well as block union members from ever participating in the program.

ELECTION YEAR POLITICS has a lot to do with President Ford's end run around Congress to put stiff new rules on the food stamp program without waiting for final action on bills now pending on Capitol Hill, AFL-CIO Community Services Rep. Ray Andrus, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc., and Rachelle Patterson of the Boston Globe. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

LABOR ATTACHES assigned to foreign embassies in Washington are briefed on current developments affecting trade unions in America and abroad by Ernest S. Lee, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs. The briefing was held at the federation headquarters.

Regional Hearings Demonstrate Critical Need for Health Security

Illinois AFL-CIO said people are finding that medical care costs are the fastest rising item in the family budget.

He said that although federal expenditures could rise dramatically for a national health care program, overall spending could be reduced by effective cost controls.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, said at the San Francisco hearings that enactment of the Kennedy-Corman Health Security measure would cut U.S. health costs $20 billion, while assuring quality health care for all citizens.

During fiscal year 1975, Henning noted, the nation spent more than $118 billion for health care — "more per capita than any other nation," yet "there are grave deficiences in quality and coverage."

Henning cited several shortcomings in the existing health delivery system:

- Forty million Americans are not covered by any health insurance for hospitalization or surgery.
- Six million who are below the poverty line are not covered by Medicaid.
- Less than 30 percent of the workers who lose their jobs are able to maintain private health insurance.
- Only 41 percent of low-income, full-time workers have any health insurance and less than 10 percent have coverage for care in a physician's office.
- Only 44 percent of part-time workers and 27 percent of the unemployed have any coverage at all.

"There should be no question in anyone's mind that we need a national health insurance program," Henning stressed.

He acknowledged that the task of transforming the existing "uncoordinated and inefficient" non-system into an efficient health care program would require a number of fundamental changes.

But the transformation to Health Security would give the nation more and better care for the amount of money it is already spending, Henning stressed.

Executive Sec. William R. Roberston of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO said in his testimony that the lack of controls in the existing system rules out the possibility of quality health care for all.

"The insurance companies have demonstrated the only role they wish to perform is that of financial middleman," Robertson said.

Nor have the carriers shown a desire to promote the development of standards and quality controls for physicians and hospitals profiting from medical insurance plans, he observed.

Robertson said, "Nothing is more vital to the progress of the nation than the health of its people. Yet, today in the United States our system of health care is in such disarray that it is unable to meet the most basic health needs."

He accused the Nixon-Ford Administration of preferring to defend the system rather than taking the needed steps to restructure it.

Laurel Burley, community services director of the Alameda County, Calif., AFL-CIO, said the nation is not getting its money's worth for the amount spent on health care.

"The United States in 1973 fell behind 17 other countries in infant mortality and behind 20 other countries in male life expectancy," he said.

Burley said that America is the only highly industrialized nation in the world without a health security system and, subsequently, all citizens are not receiving the health care they need and have a right to expect.

Rev. Edward L. Peet, president of the California affiliate of the National Council of Senior Citizens, told the House panel that while the elderly depend heavily on Medicare, Health Security would better meet their needs.

"We oldsters are major consumers of health care, and we are in a hurry," he said. "We get sick more often, and we get more gravely sick. Though we make up 10 percent of the population, we buy 24 percent of prescription drugs sold in this country."

Medicare was a vital social gain for older Americans, but its benefits have been chipped away, Rev. Peet said.

"The doctor's fees Medicare allows are not what doctors charge us," he said in noting that benefits cover about 40 percent of actual costs.

Despite its shortcomings, Rev. Peet said that the elderly would continue to "lean" on Medicare until Health Security is enacted, stressing that the Kennedy-Corman legislation would be far superior to President Ford's catastrophic care proposal, which he called "a catastrophe in itself."

Additional hearings on the Health subcommittee's schedule will be in Knoxville, Tenn.; Salem, Ore., and New Orleans.

Senate Action Scuttles No-Fault Insurance Bill

The Senate scuttled a no-fault auto insurance bill that the AFL-CIO said was needed to guarantee prompt and fair compensation to accident victims without costly lawsuits.

It was opposed by an influential lobby of trial lawyers that has thus far succeeded in blocking any federal legislation and either defeating or watering down no-fault bills in most state legislatures.

After one day of debate, the Senate voted 49-45 to send the bill back to the Commerce Committee —in effect killing it for this Congress. A similar bill had passed the Senate two years ago, in the 93rd Congress, but died in the House.

The measure would have set federal standards for state no-fault auto insurance laws. If a state didn't meet the standards within three years, a federal law would be imposed. The bill's chief sponsors were Senators Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), Frank E. Moss (D-Utah) and Ted Stevens (R-Alaska).

In a letter to all senators, Biemiller said the present liability insurance system is unfair to accident victims and increases insurance costs through needless lawsuits.

He praised the bill that was before the Senate for features that include "full compensation of all reasonable medical and rehabilitation costs . . . restrictions on cancellation and non-renewal practices . . . reasonable limitations on suits for so-called 'pain and suffering' losses."

As for the argument that the issue should be left entirely to the states, Biemiller noted that most of the 16 states with no-fault laws "have inadequate benefit levels and ineffective lawsuit restrictions."

A combination of "rampant inflation" and poorly-drawn state laws has sent auto insurance rates sharply higher in some no-fault states as well as in states without no-fault laws, Biemiller said. But "in those very few states where adequate lawsuit restrictions exist, auto insurance rates have either stabilized or been lowered as a result of no-fault."

Biemiller noted that the AFL-CIO had predicted that if states were left to their own devices, the outcome would be either inaction or a "patchwork system of ineffective state laws."

That, "regrettably," is what happened, he said.

Election Act Amendments:

Key Votes in Senate On Political Action

The key votes during a two-week Senate debate on the Federal Election Commission bill came on amendments, most of which were intended to help corporations raise political funds and hamper union political action.

On the three issues listed below, senators who voted for labor's position are marked R for right. Wrong votes are W, and A indicates absent. PR is paired right and PW is paired wrong.

VOTE NO. 1, on Mar. 17, shows the 45-40 defeat of a labor-opposed amendment by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) that would have permitted employers to solicit all workers for contributions to corporate political funds. The amendment provided no safeguards against intimidation by employers to get contributions from workers. Management solicitation would have been permitted at the worksite.

VOTE NO. 2, on Mar. 18, was the 55-39 rejection of a labor-opposed substitute introduced by Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.). It would simply have reconstituted the Federal Election Commission as a presidentially-appointed body, left unchanged the pro-management "Sunpac" ruling, and required unions to report the costs of all communications with their members in support of federal candidates.

VOTE NO. 3, on Mar. 24, the 49-36 rejection of an attempt to table and thus kill a labor-supported amendment to exempt from a cumbersome reporting requirement amounts totaling less than $1,000 that unions and other organizations spend to inform their own members of political endorsements.

Hatch Act Reforms Face Veto

employes have been relegated largely to a passive political role. Stiff penalties for violations served to discourage employes from even the small level of participation allowed to them, unions seeking repeal of the law charged at congressional hearings.

Increased Administration opposition was reflected in a dropoff in the House vote for the bill.

Last October, the House voted 288-119 for a bill very similar to the final version that emerged from a House-Senate conference committee. That was substantially over the two-thirds mark.

The final vote on Mar. 30 was 241-164, or 29 short of a two-thirds majority.

There was less of a time lag between the Senate votes, and both fell six short of the two-thirds mark. The final passage vote on Mar. 31 was 54-36.

The AFL-CIO, its Public Employee Dept., and unions of government workers pushed for passage of the legislation. This was the first time in years of trying that a bill to lift political restrictions on the civil service was acted on by Congress.

Meany Hits Cutback by Regulation:

Labor Spurs All-Out Fight To Save Food Stamp Plan

CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller sought to head off conservative attempts to decimate the food stamp program under the guise of "reform."

The House Agriculture Committee is considering an assortment of food stamp bills and the Senate Agriculture Committee has already cleared for floor action a bill that labor considers only slightly less damaging than the Administration proposals.

In a letter to senators, Biemiller asked support for a series of amendments to improve the Agriculture Committee bill. In its present form, he said, it would "particularly hurt the families of the jobless and the working poor."

While cutting back on benefits, he noted, it would raise the administrative costs of the program by imposing new layers of red tape, "including a monthly reporting system which would involve sending, recieving and checking 60 million forms a year."

Biemiller urged amendments to "humanize and de-bureaucratize" the Senate bill. Bipartisan sponsors of the labor-supported amendments include Senators Bob Dole (R-Kan.), George McGovern (D-S.D.) and Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.).

One of the amendments sought would allow a needy family to get its allotment of free food stamps without having to put up the cash needed to buy the full monthly allotment. Thus, instead of having to pay $100 in cash for $166 worth of food stamps, a family would get $66 worth of stamps without a cash outlay.

Another amendment would tie the income eligibility figures to semi-annual changes in the cost-of-living. Thus, a family would not be disqualified if inflation sent its income above a poverty level that had been set two years earlier.

Other labor-endorsed amendments would assure that a recently unemployed person wouldn't have to wait more than 30 days to obtain food stamps and would bar the Agriculture Dept. from going ahead with drastic eligibility and reporting changes without giving Congress a chance to review them.

The House Agriculture Committee opened its hearings on food stamp legislation, and Biemiller urged it not to join in the "vicious campaign" to slash the program.

He was especially critical of a bill sponsored by Rep. Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.) that would lop off at least one-third of food stamp recipients and double the cost of the stamps to many households.

It would disqualify not only strikers, Biemiller noted, but also workers who refuse to engage in strikebreaking and the family of any unemployed worker who had quit his last job "without good cause."

And while a similar Administration bill wouldn't directly disqualify strikers and their families, Biemiller said it would accomplish the same purpose by a 90-day income-averaging requirement. That same provision, he noted, would hurt other low-income workers with fluctuating earnings. Thus, "migrants who were penniless in November and December could be denied food stamps in those months because they had picked crops in August, September and October."

Of an assortment of bills being considered by the committee, Biemiller said the most "genuine reform" would come through a bill sponsored by Rep. Andrew Young (D-Ga.). It would eliminate the purchase requirement for food stamps, raise the limit on family assets to $3,000 from the present $1,500 ceiling and would not require anyone to work for less than 80 percent of the minimum wage. Further, disqualification of a parent would not automatically mean denial of food stamps to children in the family.

"Workers do not want food stamps and they do not want welfare," Biemiller testified.

"They want jobs which will pay decent wages so that they can raise their families in dignity with an American standard of living. But if those jobs are not available, if programs to create work are scuttled, if the Administration's own predictions of massive unemployment for the next half-decade and beyond are allowed to come true, then workers and their families will not willingly go hungry.

"They will not be denied the benefits of the programs which they have so long supported with their tax dollars," he said.

An official of the National Council of Senior Citizens testified that many poor, elderly people don't use the food stamp program because they can't come up with the cash for the monthly purchase requirement.

Mrs. Betty Duskin, the council's director of policy research, said eligibility should be eased instead of being drastically curtailed as the Administration seeks.

Biemiller, in his testimony, took note of press reports that the cutbacks envisioned in the Agriculture Dept.'s proposed regulations were "a campaign tactic" of the Ford Administration against Ronald Reagan's bid for the Republican presidential nomination. To make hungry families a political pawn, Biemiller said, is "reprehensible and divisive."

A similar comment came from Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, who wrote Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz that the new regulations appear to be an assurance to Republican rightwingers "that President Ford can be every bit as mean to needy Americans as Ronald Reagan."

Gorman termed the proposed rules change "another thrust against unemployed and low-wage workers" that comes on top of the President's vetoes of job-creating legislation.

Meany's letter to the Agriculture Dept. included detailed comments on the impact of each of the proposed regulatory changes.

Thus, he noted, an elderly woman living alone with an income of $150 a month now pays $33 to buy $50 worth of food stamps. But her cost would rise to $45 under the proposed regulations.

House Kills Anti-Union Amendment, Adopts Revisions in Election Act

though the law is clear that unions cannot be restricted in any political activities aimed at their own members.

The Senate adopted a compromise version, limiting the disclosure requirement to expenditures that total more than $1,000. The amendment before the House had no limit, and would have required a local to send in a report of a $5 expenditure for a get-out-the-vote campaign, union attorneys said. It was defeated by a 220-175 margin. That leaves a House bill with no disclosure requirement to be reconciled in conference with the Senate-passed provision.

In a letter to House members before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller protested the singling out of unions.

He noted that "no such reporting requirement is imposed on other organizations that take an active role in politics, such as the National Right to work Committee, the John Birch Society, the Right to Life Committee, the National Rifle Association, environmental groups and Common Cause."

In another area, the House debated but finally rejected a proposal to provide public financing for congressional as well as presidential elections. The vote was 274-121.

Both the House and the Senate bills have an "anti-proliferation" provision to prevent corporations or unions from using multiple political committees to donate more than the present $5,000 limitation on contributions to political candidates.

Thus, if a political fund of an international union made a $5,000 contribution to a congressional candidate, a local of the same union couldn't make an additional contribution through its own voluntary political fund. And if a corporation had a political fund, its disbursements could not be supplemented by separate funds set up in each of its plants or subsidiaries.

Both the House and Senate bills take the same approach to the Supreme Court's ruling that a candidate can't be limited in personal spending for a campaign. The bills specify that no candidate for President who spends more than $50,000 of personal money or funds from his or her immediate family will be eligible for federal funds.

The House took up the bill under a rule that allowed only a dozen specified amendments to be considered. The intent was to avoid a repetition of the Senate debate, where the bill was so changed during two weeks of debate that it was discarded in favor of a last-minute compromise put together by the leadership.

Until new legislation is finally passed and signed into law, the Federal Election Commission will not be able to approve further matching funds for qualified candidates in the presidential primaries.

Before its authority ran out after a Mar. 22 deadline set by the Supreme Court, the commission had given out $12.6 million.

SIGNING JOINT STATEMENT of the AFL-CIO and the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI) in Tokyo are AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward and DOMEI President Seiji Amaike. At a meeting of the two organizations, it was noted that political changes in Asia have created a serious situation for Asian trade unions, including greater exposure to the threat of communism.

U.S., Japan Labor Seek Curbs on Multinationals

Tokyo—The Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI) and the AFL-CIO called for control of multinational corporations to "protect the basic interests of working people and to assure them justice and fairness."

In a joint statement signed at the conclusion of a three-day meeting between the two organizations here last month, the labor groups declared:

"It is urgently necessary to adopt international standards effectively regulating multinational corporations, and to encourage them to make their contribution to human society and enhance political democracy."

The statement noted that the global firms continue to reap huge profits worldwide and, because they are unregulated by any national or international agency, they create problems both in home countries and in host countries.

"In their home countries, their activities abroad create unemployment and danger to the economic health of the country, and in host countries, by their activities, they are gaining an unhealthy control over national economies," the statement said.

Representing the AFL-CIO at the eighth regular meeting of the two organizations were Vice Presidents Martin J. Ward and Joseph P. Tonelli and Director Ernest S. Lee of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs.

Other economic and political issues examined during the meeting were the threat of totaltarianism, unemployment, inflation, recession and shrinking natural resources in the free world.

On the political side, the meeting recognized the seriousness of the threat of the Communist military and political thrusts that are growing in Asia and other areas of the world, particularly in the developing countries.

The meeting deplored the politically motivated distortions of the constitutional character and purpose of United Nations agencies, such as the International Labor Organization and UNESCO.

"We agreed that it is necessary to protect these organizations from such abuses so that they can fulfill their incumbent roles of furthering world peace and social justice," the joint statement observed.

On economic issues, DOMEI and the AFL-CIO agreed to urge their respective governments to control inflation and promote the welfare of the workers in both countries by adopting strong welfare policies, including appropriate price stabilization, tax measures, job opportunities, improved unemployment benefits and adequate workers' housing.

The two labor organizations agreed to continue to cooperate in strengthening free and democratic trade unions in Asia. The meeting stressed the importance of the roles both organizations must play in increasing assistance to the Asian labor movement.

Also, the AFL-CIO declared its support of the DOMEI campaign in favor of the restoration of the northern territories to Japan. These "are the property of the Japanese people and are being held by the Soviet government in violation of all moral and legal principles," the joint statement said.

The next meeting of the DOMEI/AFL-CIO Joint Committee will be held in Washington, D.C., in 1977.

Unions Settle Casino Strike In Las Vegas

at 10 downtown hotel-casinos on the eve of a contract expiration and strike deadline.

The wage agreement, affecting more than 16,000 union members, will mean a $1.55 pay hike for the culinary workers over the contract period.

A major hang-up in the negotiations on the strip had been the insistence of resort owners on a clause giving them the power to lock out union members at all hotels in the event of a strike against one.

The agreement came after the resort owners modified their position on the strike-lockout clause to the satisfaction of the unions' bargaining team, the locals reported.

The downtown owners group made similar concessions on the clause to bring about the settlement before the old contract expired. AFM and IATSE members are covered by separate contracts at the downtown casinos.

Consumer Pays the Same:

Low-Wage Imports Cut Jobs, Not Prices

The severe drain low-wage imports are having on the nation's production, jobs and revenues is not really benefiting American consumers, needle trades unions said in calling for the closing of tariff loopholes.

Testifying before a foreign trade subcommittee of the House Ways & Means Committee, the Clothing Workers and the Ladies' Garment Workers urged the repeal of tariff provisions that encourage American firms to shift production abroad.

Reduced import duties on goods U.S. companies fabricate overseas for sale in American markets have magnified the erosion of jobs in the United States, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin told the panel.

Item 807 of the U.S. tariff schedule makes it highly profitable for U.S. firms to ship components overseas for assembly. When the products are shipped back, the duty merely covers the value of the pennies-an-hour labor rate, not the market value of the product.

Despite the lower costs of production and tariffs, the savings are not passed on to the consumer, Chaikin pointed out.

He presented a display of women's garments comparing prices retailers charge for similar items of comparable quality made in the United States and abroad.

Included in the display were two blouses bearing the White Stag label purchased recently at Bloomingdale's department store in New York City. Although one was manufactured in the United States and the other in Japan, both carried a price tag of $14.

Two girls' shirts bearing the Sears label purchased in a New Jersey store sold for $8, even though one was U.S.-made and the other came from abroad.

Chaikin's display also carried two brassieres that were purchased at Macy's department store in New York. Each was priced at $6.50, yet one was made in the United States and the other in Mexico.

Vice President Howard D. Samuel of the Clothing Workers cited a direct relationship between the decline of U.S. production and jobs in the apparel industry and increased imports under reduced duty rates.

Samuel noted that from 1968 to 1975, domestic production of men's suits fell 29 percent, sport coats 20 percent, and trousers 35 percent.

As a result of the production cutbacks, Samuel observed, 45,000 American jobs have been lost in the tailored clothing industry.

"At least one of every four workers in the tailored clothing industry is out of work, or almost three times the national unemployment rate," he said.

Samuel noted that other sectors of American industry have suffered similar job losses because of the tariff loophole.

"Almost 13 years of item 807 are enough," he stressed. "The tens of thousands of jobs lost in the apparel industry as a result are enough. Now is the time to correct the injustice inflicted on U.S. workers."

Chaikin pointed out that reduced duty rates on imported goods have also cut deeply into U.S. Treasury revenues.

"In 1974," he noted, "duties levied on apparel entering the United States under provisions of item 807 equalled 31 percent of what would have been collected under the rules which prevailed before 1963."

That loss in revenue must be made up by all other U.S. taxpayers, including firms that continue to produce apparel in the United States, Chaikin pointed out.

tion law that bars aliens seeking to enter the United States to work unless the department certifies there aren't enough domestic workers and the employment of aliens won't adversely affect wages and conditions of U.S. workers with similar jobs.

The department now wants to return to the situation that existed before 1965 when aliens could enter the United States unless the Labor Dept. actively intervened. Under that previous policy, Biemiller noted, the department normally intervened only in rare cases of a specific complaint.

Eastland's bill does include some of the desirable provisions of the House Judiciary Committee measure which would for the first time penalize employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, and Biemiller urged that some of the provisions be strengthened.

He told the panel that the AFL-CIO does support granting legal status to aliens with family and employment ties in the United States going back a number of years. He stressed also that the United States should continue to be "a haven of liberty for the persecuted and the oppressed."

He cautioned the committee, however, that America's policy of welcome to immigrants "is seriously threatened by the increasing number of persons who enter or remain in this country illegally, take jobs needed by our own unemployed, and undermine domestic labor standards by working at low wages and under substandard conditions."

Biemiller warned that "failure to correct this situation helps neither the citizen, the permanent resident, nor the alien seeking a better life in our fortunate land."

1976 EDITION of the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show is formally opened at Albert Thomas Hall in Houston by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. Holding the ribbon while Kirkland cuts are Sec.-Treas. 1976 Union-Industries Exhibition Called Showcase of Free Society

By John M. Barry

Houston — The bicentennial version of the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show drew enthusiastic crowds of Texans to witness the positive results of 200 years of progress in labor-management relations in the United States.

More than 400 exhibits at the 31st show—now an annual event that has toured major cities across the country—displayed the products and services of America's union members and their employers.

Skill and quality were the hallmarks of the exhibits, which ranged from hair styling and cake decorating to railroading and heavy construction.

The AFL-CIO's own exhibit was keyed to the "Working Americans" motif of the bicentennial year, a pictorial display of working life and the development of various crafts and trades over the nation's first two centuries.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland set the theme at an opening day luncheon when he described the event as "the main public showpiece of the labor movement" that reveals a side of labor-management relations "too seldom noted by the public or the press—trade unions and management working together constructively to promote their common interests."

"Sometimes we may not enjoy our relationship very much," Kirkland observed. "We are often in conflict on collective bargaining, economic, legislative and political issues. But we surely know that organized labor cannot live without free employers and that free management cannot endure for long in a society where free trade unionism does not flourish."

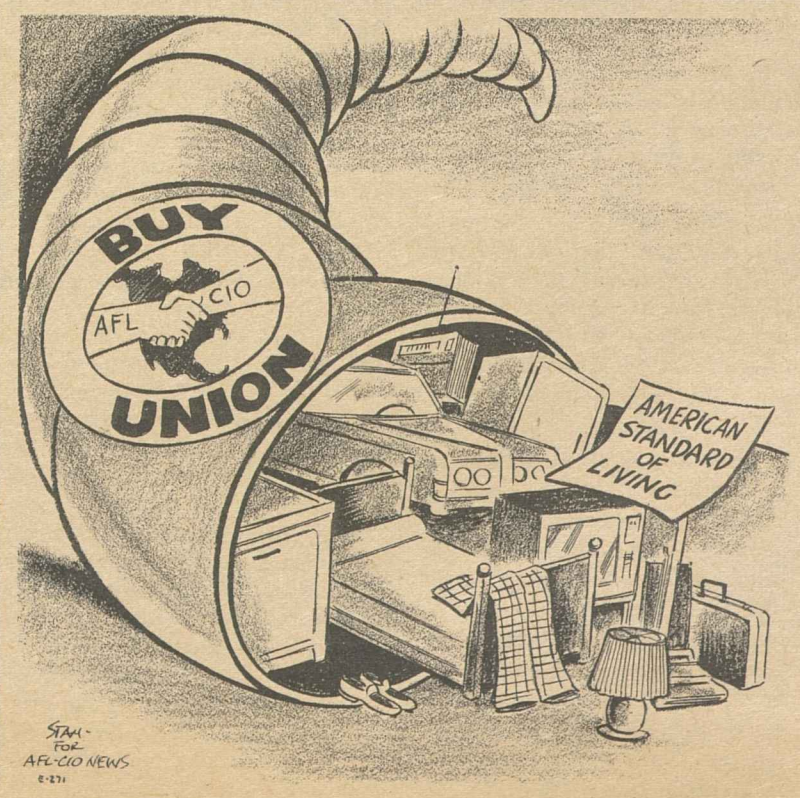
Stressing that there are more areas of common ground between labor and management than are generally realized, Kirkland disclosed that since the collapse of the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee with John Dunlop's resignation as Secretary of Labor — "forced by the duplicity of the Ford Administration" — both employer and union representatives on the committee have elected to continue their regular meetings on a private basis, with Dunlop as moderator.

"We have found a number of important issues," he said, "on which we are in fuller agreement with each other than we are with either the Administration or the Congress, such as housing and energy, and even some aspects of tax policy."

Kirkland said the philosophy represented by the Union-Industries Show "is a particularly American phenomenon which many of our trade union friends overseas — bound up by the doctrine of class struggle—find hard to understand." But he stressed, "that philosophy has worked and has produced the highest standard of living and the greatest free and democratic society in the world."

The show itself gave promise of being one of the most successful ever sponsored by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Show Director Earl D. McDavid, secretary-treasurer of the department, anticipated that upwards of a quarter-million visitors would view the exhibits at Houston's Albert Thomas Hall during the six-day run.

Many of them would come away with some of the $100,000 worth of prizes distributed at the admission-free show. On the opening day, for example, hundreds of Houston school children were bused to the show, and nearly all of them departed clutching bags of souvenirs, including prizes won at the Dolls, Toys & Playthings Workers' Booth.

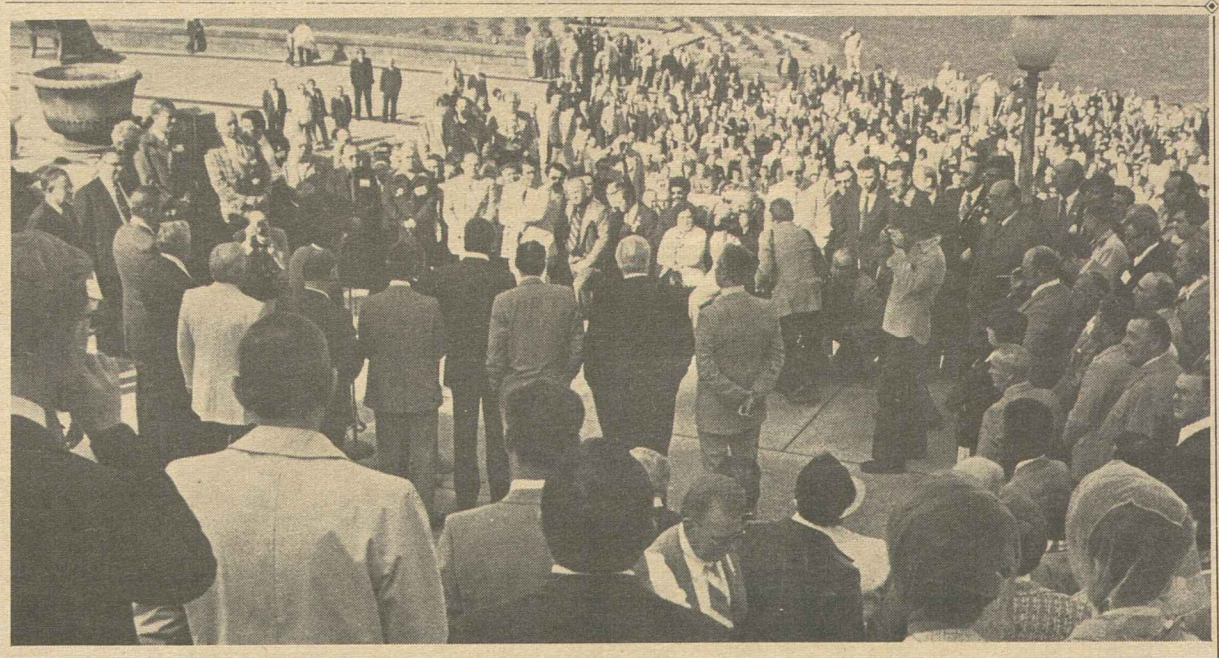


The shopping bags distributed to each visitor by the Retail Clerks, could contain such items as the embroidery and yarn products, sporting goods and first aid kits given away by the United Textile Workers, the family-size cuts of meat donated by the Butcher Workers, the digital thermometers offered by the Service Employees.

There were no free samples at the Treasury Dept. booth, but there was the first public display of the new $2 bill soon to be returned to the nation's currency.

On the service side, visitors could get their hair cut, shaped, tinted or what have you by union Barbers & Beauticians. They could watch metal sculpture by union Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, or witness paper being made by hand and posters being printed at the Graphic Arts exhibit.

The multiplicity of construction crafts was represented by working models of heavy equipment run by the Operating Engineers, a pint-size steel structure erected daily by the Iron Workers, apprenticeship skills demonstrated by the Carpenters and other building trades members.



Throughout the exhibition, visitors could wander leisurely through the vast hall as union Musicians offered live background entertainment, or pause to watch old movies at a theater run by the Theatrical Stage Employes, or stop to view the bag of tricks offered by a magician. For many, the show was magic in itself.

Building Trades Mobilize To Press Political Action

BUILDING TRADESMEN assemble in front of the U.S. Capitol to meet congressional leaders and testify before a number of Senate and House committees. President Robert Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. gave the congressional leadership copies of position papers and resolutions adopted by the 3,000 delegates at BCTD's 1976 National Jobs Conference.

Ford's Veto Endangers Day Care

By David L. Perlman

A presidential veto has jeopardized the future of many community day-care centers that look after children of low-income working mothers.

The bill President Ford vetoed would have given the states additional federal funds for social services, to be used to bring child care centers up to the standards set by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. The standards, required by a 1974 law, deal with safety and health features as well as the ratio of adult staff to children of various age groupings.

Ford said the legislation would be too "costly" and would violate his deep-felt "principle" that the federal government shouldn't tell states and cities what to do with federal funds.

Under the vetoed bill, centers would have been encouraged to hire welfare mothers to help out at day care centers—thus meeting staffing standards and providing useful work for people who need it.

Ford's veto, unless overridden by Congress, leaves the standards in effect but offers no help in meeting them.

The President's cost argument is the same he has used in most of his 47 previous vetoes, a list that includes the major job-creating bills passed by Congress.

Nor did the President break new ground when he protested that the bill offended his strong belief in leaving responsibility to states and cities "and the removing of burdensome federal restrictions."

The House put off until after the Easter Week recess an attempt to muster the two-thirds vote that would be needed to override the veto. While the bill passed the House by a 317-72 vote and the Senate by 59-30, voting patterns on amendments left doubts as to whether an override attempt would succeed.

In one of the early comments on the veto, Teachers President Albert Shanker termed Ford's message "illogical."

The staffing regulations that Ford considers "burdensome" will take effect anyway, Shanker noted. And "the veto will force some mothers to leave their jobs and go back on welfare since the day care centers that service their children will have to close."

Ford told Congress it should first suspend the HEW standards, which already have been postponed, and then adopt his "block grant" approach of letting states spend available federal funds as they wish.

Jobs Parley Rips Ford On Vetoes

By James M. Shevis

The nation's building and construction workers, strapped with a 16 percent jobless rate and denied employment opportunities by a succession of presidential vetoes, drew up a program of action to stabilize the economy and put the country back to work.

At a national jobs conference in Washington sponsored by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., over 3,000 delegates representing the country's 4 million building tradesmen attached first priority to political action to remove their industry from the depths of the depression that has engulfed it for the past two and a half years.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine charged in a keynote address that President Ford has become "one of the most negative and obstructionist presidents in the history of the United States."

Ford's "indiscriminate use of the veto power threatens not only to destroy those programs designed to help the working people of this country, but also thwarts the entire democratic process," Georgine warned.

One speaker, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), reminded delegates that Ford's vetoes of job opportunity measures have been as regular as clockwork in the 20 months since he became president. Now, he declared, it's time for construction workers to "veto Ford."

Williams, like others who preceded and followed him to the rostrum, sharply attacked the President for vetoing the construction-site picketing bill earlier this year,

State Laws Inadequate:

Federal Curb Asked Of Debt Harassment

A consumer protection bill outlawing "shoddy" harassment tactics by debt collectors was given a strong AFL-CIO endorsement at House hearings.

The labor-supported bill is sponsored by Rep. Frank Annunzio (D-Ill.) and six other members of the House Banking Committee. The seven cosponsors make up a solid majority of the Consumer Affairs subcommittee, which Annunzio heads.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the panel that most people "want to pay their debts and if given the opportunity will do so." But when unexpected expenses hit a family, "it is virtually impossible to avoid debt and debt problems."

Federal legislation is needed, Biemiller said, because many states have no protective laws or inadequate laws against bill collectors who "operate without scruples." In some cases, he said, consumers are harassed for alleged debts that may have been in error or already paid.

Under the Annunzio bill, unless a court order has been granted, a debt collector would be prohibited from communicating with the alleged debtor or his spouse:

- At the place of employment of the consumer or spouse.
- More than twice in any week.
- Before 8 a.m. or after 10 p.m.
- While the consumer is represented by a lawyer unless the lawyer has failed to respond to a communication.

Other prohibited practices include threatening phone calls, abusive or profane language, publication of lists of persons who allegedly refuse to pay debts, and false or misleading statements. Thus a debt collector couldn't falsely claim to be a government agent, a lawyer or an agent of a court. In seeking a current address for an alleged debtor, the collector couldn't communicate with any person except by phone and would have to properly identify himself.

On collection efforts involving amounts over $100, the debt collector would have to keep records

Senate Nears Showdown on Food Stamps

The Senate moved toward a showdown between a committee-approved food stamp bill designed to cut costs by reducing benefits, and a labor-endorsed substitute that would assure that low-income households would not have to pay more for food.

Administration proposals for bone-deep slashes in the food stamp program had only scattered support in the Senate. When Sen. Carl T. Curtis (R-Neb.) proposed a series of amendments to drastically reduce the scope of the program, he was beaten by margins ranging from 78-23 to 85-12.

The substitute bill, trimmed back somewhat in a compromise that brought it support from Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.), had unusually broad backing that crossed party and ideological lines.

'True' Jobless Rate Remains Above 10%

True unemployment in America remains in double figures—10.3 percent with 9.7 million persons out of work—AFL-CIO President George Meany pointed out as the Labor Dept. released its official jobless figures in March.

About the only good thing that can be said about the government's report is that unemployment is not feeding on unemployment, Meany observed.

Officially, the nation's jobless rate last month went to 7.5 percent from 7.6 percent in February. But based on the formula adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier in the year, the true rate is 10.3 percent, Meany said.

And, Meany warned, "despite all the politically-inspired rhetoric and optimistic predictions, unemployment remains America's Number One economic problem."

The AFL-CIO formula factors into its rate determination the number of persons who are too discouraged to seek work and those who are forced to work part-time because full-time jobs are not available. The Bureau of Labor Statistics counts only those who are fully unemployed and are actively seeking work.

Meany said that today's 9.7 million unemployed workers represent "a shocking waste of pro-

Court Rejects Attack On Use of Union Dues

A dissident group, financed by the National Right to Work Committee's legal defense foundation, was rebuffed by the Supreme Court in its effort to block a union's political and social action program.

The employer-aided foundation, acting on behalf of a handful of members of an Auto Workers local in Willow Springs, Ill., lost in federal district court and then in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit. The appellate decision became final when the Supreme Court refused to review it.

The dissidents sought to stop the UAW from using dues money for the union's Community Action Program or any other legislative, social action or political purpose. They claimed the union violated the Landrum-Griffin Act by spending money for unauthorized purposes and provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act dealing with political spending by unions.

In a decision last September, the appellate court found no grounds

'Substantial' Joblessness Persists in 131 Centers

The number of major labor areas in the country with substantial or persistent unemployment remained unchanged at 131—out of a possible 150—in March, the Labor Dept. announced.

However, 17 smaller areas were added to the department's substantial unemployment list during the month, bringing that total to 1,242. Of this number, 952 are considered areas of substantial joblessness, while 290 are on the persistent unemployment list.

As defined by the Labor Dept., substantial unemployment is a jobless rate of 6 percent or more which is expected to continue for at least two months.

Persistent unemployment is said to exist when an area's jobless rate has averaged 6 percent or more during the most recent calendar year, and has exceeded the national average by either 50 percent in three of the last four calendar years, 75 percent in two of the last three calendar years, or 100 percent in one of the last two calendar years.

The list of major job markets with 6 percent or more unemployment has remained at 131 since last December. The number peaked at 135 last September. In March of last year, the total was 105.

Firms located in areas of substantial unemployment may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts, provided they agree to select 25 percent of new hires each month from the area's disadvantaged residents.

Steelworkers Ask Shift Of Mine Safety Agency

Federal mine safety enforcement should be transferred to the Labor Dept. because the Interior Dept. cannot effectively regulate mine owners while at the same time promoting their interests, the Steelworkers told the Senate Labor Committee.

"Our union has consistently been disturbed over the conflict of interest inherent in the Dept. of Interior's role," USWA Vice President John S. Johns testified.

Johns also charged that since passage of the Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act there has been a steady stream of company officials shuttling back and forth between government enforcement jobs and the mining industry.

The USWA, which represents more than 100,000 miners in iron ore, nonferrous and quarry mines, has endorsed Senate legislation that would upgrade safety protection for the miners and shift the enforcement program to the Labor Dept. Forty senators have cosponsored the bill.

The committee initiated the hearings to look into the Scotia mine explosions that killed 23 coal miners and three federal inspectors in eastern Kentucky last month.

Frank McKee, director of USWA District 38, told the panel that the Mine Enforcement & Safety Administration in the Interior Dept. has been doing a feeble job of enforcing the law.

He said that the 1972 Sunshine mine disaster in Kellogg, Ida., which killed 91 USWA miners, "failed to bring about significant changes in either the law or in its administration. The lessons of Sunshine have gone unheeded."

Peter J. Benzoni, director of USWA District 33 which represents more than 15,000 miners in Michigan and Minnesota, said that MESA has been slow to act even when miners must work under dangerous conditions.

"Either the inspectors aren't doing their job, the safety standards they're supposed to be enforcing aren't strong enough, or the law protects the mining companies more than it does the workers they employ."

Johns warned that if MESA remains under Interior Dept. jurisdiction, its enforcement programs would continue to be ineffective. He said the fact that the fatality rate for metal and nonmetallic miners in 1974 was higher than when the safety law was enacted in 1966 reflects on MESA's performance record.

Although the fatality rate dropped last year, Johns said, "the fact cannot be escaped that 101 hard rock miners and 155 coal miners were killed on the job in 1975—and that is far from laudable."

Johns said the consolidation of all safety and health programs under one federal agency would be a step in the right direction of improving working conditions in the mines.

Mississippi Delegates Vote Per Capita Hike

Jackson, Miss.—Delegates to the Mississippi AFL-CIO's eighth biennial convention voted to increase the monthly per capita tax to 25 cents on the recommendation of the state federation's executive board, which cited the need to maintain effective legislative and political action programs.

The board also noted that increased operating expenses that had been exceeding income under a 20-cent per capita tax were draining the federation's financial reserves. The increase is the first since 1961.

The 306 delegates elected President Claude Ramsey Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight and other top officers to new two-year terms. New members elected to the executive board are Amey Hollowell of the Clothing Workers and Gerald Dempsey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The convention called for an expanded statewide organizing effort to improve wages and conditions for the unorganized and subsequently strengthen the labor movement's role in political affairs through an increase in membership.

Gov. Cliff Finch (D) praised the efforts of labor to improve the living standards of Mississippi's workers through effective collective bargaining and make the state more attractive for industry.

He appealed for labor's cooperation in state programs for economic expansion and to create better-paying jobs, stressing that "from now on, when we seek out new industry, cheap labor will not be a selling point."

In a major convention resolution, delegates called for an all-out effort to defeat President Ford in the November election, stressing that the Nixon-Ford economic policies have been disastrous for the nation.

Other major convention speakers included Lt. Gov. Evelyn Gandy, AFL-CIO Regional Director James Sala, Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Daniel A. Powell, COPE area director.

Backed By Political Action:

Operating Engineers Adopt Economic Recovery Program

By John R. Oravec

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Operating Engineers drew up a blueprint at the union's 30th quadrennial convention to help resolve the problems of high unemployment, energy shortages, slow economic recovery and presidential vetoes.

"Jobs are today's number one target," IUOE President J. C. Turner told the 920 convention delegates in his keynote address. He stressed that the union's and the nation's social and economic goals can be achieved through vigorous political action and legislative efforts.

To meet these objectives, the convention endorsed labor-backed programs calling for full employment, energy development, public work projects, national health insurance, and other action.

A major convention resolution, adopted unanimously by the delegates, provides for expanding legislative and political activities of the Engineer Political Education Committee, which is financed through voluntary contributions by union officials.

Thousands of dollars were raised through voluntary contributions for EPEC on the convention floor immediately following adoption of the resolution.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, addressing delegates on the first day of the four-day convention, assured the IUOE that the federation's Committee on Political Education is in excellent shape to carry out its objectives in the November election.

Meany said the nation could not take four more years of Nixon-Ford policies as conceived by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns.

"The President tells us that America can't afford to provide jobs for her people, can't afford to care for the sick, can't afford to feed the hungry, can't afford to do anything to keep our great cities from falling apart. . . . The only thing this counntry can't afford is four more years like the last seven."

Meany cited the problems of big cities, mass layoffs of municipal employes, cutbacks in services and the standard of living and a deteriorating commitment to freedom overseas.

"None of these facts seems to worry Mr. Ford," Meany said. "He has something more important to worry about. The one, unswerving policy that guides him day and night is to get nominated and elected for four more years."

In pursuit of that goal, Meany noted, Ford vetoed the construction-site picketing bill despite his earlier endorsement of the measure and repeated promises to sign it.

And despite the so-called "prudent fiscal management policies" of Nixon and Ford, the nation's money problems continue to mount, he said.

Deficits run up by Nixon and Ford through 1975 exceed the total net deficit of the previous 23 years, including two major wars, even though they have refused to provide funds for vitally needed social and jobs programs, Meany said.

"It isn't spending that's wrecking the American economy," he stressed. "It's unemployment — deliberately created and perpetuated by the Administration.

"The only policy that makes any sense in today's America is a policy of full employment. That is the AFL-CIO's number one priority," he said.

In his keynote address, Turner documented the problems of excessive unemployment among building trades craftsmen and stressed that "no nation can have prosperity unless it has a prosperous workforce."

Labor's fight for improvement in the jobs situation will continue until there are solid results, he said. "We must not be stopped by optimistic press releases proclaiming the end of the recession and the return of prosperity."

Comparing the gap between the government's official unemployment rate of 7.5 percent and the AFL-CIO's more comprehensive "real" jobless rate of more than 10 percent, Turner said that more jobs are urgently needed for both skilled and unskilled workers.

He said the White House forecast of a gradual decline in the official jobless rate to 6.7 percent next year and eventually to 5.2 percent would not do.

"This Administration thinks we will have to live with these kind of figures. They are completely unacceptable to the Operating Engineers and they are completely unacceptable to the American labor movement."

Turner called on Congress to take immediate action to enact the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill, designed to reduce the nation's jobless rate to 3 percent, and to press ahead with federal programs to revitalize the depressed housing industry.

Public works legislation that President Ford cancelled by a veto in February would have helped relieve the problem, Turner asserted.

"Public works is by no means a new device to find needed employment," he declared. "It is not a novel and untried method of creating jobs opportunities." He pointed out that such programs proved their effectiveness during the depression of the 1930s.

San Francisco Crafts Battle City Pay Slash

San Francisco—Some two thousand craftsmen here are battling the city and county of San Francisco over a program of pay cuts that total more than $5 million and average out at nearly $3,000 a year per worker.

The strike entered its second week without any break in the deadlock that has pitted 17 craft unions against a determined Board of Supervisors, the city's governing body.

The executive committee of the San Francisco Labor Council pledged full support to the striking unions and called for a citywide walkout on a date to be set "in coordination with all sectors of the labor movement of San Francisco."

Labor Council Sec.-Treas. John F. Crowley said each local union would have to determine, according to its own constitution, whether it would support the strike.

The dispute arose from a decision, initiated by the Board of Supervisors and validated by popular vote, to sever the direct link between private industry wages and conditions and those paid for comparable work by the city.

Wages were formerly set by adopting the wage rates and other compensation from prevailing private industry union agreements. Proposition B, advocated by the supervisors and enacted in a popular referendum last November, ended that practice.

When the supervisors' negotiator unveiled the city proposal, it called for pay cuts ranging from $2,700 a year for laborers to as much as $7,600 a year for cement masons.

In addition, the city proposed to discontinue recognition of any workweek less than 40 hours (some unions had 35); overtime would be cut from the longstanding double-time to time-and-a-half; shift differentials would be slashed; health and welfare payments, moved from private industry levels to city levels, would shift two-thirds of the premium to the employe; and new journeymen would hire in at 80 percent of the top rate and be required to work four years to achieve the full rate.

Short-lived negotiations failed to produce an agreement and the Board of Supervisors rejected a proposal to extend them. Instead, it adopted its own proposal as a salary ordinance and has since refused to discuss further any money items involved in the dispute.

Crowley summed it up: "The obvious goal of the Board of Supervisors in the current dispute is to emasculate, if it cannot totally destroy, collective bargaining in city employment."

ductive human resources that should and could be put to work building a healthy, balanced economy—an economy where recovery is determined in human terms."

Even at the official rate of 7.5 percent, current joblessness matches the peak of the 1958 recession. During the current recession—the deepest and longest since World War II—the unemployment rate rose as high as 8.9 percent.

Approximately 3.5 million workers were employed part-time "for economic reasons" in March, BLS reported. While the government fails to count the time they spend not working as part of the nation's jobless rate, the AFL-CIO uses the conservative measure of 50 percent of their time as unemployed.

Similarly, BLS does not classify discouraged workers as unemployed members of the labor force but the AFL-CIO does. The number of discouraged workers in the first quarter of 1976 totaled about 940,000, BLS said.

The BLS report showed that total employment in March increased by 375,000 to 86.7 million, seasonally adjusted. The March gain occurred largely among adult women.

The civilian labor force, meanwhile, rose by 260,000 to 93.7 million workers, after holding steady in February. The number of persons officially classified as unemployed totaled 7 million, the government said.

The jobless rates for all worker groups remained about the same as in February, although the rate for blacks fell from 13.7 to 12.5 percent. The drop was due mainly to increased employment among black women.

For adult men, the rate last month was 7.5 percent. The rate was 7.3 percent for women and 19.1 percent for teenagers. Jobless rates for other categories were 6.8 percent for whites, 5 percent for household heads, 4.1 percent for married men and 7 percent for full-time workers.

For the first time, BLS gave unemployment figures for both male and female household heads: 9.4 percent for women and 4 percent for men.

Jobless rates for most occupational and industry groups also were little changed from February.

Employment in contract construction remained in the doldrums in March, however, with the jobless rate for the industry rising from 15.5 percent to 16 percent.

"At 3.3 million, construction has shown no improvement dur- the recovery period, remaining 770,000 below the February 1974 pre-recession high," the government said.

The average duration of unemployment fell for the second straight month to 15.8 weeks in March, down from 16.2 weeks in the previous month. Hard-core unemployment — joblessness of 27 weeks or more—affected 20.4 percent of unemployed workers in March, compared to 22.1 percent in February.

for a Landrum-Griffin Act challenge, noting that the purposes for which union funds were spent were in accord with the thrust of positions taken by the union and its convention.

Further, the court stressed that the Auto Workers had acceptable constitutional procedures for a member to obtain a rebate of the portion fo his dues expended for political purposes.

The appellate court also ruled that private parties could not initiate a criminal procedure under the Corrupt Practices Act. Its enforcement is up to government agencies.

While the appellate court decision is not formally binding on other circuits, union attorneys anticipate similar results in several other harassment suits financed by the open-shop foundation.

Still pending in federal court is a charge brought by 10 unions that the National Right to Work legal foundation is in violation of a section of the Landrum-Griffin Act that prohibits an interested employer or employer association from financing litigation by union members against their unions.

The open-shop group has sought to avoid complying with a court order to divulge its contributors and their corporate ties.

Network Strike-Lockout On Mediation Channel

The National Broadcasting Co. and negotiators for about 1,700 striking television and radio technicians and newswriters agreed to meet with a federal mediator in an attempt to resolve their 10-day-old contract dispute over wages.

The NBC workers, represented by the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians, had agreed to go back to their jobs on Apr. 7 while negotiations resumed, but were barred by the company when they returned.

The reason for the lockout, according to the union, was the company's insistence on certain conditions, including protection against what NBC described as "further sabotage."

Just prior to the start of the strike on Apr. 1, NBC charged that "extensive sabotage" was done to its New York City studios. NABET disclaimed any knowledge of how the damage "may or may not have happened."

NABET President Edward M. Lynch said NBC's new sabotage charge was a "cheap excuse" to avoid meaningful bargaining. He said the company has stalled throughout the negotiations.

Workers, including studio engineers, newswriters and the operators of camera, light and sound equipment for NBC news and sports operations, are involved in the dispute at the company's broadcast facilities in Los Angeles, New York, Cleveland, San Francisco, Washington, D.C., and Chicago.

In Chicago, where NABET members were barred by private guards from returning to work, Mayor Richard J. Daley and the City Council joined in a blistering denunciation of the company.

Labor Joins In Salute to Roy Wilkins

The AFL-CIO joined in a warm tribute to Roy Wilkins and the organization he has led for more than 20 years—the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, better known as the NAACP.

Wilkins will retire later this year as executive director of the NAACP, and George Meany was a co-chairman of a dinner in his honor. It combined a salute to Wilkins with a broad-based fund-raising drive to help the NAACP overcome a recession-bred deficit.

Meany's executive assistant, Thomas R. Donahue, expressed the AFL-CIO's admiration for "an old friend and staunch ally."

Wilkins became director of the NAACP in 1955, the year of the AFL-CIO merger, Donahue noted. And the intervening years have been marked by major "victories in the fight for equal rights."

In all these battles, Donahue said, the AFL-CIO "was proud to join with the NAACP." He cited the campaign for the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and especially the successful insistence that it include a fair employment provision.

The NAACP and the AFL-CIO worked together to block Senate confirmation of former President Nixon's "racist" appointees to the Supreme Court, Donahue recalled. And both groups were on the same side in the recent Supreme Court decision allowing retroactive seniority adjustments for persons illegally denied jobs.

Donahue told the gathering that labor and the NAACP "are fighting today for an economic and political program that will make equal opportunity a reality for all Americans."

Further, he stressed, "we share a great many members and friends, and we certainly share the same enemies." And "above all" is a shared conviction "that this country and its economic and social system can be made to work for the benefit of all. We believe that equal rights and equal opportunity are not only possible but necessary and, above all, achievable."

ULLICO Assets Rise To Set Record High

New York—Assets of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. increased by 26.8 percent in 1975 to a record year-end total of $234,216,045, ULLICO President Rudolph Ellis announced.

Ralph A. Leigon Named New Secretary of IBEW

Ralph A. Leigon was appointed secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers by IBEW President Charles H. Pillard.

Leigon succeeds Joseph D. Keenan, who had held the position since 1954. The change in office was necessitated by a mandate of the union's 1974 convention requiring the retirement of international officers and representatives who are 65 or older.

Also affected by the mandate were five district vice presidents and the chairman of the union's executive council.

Leigon, who assumed his new duties Apr. 1, had been serving as an executive council member representing 10 western states. Since June 1974, he also served as secretary of the council.

Leigon began his IBEW career in 1946 when he joined Local 357 in Las Vegas, Nev. He became the local's business manager in 1950, serving in that capacity until 1969. He was president of the Nevada State AFL-CIO from 1958 to 1963.

Leigon was appointed to the union's executive council in 1960, and was elected and re-elected at subsequent conventions.

Leigon also served on the Nevada Employment Security Advisory Board and on the Nevada State Board of Education.

Also retiring were Vice Presidents A. R. Johnson, J. B. Pate, S. E. Thompson, Frank Gladney and Robert Garrity, and Executive Council Chairman E. J. Fransway. As authorized by the union's constitution, Pillard named new officers to fill the vacancies. The appointees were approved by the executive council.

International representatives named as vice presidents are John Barry, Dan Waters, Lawrence Farnan, and Andrew Ripp, along with Jack Moore, who was serving as business manager of Local 453, Springfield, Mo., and also as a member of the executive council.

Wesley I. Taylor, business agent of Local 481 in Indianapolis, was named to replace Fransway as chairman of the council.

Two new council members also were appointed. They are Robert Missey, business manager of Local 2 in St. Louis, and S. R. McCann, business manager of Local 302 in Pleasant Hill, Calif.

International officers of the IBEW are nominated and elected at the union's quadrennial conventions. The next convention is scheduled for 1978.

Curbs Sought On Tactics in Bill Collection covering all phases of the collection steps.

Biemiller told the subcommittee that high unemployment has plunged many people into debt who "are not deadbeats . . . and should be helped, not harassed."

He praised a section of the bill requiring the collection agency to fully inform a debtor of all possible means of repayment, including partial payment where it has been authorized.

"Scare tactics and deception are not necessary tools of the collection business to assure payment of debts," Biemiller stressed. "As thousands of legitimate collection agencies have proved for years, debts can be collected honestly, above board, and without harassing debt-ridden individuals and their families."

Biemiller reminded the panel that warnings that the bill would put legitimate collection firms out of business are of the same type heard when Congress was considering truth-in-lending and fair credit reporting legislation.

If the scare warnings had been allowed to block the legislation then, he said, "the consumer would still have no protection from incorrect credit reports and false advertising."

Seven Lean Years

MR. FORD SAYS OUR TROUBLES are over. He says his policies are working just fine. If we stick with them just a little longer, if we accept a few more years of high unemployment, stagnation and do-nothingism, everything will be just great. Well, don't you believe it.

The President tells us that America can't afford to provide jobs for her people, can't afford to care for the sick, can't afford to feed the hungry, can't afford to do anything to keep our cities from falling apart. Well, don't you believe that, either. The only thing this country can't afford is four more years like the last seven.

What have these seven years brought us? Industrial production is still around 30 percent below capacity. True unemployment stands at 9.7 million or 10.3 percent of the workforce, if you include the discouraged workers and the partially unemployed workers who are ignored in the government's statistics.

Construction is still limping along at depression levels. The nation's largest city hangs on the brink of bankruptcy and other state and city governments are near disaster. Millions are running out of unemployment insurance. Teachers and social workers, hospital workers, policemen, firefighters and sanitation workers are being laid off.

All of the services Americans have a right to expect from their government—services they pay for—services they need—are being cut to the bone. The American standard of living is falling. The quality of American life is deteriorating. The American commitment to freedom and America's credibility in the eyes of the world is shrinking to the vanishing point.

FOR COUNTLESS YEARS plenty of people have said "We have reached our limit, we can do no more, we can solve no other problems." A hundred years ago they wanted to close the U.S. Patent Office because they said every conceivable invention had been invented, and there was no place else to go. Well, they were wrong.

And President Ford is wrong when he says America can't afford jobs for its workers, can't afford to feed the hungry, care for the sick and educate its children decently.

We in labor don't buy that. We are looking forward, not backward. We want a better life for all. We are certain it can be achieved. We are looking for political leaders who will move the country ahead.

We say it's time to shake off the counsels of defeat and despair, time to get moving, time to get back to the job of building this country, making it fit for all its citizens to live in and grow in.

We have had seven lean years, but there are better days ahead—provided only that we do our job between now and Election Day.

That job is simply to see to it that all union members and their families are registered to vote; that they know the candidates and the issues; the platforms and the voting records; and that they go to the polls and vote Nov. 2.

The labor movement has never been in better shape. Our political arm, COPE, has never been better equipped to do its job. I have every confidence that labor is going to do its part to get America back on the rails again.

A Word Edgewise:

Terms Liberal, Conservative Pose Paradox for Dogmatists

By John P. Roche

PAT BUCHANAN AND OTHER conservative commentators are spending a good deal of time meditating on the paradoxical behavior of the American people who keep electing "liberals" to office while telling pollsters they are "conservatives." I have the same problem at the other end of the spectrum: readers write to inquire how I can support a strong military posture and still consider myself a "liberal." I think the answer to this seeming paradox lies in the fact that the population of the United States is profoundly anti-ideological.

Thus when conservatism is perceived as an ideology, as "Conservatism" with a capital C, the people take off on the run. In the 1964 campaign, for example, I worked long and hard on speeches indicating Sen. Barry Goldwater was a "radical," and—with a good deal of help from Barry—the label stuck. Once the polls indicated Goldwater was considered "radical," I wanted to close down the campaign and take a vacation until Election Day. President Johnson and vice presidential candidate Hubert Humphrey, alas, had other plans though I doubt if a voter changed his mind as a consequence of our October overkill.

Similarly, in 1972 Sen. George McGovern was a dead duck from the moment the Democratic convention opened. All over the country serious citizens, most of them Democrats, were watching that incredible zoo and asking themselves, "Am I supposed to let those clowns run the country?"

It is hardly a state secret that Richard Nixon, even before Watergate, was not our most beloved politician, but his election was based on the electorate's perception of McGovern as a "radical." Indeed, one of the things that most puzzled me was the unbelievable full-court press Nixon launched—every $100 bill in the country must have been in one of his satchels. I guess that like Johnson in 1964 he wanted to get 90 percent of the vote.

In other words, as long as liberalism was considered a common-sense, amorphous heritage of the New Deal and Fair Deal—a body of specific progressive proposals in the areas of civil rights, Medicare, improved labor relations, and the rest of the shopping list—the sovereign people supported it and, when polled, a majority would accept the liberal label. Moreover, to this day they elect representatives, senators, governors, and other state officials largely by that old compass.

However, in the last decade the commanding heights of official "Liberalism" (with that capital L) have been seized by a collection of left-wing Mad Hatters. I just finished rereading the draft Democratic platform for the 1964 campaign prepared in booklet form by Americans for Democratic Action; as ADA National Chairman, I presented it to the Platform committees in Atlantic City. In most respects it reflects completely the contemporary views of Sen. Henry Jackson, who like myself has been accused of deserting the old liberal cause.

The real question is, who are the deserters? And unfortunately the answer is the characters who dominate the media, who have been anointed by each other as official proclaimers of "Liberal" dogma, and accepted in their apostolic roles by the press and television.

WHAT EMERGES FROM THIS is the following scenario: the average American learns that the "Liberals" in Congress are jumping up and down trying to cut the defense budget. He hears that the "Liberals" are out to eviscerate our foreign and domestic intelligence organizations. He discovers that the "Liberals" think we should trust the Soviets. His (or her) response? "Those Liberals are out of their cotton-picking minds!" A week or so later, some of these individuals may be asked, "Do you consider yourself a liberal or a conservative?" and, like one of Pavlov's pups, they react automatically: "conservative." (Note the small c.)

This doesn't mean they are going to rush off to their nearest newstand and buy The Conservative Digest; they are viscerally reacting to the inane image the professional "Liberals" have projected.

You don't have to believe me; let's take a quick look at a recent New York Times poll. Seventy percent believed the federal government should provide a job for everyone while 50 percnt suspected detente and 52 percent opposed reducing the military budget. This is the profile of a small l liberal.

Pay Incentives Not Enough:

Public Productivity Bargaining Requires Solid Contract Base

The following is excerpted from "Public Productivity Tied to Bargaining" by Rudy Oswald which appears in the March 1976 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

MANY ELEMENTS of traditional contracts form the necessary basis for future productivity gains. Wages, employe benefits and working conditions are the cornerstones of all labor-management negotiations. If the basic elements of the contract are not equitable, then there is no basis for building a productivity bargain. Low governmental salaries will not be alleviated by the mere introduction of an incentive pay plan built upon an unfair wage structure.

Similarly, a well developed grievance procedure, in which the worker can turn to a union for protection, is also necessary for establishing a background for productivity bargaining. Even such basic elements of the collective bargaining agreement as seniority clauses affect morale and productivity. For example, the job security that the contract itself provides is a factor in employe morale, which is so crucial to high productivity. The use of seniority in assigning work routes and overtime schedules often eliminates favoritism and discrimination by the supervisor.

Studies of worker fatigue conducted during World War II showed that long working hours not only led to declining marginal productivity, but to overall reduced efficiency as well. Thus the contract limitations on hours of work and overtime may often be a factor in improving overall productivity gains.

Contract clauses dealing with safety and health or other working conditions also affect morale and productivity. An example would be a clause requiring management to provide rain gear to sanitation workers. Such protection would most likely also cut down on illness and the resulting absenteeism.

Productivity bargaining is basically just another element in bargaining dealing with methods for improving productivity. In reviewing present work practice and procedures, the bargaining committee may recommend more efficient ways to get the tasks done. This may involve changes in traditional occupations, work jurisdictions, job rights or established customs. These are very sensitive areas, and need to be treated cautiously. Work patterns develop a certain tradition, and become institutionalized as "past practice." Further, the changes proposed may pose a threat of unemployment or reduced income to the incumbent job holder.

The workers know more about how their tasks are actually being performed than any job analyst, or even most superiors. They are in an ideal position for recommending effective improvements in the operation—so there should also be a positive motivation for the worker to recommend productivity improvements. That motivation should be a provision that the workers will share in whatever savings result.

If productivity bargaining becomes nothing more than a budget-cutting device, then the whole notion may just as well be discarded. Such an emphasis would assure employe opposition and resentment. Rather, the approach must be attuned to the needs and aspirations of the workers, and not be just another "incentive" type program.

The gains of productivity improvement must be shared, but that is not the same as advocating the installation of wage-incentive plans. On the contrary, incentive plans in the long run are counter-productive. It is no advance to adopt in the public sector in the 1970s the precepts that Frederick Taylor introduced into the private sector over a half century earlier, and which have subsequently been largely rejected by private industry. Establishing incentive pay plans is particularly difficult in governmental operations because of the absence of adequate measurements for characterizing and evaluating the performance of public jobs.

Individual pay incentive systems have historically been fraught with serious abuses in private industry, and there is no reason to believe that governmental entities will not be similarly plagued. Such systems have frequently led to the hated "speed-ups" and "sweatshop" conditions that have so alienated workers throughout the 19th and 20th centuries.

A MORE POSITIVE APPROACH towards improving productivity is by making the job more interesting, challenging, rewarding, or convenient. The considerable attention that has begun to focus on job enrichment programs over the past few years has brought a new concern for the needs and aspirations of workers. Such an emphasis frequently results in increased productivity, even if productivity has not been the stated goal of the job enrichment programs.

Collective bargaining itself enhances job satisfaction by giving the worker a voice in the determination of his conditions. Then as collective bargaining expands to additional areas, and to include productivity bargaining, the scope of the worker's input expands and takes on a broader role in the joint determination of the work environment.

The attention of the bargainers may turn to redesign of individual jobs in order to provide more varied and satisfying assignments, or to job rotation, so that the worker sees the larger framework in which his job is slotted.

Budget Hold-Down Scored:

Mismanagement, Lack of Funds Seen Underlying 'Postal Mess'

FURTHER RATE HIKES and service cutbacks won't cure the "postal mess' that has stemmed from mismanagement and the Administration's refusal to fight for adequate funding for the U.S. Postal Service, President Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers declared in a network radio interview.

Filbey scored President Ford's election year budget hold-down as a short-sighted move that has thrown the Postal Service issue into the "political framework . . . in the presidential campaign" and put a damper on congressional efforts to restore "the kind of (mail) service that the American public is used to and deserves to have."

He said that high rates and poor management have combined to cut the volume of mail and foster inefficient use of the postal workforce and facilities intended to boost the speed and efficiency of the service.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Filbey renewed the call for passage of the bill shaped by Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) to provide a reasonable subsidy to the Postal Service in each of the next three years. The measure also would establish a high-level commission to make a top-to-bottom study of the service, assess its needs and propose remedies. Filbey said that a long-range approach stands a much better chance of giving the Postal Service the ability to meet its responsibilities than stop-gap proposals urged by Administration spokesmen, such as cutting mail service to as few as three days a week.

Filbey, a vice president of the AFL-CIO, said the APWU and other postal unions have mounted a campaign to focus public attention and understanding on the real causes of the "mess" that now plagues the Postal Service. He said that because postal employes are those most often in direct contact with the public-at-large, they are often blamed for the ills of the system. But, he stressed, poor management that fails to use the "tremendous amount of flexibility" it has available bears much of the responsibility for mounting costs and deteriorating service.

Reporters questioning Filbey on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview were Donald Barnes, an editor of Press Associates, Inc. and Arthur Brandel, editor and publisher of Post Age. The program is aired Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

CONGRESS HAS AN opportunity this year to add yet another important page to the history of America's constitutional right to vote. Federal legislation providing for uniform voter registration by mail stands on the verge of passage.

A number of states have enacted their own laws in the long struggle toward a system of simple and easy voter registration. But enactment of a uniform, federal law is long overdue.

A federal law providing for registration by mail would invite full voter participation by millions of Americans who have been virtually disenfranchised because of a maze of unnecessary barriers.

Sick and disabled Americans, those without decent transportation and those who have to take a day off without pay to register are paying a very stiff penalty for factors they can't control. They are prevented from exercising their constitutional right to vote because of artificial obstructions.

Progress has been made over the years in extending this right to everyone. But most thoughtful Americans feel that one of the last big barriers to full participation is the requirement that a prospective voter personally appear at the county courthouse or city hall to register to vote.

However, this barrier is already beginning to crack. Many states are enacting their own laws—14 at last count—and the courts are upholding the constitutionality of these state laws.

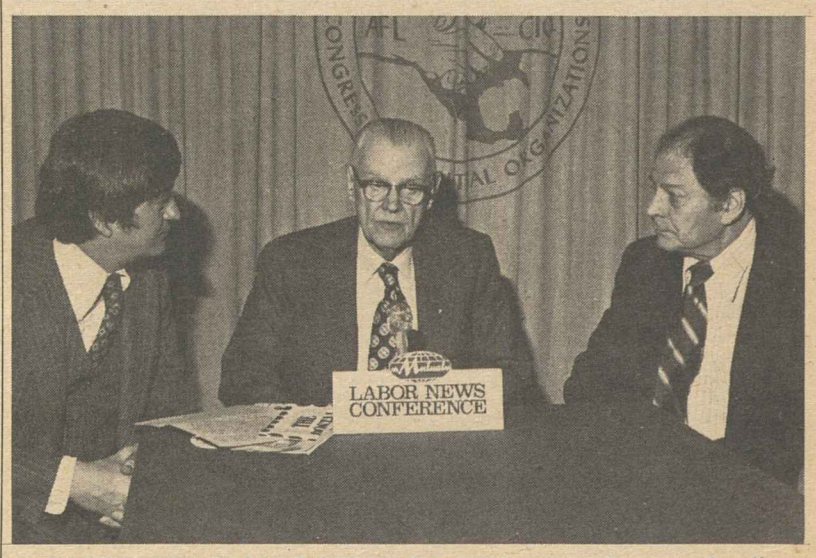
A recent ruling by New York State's highest court held that the state's new voter registration by mail law did not violate an 1894 law stipulating registrations "by personal application only."

The history of the nation's struggle to bring this fundamental right to all its citizens is spotty at best. In 1827, only white male landowners could vote. Women could not vote until 1920 and blacks and other minorities were virtually disenfranchised until the 1964 Voting Rights Act brought them into greater participation.

THE PRINCIPAL OPPOSITION to a federal voter-registration-by-mail law has come from conservative Republicans. Publicly they say they oppose such a law because it will give rise to incidents of election fraud and will create additional paperwork.

Privately, however, they believe that such a law would put on the voter rolls the poor and ethnic minorities who tend to register as Democrats.

Practically everyone else supports this legislation—organized labor, civil rights groups, most Democrats and the League of Women Voters.



The arguments raised against mail registration have been refuted by a Ford Foundation study of the 14 states that already have registration-by-mail laws.

The incidence of fraud does not increase, as opponents of the law claim. Only one case of deliberate fraud was uncovered in studies covering Maryland and Minnesota.

Nor is mail registration more costly than traditional procedures. In fact, the study shows it is less costly. The average cost before registration by mail was $1.54 per registration. In 1974, under the new procedures, the average cost dropped to $1.09 per registration.

The study also reveals that administration of the law is not more complex. It actually eases administration, particularly by avoiding the last-minute registration rush and the burden it imposes on election officials.

The chances look good this year for passage of a federal voter-registration-by-mail law. There are some differences between pending Senate and House bills but it is expected that these can be resolved.

ADMINISTRATION REFUSAL to fight for adequate funding has thrown the U.S. Postal Service into a "mess" that won't be cured by more rate hikes and service cutbacks, Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers Union charged on Labor News Conference. Filbey, center, was questioned by Donald Barnes, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Arthur Brandel of Post Age. The AFL-CIO public service interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Key Vote on Election Commission Bill

The House on Apr. 1 defeated, 220-175, a labor-opposed amendment to the Federal Election Commission bill by Rep. Charles E. Wiggins (R-Calif.). It would have required local unions to report all costs involved in communicating with members on election-related matters, ranging from non-partisan voter registration drives to a union newspaper's listing of endorsed candidates.

Wrong votes (W) for the amendment were cast by 130 Republicans and 45 Democrats. Voting right (R) were 214 Democrats and 6 Republicans.

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Ford Is Chief Target:

Building Trades Parley Gives Top Priority to Political Drive

after pledging to sign it.

Georgine told the delegates that he, for one, would not sit by idly and watch the country "drift leaderless on the rocks of despair." He urged building tradesmen in every state of the union to seek Ford's defeat if he should be the Republican nominee in November.

"I'm unwilling to remain silent and passive against vetoes of jobs, vetoes of housing, vetoes of vocational rehabilitation, vetoes of food for children, vetoes for educational opportunities for boys and girls, vetoes of programs to help the elderly—vetoes, vetoes, vetoes — telling America what we can't afford to do," Georgine declared.

"We need a president of the United States who stops telling us what we can't do, starts telling us what we can do, and then provides us the kind of leadership to show us the way to get it done."

That kind of leadership will not be forthcoming from the Republican Party, Georgine said, adding: "We have nowhere to turn but to the Democratic Party."

At the end of the two-day conference, delegates were briefed on what they could do to elect "the right people" to Congress and the White House this fall. They were brought up to date on campaign financing and the new election reform law, and urged to go all out to improve their voter-registration and voter-turnout techniques.

During the meeting, position papers on a number of areas crucial to the construction industry were presented by the presidents of the 17 unions affiliated with the BCTD. Legislative proposals based on the position papers were adopted, covering housing, energy, public works, environment, multi-employer pensions, job safety and health, labor standards and transportation.

Large numbers of the building tradesmen went to the U.S. Capitol in a fleet of buses to urge congressmen to work for passage of the BCTD program. While there, BCTD leaders presented the department's policy stand in testimony before several Senate and House committees.

Both Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) drew rousing ovations when they addressed the conference. Jackson cited unemployment in the building trades as high as 70 percent in some cities as one of the problems he wants to solve if elected president.

Humphrey, who is not a candidate for the presidency, told his audience he came only to "fortify" the message that Jackson and the BCTD union presidents had delivered earlier against President Ford's economic policies.

Referring to the President's Council of Economic Advisers as "witch doctors" who have no idea how to get Americans back to work, he thundered:

"If they don't know how to do it, I say let them get out of the way and let someone in there who does know how to do it."

Humphrey, the chairman of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, charged that "we have a government that stands there like a stunned ox, paralyzed and unwilling to do anything" about the high unemployment which it forecasts for the rest of the decade.

Humphrey has introduced a bill in the Senate to achieve full employment and balanced economic growth. The measure, co-sponsored in the House by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), aims at reducing unemployment to about 3 percent in four years. It has the solid support of organized labor.

"A commitment to supporting and passing the Humphrey-Hawkins bill should be the major test the voters should use in determining their decisions in November," the conference declared in a statement.

Williams, who chairs the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, discussed the new public works bill pending before the Senate. Although scaled down from last year's measure, the $2.4 billion that it would authorize would give the building trades a tremendous boost, he said.

Also pending in Congress, Williams noted, is a new public service jobs bill, and details of a housing measure are now being worked out.

A highlight of the conference was a panel discussion of 1976 presidential politics by three Washington news commentators, Martin Agronsky, Hugh Sidey and George Will. In response to a delegate's question, both Sidey and Will said that a Democrat has the best chance of winning the White House this year.

A panel on campaign financing featured AFL-CIO Special Council Laurence Gold and Thomas E. Harris, a member of the Federal Election Commission. They discussed how unions and corporations can solicit and contribute money to political candidates.

"Everything we know indicates that corporations are going to have a visible effect" in this year's elections, said Gold, urging delegates to step up their efforts in the political arena.

Daniel Mundy, BCTD's director of legislation, said that organized labor must seek to return to Congress those who have helped labor in its battles thus far, and work for Ford's defeat in November.

Jack Curran, director of legislation for the Laborers, emphasized the need for BCTD affiliates to mount a coordinated political campaign, working closely with the department and the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Others who addressed the conference were Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), Rep. John L. Burton (D-Calif.), and Louis Sherman, BCTD general counsel.

THE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY is still in the throes of a severe recession, with unemployment at 16 percent nationally—the highest of any major industry, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Dept. told delegates to a national jobs conference. Georgine lashed out at the Ford Administration for its go-slow and do-nothing economic policies that are keeping millions of Americans out of work.

Democratic Primaries Yield Mixed Returns

The Democrats' first double event of the presidential primary season produced mixed results that cast the Apr. 27 Pennsylvania race as the biggest showdown thus far.

Former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia won a close race in Wisconsin to run his string of victories to six of the first eight as Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington won in New York to continue as the only Democrat so far to beat Carter.

In Wisconsin, President Gerald Ford defeated Ronald Reagan for the sixth time in seven races, with the GOP focus shifting to May 1 in Texas. Reagan, the former governor of California, was already there campaigning as Ford bested him, 55 percent to 44 percent, to sweep all 45 delegates at stake in Wisconsin.

Jackson scored the biggest delegate haul of the twin primaries, taking 104, or 38 percent of the 274 delegates at stake in New York. Carter won 26 delegates in Wisconsin to 25 for Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona.

Carter garnered that one-delegate edge by beating Udall by 8,500 votes of almost 700,000 cast. His narrow margin developed in the post-midnight count of rural paper ballots. Udall had made a victory statement earlier on the basis of results from the major cities and televised network projections.

Carter, Udall and Jackson each had varying degrees of labor support in Wisconsin, as did Jackson and Udall in New York.

Jackson's 104 delegate total in New York was followed by 70 for Udall, 65 on various uncommitted slates and 35 for Carter. In Wisconsin, Jackson got 7 percent of the vote, trailing the 13 percent won by Alabama Gov. George Wallace. The Wisconsin results gave Wallace 10 delegates, Jackson six and anti-abortion candidate Ellen McCormack one of the state's total of 68.

Reagan won three of the 154 GOP delegates at stake in New York, where the slates were so dominated by party regulars led by Vice President Nelson Rockefeller that neither Reagan nor Ford campaigned in the state.

The New York and Wisconsin primaries moved Carter to an overall total of about 285 committed convention votes if his preliminary showing in the recent Virginia and Kansas caucuses hold up in later stages.

Jackson now has 230 delegates, about the same as are uncommitted. The bulk of Jackson's delegates came from his victory in Massachusetts, the only other primary which Carter has lost. Udall's 95 delegate harvest from New York and Wisconsin moved him near 125, while Wallace—consistently second to Carter after the early caucuses and primaries—is now fourth with around 100 delegates.

Wallace announced another sizable cut in his campaign staff on the day after the Wisconsin voting, but said he will continue in the race.

Former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris, meanwhile, announced he would quit active campaigning in primaries and caucuses, but would continue to seek support among uncommitted delegates. Harris previously abandoned his Wisconsin effort, but had said he would concentrate on Pennsylvania. Harris is the sixth Democratic candidate to partially or completely withdraw from the campaign.

The big "uncommitted" vote in New York—65 delegates—represents a hodge-podge of the original slates backed by Gov. Hugh Carey and filed before the law change that let the presidential candidates' names appear with the delegates' names on the ballot; the remnants of the full 39 slates Sen. Birch Bayh had filed, most of whom were merged with Udall after Bayh withdrew; and several slates that were openly declaring for Sen. Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota late in the campaign.

It takes 1,505 convention votes to win the Democratic nomination and primaries and caucuses yet to come will determine another 1,831, or 62 percent of the total. So many filing deadlines have passed, however, that less than 200 slots are still open.

The next test for the Democrats, in Pennsylvania Apr. 27, will add another new twist—delegates selected by state senate district instead of by congressional district. There will be a statewide, nonbinding presidential preference in Pennsylvania, the so-called "beauty contest," but it will have no bearing on delegate selection.

Senate Vote to Kill No-Fault Insurance

The Senate on Mar. 31 voted to recommit and thus kill a no-fault auto insurance bill that the AFL-CIO strongly supported. A labor-supported motion to reconsider the vote and keep the bill on the Senate floor was beaten, 47-45.

Board Remedies Inadequate:

Major Firms Cited As NLRB Scofflaws

It will take more than a slap on the wrist from the National Labor Relations Board to keep hostile employers from violating federal labor law, union witnesses testified.

A House Labor subcommittee, headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), listened to first-hand reports of union-busting by the Dow Chemical Co. and by smaller but equally virulent employers.

Bernard Emrick, a district director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Wayne Runyon, president of the OCAW's Hanging Rock, Ohio, local, told of Dow's continuing campaign to oust the union from the bargaining rights it won in 1959.

When the last contract ran out a year ago, Emrick testified, a decertification petition was filed by an individual represented by the same law firm that had represented the company during a 1971 strike.

The union defeated the decertification move, but Dow filed a series of objections. "To date, Dow has lost all legal maneuvers available to them," Emrick said, but its appeal is still pending nearly a year after the vote Meanwhile, it has refused to bargain and has unilaterally put wage increases into effect.

Runyon testified to a "barrage of propaganda, promises, outright threats" before the decertification vote from "almost every supervisor and foreman, and from higher ranking Dow executives from outside our plant." He said the campaign ended with "a lavish election eve party" given by the company.

During the past year, he said, "the company has not recognized that a local union exists and has refused to withhold union dues" in obvious preparation for another decertification effort against a weakened union.

The business manager of an Operating Engineers local at Freeport, Tex., Thomas B. Crow, told the panel that Dow's union-busting wasn't confined to the Ohio plant.

He spoke feelingly of continuing company efforts "to destroy organized labor and to discriminate against our union members." Crow said he spoke from the experience of having "negotiated, grieved, arbitrated, filed charges, witnessed abuses and been abused by this company on a day to day basis since 1952."

Two Texas labor attorneys testified also to the company's attitudes. Attorney J. Monty Bray said the company "uses the grievance and arbitration procedure as a method of frustrating the whole bargaining process," forcing a union into hundreds of costly arbitrations.

As the hearings continued, other unions spoke of the tactics used by other employers to frustrate the National Labor Relations Act.

An attorney for the Allied Industrial Workers, Kenneth R. Loebel, said the fact that the NLRB does not deal effectively with employers who repeatedly violate the law gives an incentive for still further violations.

He cited Litton Industries as a firm that he said has exhibited a "pattern of conduct" in violation of workers' rights. The NLRB's record in dealing with these violations, Loebel charged, "actually encourages and rewards those who violate the law."

An international representative of the Carpenters, W. J. Smith, said employers thwart the intent of federal labor law by refusing to bargain in any meaningful way. He spoke of elections the Carpenters had won "overwhelmingly" at firms including Bancroft Mfg. Co. of McComb, Miss., and the Sumter Plywood Co. of Livingston, Ala., where "employer intransigence" prevented a contract.

The workers there never got the union representation to which they were entitled, Smith told the panel, because employers can "ignore National Labor Relations Board orders with impunity."

'My Sentiments, Exactly!'

Food Stamp Measure Nears Vote in Senate

Its principal sponsors were Senators Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and George McGovern (D-S.D.). Cosponsors, in addition to Talmadge, were Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.).

Both bills would limit food stamps to households whose net income—after various deductions—is under the government's poverty level. The exclusions from income are somewhat more liberal in the substitute bill, especially for the working poor.

A major difference, especially during inflationary periods, is that the labor-endorsed bill would update the poverty level cutoff every six months on the basis of the consumer price index. Otherwise, it would be based on data one to two years old.

Originally, the substitute would have eliminated the need for families to put up a substantial sum of money in order to buy its monthly allotment of food stamps. Thus a family now entitled on the basis of its income and food needs to buy $166 worth of food stamps for $100 would have been able to receive the $66 food stamp bonus without putting up $100 in cash each month.

That section had to be dropped in the compromise worked out with Talmadge. The new version, however, authorized a pilot test of the no-purchase requirement plan in several communities. And it also lowered the cost of food stamps for most households by requiring that persons entitled to food stamps put up only 25 percent of net income—after various deductions—to purchase their allotment. The earlier version would have required payment of 27.5 percent of income.

A controversy over cost estimates and budget allocations slowed Senate action on the bill.

Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.), who was leading the fight for the original Agriculture Committee bill and against the substitute, midway in the debate obtained from the Dept. of Agriculture an entirely new cost estimate which concluded that the substitute bill would end up costing slightly more than the present program. That contradicted earlier estimates.

The Senate, however, voted to waive a provision of its budget procedure in order to take up the substitute bill.

Economy in government, not generally discredited horror stories of widespread food stamp abuse, has emerged as the principal argument of those seeking to cut back on the program. The thrust of the debate has been cost rather than need.

Nevertheless, all but a hard core appeared convinced that the drastic cuts President Ford is seeking to impose by changing the regulations governing the program are unwarranted as well as ill-timed, in the midst of congressional consideration of new legislation.

The substitute bill would give Congress 60 days to review any changes proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture in the "assets test," the value of a house, tools or other property that a household otherwise eligible for food stamps could possess.

Mediation Service Moves to New Offices

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has moved into new headquarters in Washington, at 2100 K St., NW. Its Washington area field office will be at the same location.

Safety, Health Enforcement Funds Pushed

The AFL-CIO pressed for more funds to enforce the Occupational Safety & Health Act at House hearings on appropriations for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

In the face of a demonstrated need to train and hire more health and safety professionals, the Administration's budget amounts to merely "marking time," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

Biemiller and George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, asked Congress to "provide the money and manpower" needed to protect America's workers.

The AFL-CIO asked funds for 640 new jobs at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, including 100 safety inspectors and 265 more industrial hygienists.

At the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, covered by the HEW budget, the AFL-CIO urged funding of 50 to 60 new positions, including research jobs.

Biemiller noted that the AFL-CIO's budget proposals were based in large part on the funding requests made by OSHA, which were substantially reduced in the Administration's budget proposals.

The AFL-CIO urged also a substantial rise in funds for wage-hour investigations, noting that complaints of underpayments rose to record levels last year.

Similar testimony was presented by the AFL-CIO at Senate hearings last month.

Senate Votes Controls on New Chemicals

The Senate voted 60-13 approval of a Toxic Substance Control bill that would keep new chemicals off the market until they are tested for safety.

It would also direct the Environmental Protection Agency to start testing chemicals now in use whose safety has been questioned. An advisory board would help set up the testing priority list.

The bill carried a strong labor endorsement. AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said workers have been guinea pigs for too long and it is "high time that chemicals and not people should be put to the test."

An amendment to the bill singled out PCBs, a class of chemicals often used as insulators. It said their use should be banned as a health hazard unless the Environmental Protection Agency approves them for certain uses.

A House Commerce subcommittee has approved a different toxic substances bill, but the full committee has not yet acted.

Sen. John V. Tunney (D-Calif.), the floor manager of the bill, told his colleagues he was hopeful that growing public awareness of chemical health hazards will make possible enactment of the legislation this year.

He recalled that a similar bill had passed the Senate three years ago, but died in a House-Senate conference because "the chemical industry had marshalled its forces and was going to do everything it could to sabotage the legislation."

Since then, he noted, millions of Americans have become aware of the hidden cancer hazards in such substances as asbestos and vinyl chloride.

Unions Press Full Employment, Administration Says 'Impossible'

Labor witnesses termed the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill the way out of recession, but an Administration official complained its goals would be "difficult if not impossible" to achieve.

The first Administration witness to testify at House hearings on the bill, Assistant Sec. of Labor William Kolberg, said it isn't "realistic" to think that the unemployment rate could be brought down to 3 percent in four years or that jobs at fair pay could be assured to all who want to work.

He reiterated the Administration contention that "leading economic indicators are pointing to sustained economic growth." But he assured the panel that the Administration does seek "maximum" employment.

Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and other union officials who testified sharply disputed the Administration position.

To Clayman, the bill offers "a way to plan our way out of high unemployment" after the Ford and Nixon Administrations "planned us into it."

He praised its requirement that the President each year submit a full employment program spelling out the steps to be taken by federal agencies and Congress to assure a full employment economy.

A key to achieving and maintaining full employment, Clayman said, is a flexible public employment program to take up the slack whenever the private economy can't absorb the nation's workforce.

Testimony presented on behalf of Teachers President Albert Shanker told the panel that education has been a victim of the recession as cities and states resorted to cutbacks in public services that in turn further deepened the recession.

When the economy falters, Shanker said, "programs for the disadvantaged, special education for the handicapped, supplemental education for the economically and socially disadvantaged children go by the boards."

Shanker said his union supports the Full Employment bill as "good social policy" and considers it also "an absolute necessity if our education system is to become healthy again."

Legislative Director John H. Callahan of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers charged the Administration with setting the wrong priorities for the nation.

The result, he said, is continued high unemployment, accompanied by "individual suffering, waste, crime and the loss of federal revenues that layoffs entail."

To Avoid New Slump:

Tax Cut Extension Urged Through '77

America's recession-weakened economy still needs the stimulus of the emergency tax cut Congress enacted last year, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

The tax cut will expire on June 30, 1976, unless Congress acts, and Biemiller warned that the nation could be plunged into a new slump if higher tax rates are allowed to drain $1 billion a month from take-home pay and buying power.

Biemiller urged the Senate Finance Committee to extend the present withholding tax rates through 1977, and also to make an overdue start towards tax reform by strengthening a House-passed bill.

On the tax cut extension, Biemiller said present withholding rates should be extended until the end of 1977 "so that this nation can develop a sustainable recovery and move as quickly as possible toward full employment."

As an added boost to purchasing power, he asked the committee to adopt a proposal that Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) had advanced last year—to allow taxpayers the choice of taking a $200 tax credit for each personal exemption on their income tax returns or continuing to take the present $750 deduction. Most taxpayers would benefit by the $200 credit and 98 percent of the relief would go to taxpayers with incomes under $20,000, Biemiller testified.

On continuation of business tax cuts, Biemiller noted that the AFL-CIO supported an increase in the investment tax credit last year as a stimulus to the economy, even though the federation has traditionally opposed such a credit.

He said the investment credit should be repealed "as soon as the economy returns to high levels of production and employment."

Biemiller also urged the Senate committee to restructure the corporate tax so that a surtax exemption intended to help small business doesn't provide "tax bonanzas" to large corporations.

The tax reform bill the House passed last December was "a modest step in the right direction," Biemiller said. It includes a minimum tax provision that the AFL-CIO supports, sets a limit on artificial losses used to reduce taxes, partly eliminates some obvious tax shelters, and "slightly" reduces the Domestic International Sales Corp. loophole.

Biemiller urged the Senate to strengthen the House bill and thus "make a significant contribution to tax justice."

He urged priority attention to restructuring taxes on foreign source income. Present tax laws, Biemiller testified, encourage for-

Food Stamp Fight Shifts To House

The battle over the future of the food stamp program shifted to the House, with the outlook brightened by the Senate's 55-22 passage of a labor-endorsed bill.

In every key test, the Senate soundly defeated attempts to take a meat-axe approach to the food stamp program or to disqualify households for reasons unrelated to need.

The carefully-drawn Senate bill, a broadly-supported compromise measure, would set income ceilings that would drop up to 1 million of the 18.7 million persons currently on the benefit rolls. But most of the savings would be plowed into improved benefits for the most needy households.

By contrast, the bill originally approved by the Senate Agriculture Committee would have disqualified more than 3 million persons and made millions of others pay more for their stamps. The Ford Administration, through regulatory changes and legislation, is seeking even more drastic slashes.

An employer-urged attempt to disqualify strikers from receiving food stamps under the same standards applied to all other applicants was soundly rebuffed, 48-26. The amendment, co-sponsored by Republican Senators Carl T. Curtis (Neb.), Jesse A. Helms (N.C.) and James L. Buckley (N.Y.), would have denied food stamps to any household not already receiving them if any of its members had refused to work at a plant or job site because of a strike or other labor dispute.

The Senate-passed bill would eliminate the present complex system of deductions to arrive at household income levels used in determining food stamp eligibility.

Instead, every household would be entitled to a standard $100 a month deduction. A household with a working member could deduct an additional $25 a month plus social security and income taxes, and the elderly would also receive an additional $25 a month deduction.

City Family Budget Soars to New High

8% Jump Recorded Over Year

By James M. Shevis

The typical American urban family needed $15,479 last year just to maintain a moderate standard of living, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In its annual estimates of the cost of supporting a hypothetical family of four on three different economic levels, BLS also noted that a city family on an austere budget from autumn 1974 to autumn 1975 required an annual income of $9,838. A family on a higher budget needed $22,476 over the same period.

The figures were the highest since the government began drawing up the estimates in 1967. The total cost of the lower, intermediate and higher budgets reflected increases of 7, 8 and 8.2 percent, respectively, from a year earlier, BLS said.

If updated to reflect current prices, the budgets would be even higher. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, applying increases in the consumer price index since last fall and recalculating federal income and social security taxes according to 1976 schedules, said the lower budget today would amount to roughly $9,925; the intermediate, $17,719, and the higher, $22,774.

While figures for 1975 aren't yet available, the median family income through the end of calendar year 1974 was $12,840, according to the Census Bureau. The official 1975 poverty guideline level was $5,050 for a family of four. On Apr. 1, this figure rose to $5,500.

The BLS budgets are prepared for a precisely defined urban fam-

Veto Again Threatened:

Senate Expands Bill To Create New Jobs

The Senate passed a job-creating and anti-recession package that is similar to the legislation President Ford vetoed last February but carries a lower price tag.

As sent to the Senate floor, the bill would have authorized about $1.1 billion for new accelerated public works projects at present unemployment levels. The amount would rise if the jobless rate went up and drop if it fell from present levels.

This was acceptable to the Administration, Republican senators indicated. The public works amount was about half what had been authorized in the vetoed bill.

But the Senate voted 48-32 to add to the bill two anti-recession features that had been in the measure the President vetoed.

One, strongly pushed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), would add up to $1.37 billion in additional grants to cities and states whenever unemployment was above 6 percent. This "countercyclical" assistance is intended to keep up public services at periods when revenues are low and unemployment is creating new problems.

Also added to the bill was $1.4 billion in new water pollution funds to help states that otherwise would lose federal grants under a new allocation formula.

The Senate then passed the bill, 54-28.

Assuming current levels of unemployment, the total spending ceiling for the Senate-passed bill would be under $4 billion. That's more than $2 billion below the vetoed bill.

The House Public Works Committee, meanwhile, has approved a $2.5 billion public works measure expected to be taken up after the Easter recess.

The House had voted to override the President's veto of the earlier bill, but the Senate fell three votes short of the needed two-thirds.

Full Employment Goal Sidetracked As Congress Maps Budget Limits

By David L. Perlman

The Senate has adopted a budget target that would leave the nation still far from full employment next year and compel needed labor-supported programs to compete with each other for scarce funds.

It accepted virtually unchanged the spending guidelines drawn up by its Budget Committee, defeating by big margins all attempts to increase or decrease the amounts. The Budget Committee, although somewhat more conservative than the Senate as a whole, emerged with its already impressive influence further enhanced.

While the Senate's budget target calls for spending more money than the President proposed in the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1, the amount is less than its Budget Committee report said would be needed to continue present programs unchanged, with allowances for inflation and population growth.

In dollar terms, Ford's budget projected outlays of $395.8 billion, the Senate set a $412.6 billion target and a "current policy" budget would require $424.3 billion.

The House Budget Committee has set its spending target $1 billion above the Senate figure, with significant additional emphasis on economic stimulus programs.

All three budgets, however, are substantially below what labor sought in terms of job creation and meeting national needs.

Strike Alert Sounded by Rubber Union

Akron, O.—The Rubber Worker's executive board, facing a scheduled Apr. 20 expiration of the union's agreements with the Big Four tire makers, recommended strike action if negotiations fail to produce a satisfactory new settlement.

The 18-member board also authorized URW President Peter Bommarito to seek a worldwide boycott if it were deemed necessary to achieve an acceptable industry pact.

Bommarito condemned the industry's mutual aid agreement under which Goodrich, Goodyear, Uniroyal and Firestone have given fi-

Senate Votes Public Works Jobs Measure

In another job-related action, Congress added $1.9 billion in funds to continue present levels of public service employment and to finance summer jobs programs for youth to the bill launching a flu vaccine program. The President is expected to sign the measure.

Congress adjourned for Easter without final passage of a bill to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission bill. But a House-Senate conference committee reached agreement on its provisions, with its members optimistic that final action will be completed the week of Apr. 26.

The compromise would impose new reporting requirements on unions that spend more than $1,000 in any election campaign to communicate with their members on behalf of or in opposition to a candidate for federal office. The amount spent, although not limited, would have to be reported to the Federal Election Commission.

Reporting requirements would not, however, apply to the normal flow of communications such as a union newspaper in which a political endorsement or article appears.

The conferees also followed closely the Senate-passed language on solicitation of workers for political contributions.

An opinion by the present election commission held that a political fund set up by management could solicit rank-and-file workers, and even set up a checkoff.

The new legislation would allow direct solicitation of rank-and-file workers only by unions, and allow management to solicit its executives and stockholders. Either group could if it wished seek contributions beyond its own ranks, but only by a mail solicitation under conditions ensuring that the names of those contributing would not be made known to the soliciting group.

Until the bill is finally passed and signed into law, presidential candidates will not be able to collect matching federal payments that are due them. That's because the Supreme Court said the Federal Election Commission would have to be reconstituted as an Executive Branch agency in order to administer the law.

nancial assistance to each other when one of them has been struck in the past.

He called the agreement an "unholy alliance." Three years ago when the union negotiated with the Big Four, it signed a contract with Goodyear but found it necessary to strike Goodrich and Firestone before satisfactory agreements could be concluded.

Nearly 70,000 workers are covered by this year's bargaining. The union's main goals are catchup wage increases and cost-of-living escalator provisions.

The union's policy committee earlier in the year said the catchup increases were needed to "establish parity" between the rubber and auto industries.

Bargaining between the union and the Big Four began in March. URW's contract with a fifth firm General Tire & Rubber Co., expires May 15.

Labor Musical to Extend Run

New York—A new series of performances has been scheduled for the musical production, "I Paid My Dues," for trade union audiences in April and May.

Earlier performances of the show, saluting the contribution of American labor to the nation's development in the past 200 years, were staged in February.

The show is sponsored by Labor/Arts, Inc., the cultural arm of the New York City AFL-CIO and its Community Services Committee as a part of the bicentennial celebration.

One engagement is for Apr. 20-29 at the Astor Palace Theater as a part of a COPE fund-raising drive for State, County & Municipal Employees District 37. Additional performances will be Apr. 30 for the New York State Council of Roofers and May 12 for District 119 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The show's producer, Stuart White, said that additional bookings are pending. The production of 10 singer-actors and six musicians was written and directed by Eric Blau.

8% Jump in Year:

City Family Budget Soars to New High

ily—a 38-year-old man employed full time, his nonworking wife, and their 13-year-old boy and eight-year-old girl. The couple is assumed to have been married about 15 years, and the family is settled in the community.

The husband is an experienced worker. The family has an average inventory of clothing, housefurnishings, major durables and other equipment.

The percentage increases in the budgets, while raising the costs to record levels, were the smallest in three years. From autumn 1973 to autumn 1974, the budgets rose 12.4, 13.5 and 14.2 percent at the lower, intermediate and higher levels, respectively.

From autumn 1972 to autumn 1973, the increases were 10.8 percent for the lower budget, 10.3 percent for the moderate and 9.9 percent for the higher budget. In other years, the budgets never rose more than 4.3 percent.

The budgets, estimated at the three different levels for 40 cities and metropolitan areas, do not represent how families actually spend their money, BLS stressed. Rather, they reflect assumptions made about the manner of living at each of the three levels. No budgets are drawn up for rural families.

For consumption items alone—that is, all living costs except gifts and contributions, occupational expenses, life insurance and taxes—the intermediate budget last year rose 7.8 percent to $11,725.

At the higher level, consumption costs also advanced 7.8 percent, to $16,141, while the consumption budget at the lower level increased 6.5 percent to $7,795.

The largest increases among consumption components occurred in homeowner costs, transportation and medical care.

Food costs rose 6.8, 7.9 and 8.2 percent under the lower, intermediate and higher budget plans.

The change in food costs was largest at the higher budget level because the liberal-cost food plan used for that budget level includes more meat, poultry and fish, and these items had the largest price increases of all food groups in 1975, the government noted.

Housing costs went up 5.6 percent for the lower budget, and 9.2 percent under both the intermediate and higher budgets. In the lower budget, total housing costs include only rental housing while the two other plans include homeowner costs such as furnishings, utilities and mortgage interest.

Costs of medical care reflected a 10.8 percent increase under the lower and intermediate budgets and 10.7 percent at the higher level. Tax increases also were in double figures, 11.6 percent at the lower level, 10.2 percent under the intermediate plan and 10.6 under the higher budget. These included federal, state and local tax payments.

BLS attributed the higher personal income taxes to changes in state tax codes and to the federal income-tax structure which calls for higher tax rates as income rises.

In metropolitan areas of the United States, the annual budget needed to maintain an intermediate standard of living last year was 12 percent higher than in nonmetropolitan areas, those communities with populations ranging from 2,500 to 50,000, BLS said.

For the lower budget, costs were 8 percent higher in the big cities than in the smaller urban areas. The metropolitan-nonmetropolitan difference was 18 percent for the higher budget.

As in past surveys, the budgets at all three levels were lowest in small cities in the South. Anchorage, Alaska, remained the most expensive place to live, with Honolulu second. In the contiguous states, Boston, New York and San Francisco were the most expensive parts of the nation.

Building Trades Adopt Broad Program for Jobs

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. wound up its national jobs conference in Washington with adoption of a series of resolutions ranging from housing to job safety.

The resolutions, covering public works, pensions, unemployment, energy and other areas, later were submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress for action.

Before the resolutions were approved, position papers were put before the conference delegates by leaders of BCTD-affiliated unions.

President William Sidell of the Carpenters, discussing the nation's housing crisis, noted that unemployment in the construction industry is still more than twice as bad as in the overall economy, "and unemployment in residential construction is twice as bad as it is in the construction industry as a whole."

To reduce the excessively high joblessness in residential construction, the delegates approved a resolution demanding lower interest rates—3 percent for "limited income" families—and increased federal loan subsidies.

Bricklayers Sec. John T. Joyce gave BCTD's views on job safety and health in the industry. President Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers focused on environmental issues. Pension plans were discussed by Iron Workers President John H. Lyons.

Martin J. Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, covered energy problems. Painters President S. Frank Raftery spoke on labor standards, and President Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers discussed public works.

The resolution on health and safety charged that the federal Occupational Safety & Health Administration "has been completely ineffective" in protecting workers. Delegates called on Congress to sharply increase funding to raise the number of OSHA inspectors to 2,500.

Other resolutions called for adoption of rules under the new pension reform legislation to take account of the special problems of employe benefit plans in the construction industry, and urged Congress to block any efforts "to weaken or repeal" the Davis-Bacon Act and other prevailing rate laws.

To Full Terms:

Operating Engineers Elect Turner, Conlon

By John R. Oravec

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The new top officers of the Operating Engineers—President J. C. Turner and Sec.-Treas. Russell T. Conlon—were elected without opposition to their first full four-year terms at the IUOE's 30th convention. Both had been filling out unexpired terms since January.

The union's 11 vice presidents serving on the executive board were also re-elected unanimously, as was the five-member board of trustees.

Turner and Conlon pledged to carry on progressive programs initiated by President-Emeritus Hunter P. Wharton, who stepped down from the union's top office in December. Wharton expressed confidence that the new leadership team would continue to make the IUOE grow.

In the four years since the last convention, the IUOE reported an increase of 22,000 members, bringing its active rolls to 419,000.

In major amendments to the union's constitution, the convention voted to raise the minimum monthly dues from $3 to $5, while keeping the per capita tax to the international at $1.90.

Delegates also approved an increase in weekly strike benefits from $15 to $25 and voted to increase the funding and benefits in the IUOE pension plan covering full-time officers and employes of local unions.

A proposal to increase the annual salaries of top officers 10 percent was withdrawn at the request of Turner, Conlon and the union's vice presidents.

At their urging, the convention adopted instead an alternative proposal calling for a cost-of-living increase tied to the rise in the consumer price index. The first annual COL adjustment for the officers will go into effect next April.

On economic, social and on-the-job issues facing IUOE members, major resolutions adopted at the four-day convention called for:

- Development of a national comprehensive energy program, including the stepped-up construction of nuclear energy plant facilities.
- Manpower programs to create needed jobs to achieve a full employment economy and reduce the high rate of joblessness through public service projects.
- Reversing the serious decline in housing construction through emergency congressional action to reduce interest rates on home mortgages.
- Increasing the federal minimum wage to $3 an hour to help low-wage workers rise above the poverty level and spur recovery of the economy through increased purchasing power.
- Additional funds for federal occupational safety and health enforcement, training and compliance programs, in addition to transferring federal safety and health programs now in other agencies to the Labor Dept.
- Regulation of multinational corporations to halt the export of U.S. jobs and technology and to check the erosion of American jobs by low-wage imports.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told the delegates that the nation's slow economic recovery and continued high unemployment are the result of Ford Administration policies. And he stressed that in the November elections, American voters will have an opportunity to render a verdict against President Ford.

President Paul Hall of the Seafarers in his address to the convention urged all elements of the trade union movement to unify behind a presidential candidate and work actively for his election.

Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., told delegates that recent governmental statistics show a significant upturn in construction activity, and he predicted that the industry could soon take its "proper place" as a leader in the economy.

ACTION PROGRAM to restore full employment to the nation and revive the stricken construction industry was adopted by delegates to the Operating Engineers convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. President J. C. Turner and Sec.-Treas. Russell T. Conlon, who had been filling vacancies created by retirement, were elected to full terms of office by the delegates.

Bargaining, Legislative Goals Set By Railway Department Delegates

Las Vegas, Nev.—A program of improvements in wages and working conditions on the railroads was targeted by 120 delegates to the two-day quadrennial convention here of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept.

The delegates came from four affiliated unions representing workers in railroad shops around the nation—the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Railway Carmen, the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, and the Firemen & Oilers.

In a series of resolutions adopted unanimously, the delegates instructed their unions to press through the department for these goals, among others:

A four-day, 32-hour week at 40 hours' pay; a 25 percent pay differential for night work; improvements in paid vacations ranging up to eight weeks after 26 years of service; double-time pay for overtime and for work on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays; longevity pay of 5 cents an hour for each year of service, and 10 days of paid sick leave annually, cumulative up to 60 days.

Also, the convention called for the designation of the Rev. Martin Luther King's birthday and the Friday after Thanksgiving as additional paid holidays, for four days of paid bereavement leave annually in case of the death of a close relative, and five days of paid leave a year to cover personal needs.

Further, the delegates urged the addition of optical care for employes and dependents to the current carrier-paid health-welfare program on the railroads, plus coverage of the cost of annual physical examinations, and full payment for office visits to doctors and for doctor's house calls. In addition, the program seeks to increase group life insurance for active employes from $6,000 to $10,000 and for retirees from $2,000 to $5,000.

On the legislative front, the delegates urged amending the Railroad Retirement Act to make employe pensions payable after 25 years of service and to qualify a dependent spouse of a deceased retiree for benefits regardless of age.

The convention unanimously elected James E. Yost, to the combined post of president and secretary-treasurer. He had been president since 1969, and the secretary-treasurer duties were added to his position last year following withdrawal of the Machinists and Sheet Metal Workers from the department.

The delegates voted to amend the department's constitution to validate the combination of duties though they left the way open to separate the two posts again in the future.

The present members of the department's executive council were automatically continued. They are President Anthony L. Krause of the Railway Carmen, Vice President Andrew Ripp of the IBEW, President John McNamara of the Firemen & Oilers, Charles Goodlin, director of the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths railroad unit, and Wesley Gordon, representing the blacksmiths' membership in that union.

In a keynote speech, Yost cited significant gains made by the shopcrafts since the last convention four years ago. In that time, he said, mechanics' pay rates have risen by $2.17 an hour to $6.92 as of April 1, 1976. He predicted that the next cost of living raise, based on the March consumer price index, will bring the rate to $7.04 an hour on July 1.

Other gains, he said, have included a dental care program, stronger curbs on farming-out of shopmen's work to private contractors, and improvements just negotiated in supplemental sickness benefits for shopcraft employes, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1976.

Yost stressed that the major problem affecting rail workers and all labor is that of high unemployment. He charged that the official government figures grossly understate the true situation and cited the AFL-CIO calculation of 10.3 percent joblessness, taking into account discouraged jobless and part-time workers who are available for full-time jobs.

Unemployment will not be truly reduced to acceptable levels until the "Nixon-Ford" Administration is replaced by a Democrat, Yost declared.

He urged that rail workers "take a very active part during the coming months in supporting a candidate for President who embraces the principles and objectives of the trade union movement."

Other speakers at the convention included William Dempsey, chairman of the National Railway Labor Conference, the bargaining arm of the railroads; David Stowe, chairman of the National Mediation Board; L. V. Porter, acting regional director of the AFL-CIO; Emil Banjavic, representing Neil Speirs, labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board; Ruben Levin, editor of Labor Newspaper, and officials of three insurance companies that underwrite varied health-welfare benefits on the railroads.

Survey Ranks Labor 4th Among U.S. Institutions

Organized labor is viewed by the country's top decision-makers as the fourth most powerful institution in the nation—after the White House, Supreme Court and television.

In the annual survey of national leadership by U.S. News & World Report, the top ten institutions this year matched those in the 1975 poll. However, there were changes in rankings, with labor moving ahead of the Senate.

The nearly 1,400 distinguished Americans participating in the survey also ranked AFL-CIO President George Meany fourth among the nation's 30 "most influential" leaders.

The magazine's survey also asked respondents to name the "most influential" persons in their own particular field of work. In the labor field, the top five in order were Meany, Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel and President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

From a list of 24 institutions, participants were asked to judge the influence of each "on decisions or actions affecting the nation as a whole."

After the Senate—in fifth place—respondents listed the bureaucracy, industry, House of Representatives, newspapers, and lobbies and pressure groups in the top 10.

President Ford was named the most influential leader, followed by Sec. of State Henry Kissinger, Chairman Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve Board and Meany.

Myra Wolfgang Dies, Equal Rights Pioneer

Detroit—Myra Wolfgang, who fought all her life for workers' rights and championed the cause of working women, died of cancer shortly before her 62nd birthday.

She was a vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees, responsible for a five-state area, and secretary-treasurer of Local 24 in Detroit. She also helped found the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

Her death was "a major loss" to the entire labor movement, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said. "She was a staunch trade unionist, a pioneer leader in the battle for equality for women workers and a true defender of democracy."

Myra Wolfgang worked as a waitress in her teens during the height of the depression and was a union organizer by the age of 23, leading strikes and organizing drives in Detroit's major hotels and restaurants.

During the turbulent period of the 1930s, she organized soup kitchens for striking auto workers, led an eight-day sitdown strike at a Woolworth's store and negotiated its first contract and found time to marry a Detroit attorney and raise two daughters. She had been a widow since 1963.

In the legislative arena, she fought to pass and then improve Michigan's minimum wage law, and brought to what had tended to be an upper and middle-class women's movement the special concerns of working women.

She was a member of several state boards and commissions and was honored with a galaxy of awards from various organizations and public bodies. Just last year, she received Michigan State University's Distinguished Citizen's Award.

Memorial services were scheduled for Apr. 19 at the Detroit Institute of Arts auditorium.

The Wrong Questions

CONGRESS IS WELL INTO an election-year effort to "reform" the food stamp program. Unfortunately, the effort so far has proven only that if members of Congress ask the wrong questions, they will come up with the wrong answers.

The food stamp program is an improvement over the commodity food program, which it replaced, but it has fallen far short of eradicating hunger among the poor. Today, half the poor families in America do not benefit from food stamps.

Congress should be asking why that is true. Until every American can afford a nutritionally adequate diet, the country will pay dearly in a variety of ways: infant death and illness, adult malnutrition and susceptibility to disease, needless and untimely death among the elderly.

Instead, many in Congress ignore that question and ask what can be done to cut the cost of the program.

The food stamp program cannot be studied in a vacuum. Instead of asking why it costs so much, Congress would do well to ask why people need such a program. Part of the answer is obvious from the monthly unemployment statistics. People who want to work can't find jobs.

Yet while grumbling about undeserving people on food stamps, Congress fails to come up with a program to enable out-of-work Americans to find employment.

CAPITOL HILL is awash with complaints about graft in the food stamp program. There is some, to be sure. Chiselers should be prosecuted and, increasingly, they are. But there are no statistics to indicate that food stamp recipients are less law-abiding than heads of giant corporations or members of Congress; in fact, a case could be made for the opposite.

The food stamp program badly needs reform. It needs to be simpler to administer. The purchase price should be eliminated. Doing away with that necessity for making a large, lump-sum payment would enable many more people to use food stamps. But that would increase the cost of the program, and Congress seems intent on cutting costs even if it means depriving poor people of help they need.

It makes us angry to hear of a senator's son receiving food stamps. But it also makes us angry to hear of a millionaire who paid no income taxes or a businessman who writes off lavish gifts, dinners and travel as business expenses. If low-income people have learned to take advantage of government regulations, they have not lacked high-income teachers.

Congress needs first to deal with these basic questions: Does this country want to insure that no family is denied an adequate diet? Will the country accomplish that goal by providing jobs for people who want to work and income subsidies for people who can't work?

So far, it appears that many—perhaps a majority—in Congress, cannot answer "yes" to those questions.

A Word Edgewise:

Kissinger's Policy Revelations Both Baffling and Dismaying

By John P. Roche

I KNOW THAT 1976 is a presidential election year, I take it for granted that politics does not (and should not) stop "at the water's edge," and I have long been convinced that Sec. of State Henry Kissinger could sleep on a pretzel. But recent revelations and events have left me utterly and unprecedentedly baffled: American foreign policy seems to be on an LSD trip.

First the revelations of what Sec. Kissinger and State Dept. counsellor Helmut Sonnenfeldt told our European ambassadors at a London meeting last December have just been leaked in full.

Kissinger's academic lecture reflected what was recently referred to here as his "Gotterdammerung Complex." Not so much in content—it was quite a banal tour d'horizon full of such cliches as, "In the Middle East we must not separate ourselves from the dominant political currents" (whatever that might mean, notably if the "dominant political currents" are flowing in opposite directions)—as in mood. The Chairman, observing that we are "doomed to coexistence," went on to blame the problems in Greece, Turkey and Cyprus in part on "domestic paralysis in the U.S."

Factor this statement: How in the world can centuries-old animosity between Greeks and Turks be alleviated by American activism? Indeed, the complaint is that Congress, responding to domestic pressures, has been anything but paralyzed. Suppose Kissinger had a completely free hand, could he solve the Cypriot deadlock? I don't "tilt" towards either Turkey or Greece—neither cooperated with us in rescuing Israel in 1973 (although the Turks permitted overflights by Soviet transports supplying Syria and Egypt, my guess is the Greeks would have acted similarly were it not for geography).

Kissinger was quoted as telling editors of the New York Times back in October 1974 that "I think of myself as a historian more than as a statesman. As a historian, you have to be conscious of the fact that every civilization that has ever existed has ultimately collapsed." This was an observation pregnant with meaning: Dean Rusk used to comment that the difference between historians and statesmen was that historians ask, "Why did it happen?," while statesmen say, "What shall we do?" Kissinger the historian has gone beyond Rusk's formulation: He is asking, "What is going to happen to us?"

However, Ronald Reagan is now Kissinger's secret weapon. The President, responding to Reagan's assaults on his foreign policy, said just the other day that Henry is one of our greatest Secretaries of State.

So let's leave Kissinger walking across the Atlantic to his next meeting, and turn to the remarks of Sonnenfeldt at the same London meeting. The counsellor, known as "Kissinger's Kissinger," told the assembled chiefs of mission that it is too bad the Soviet European satellites distrust Moscow so much, that the U.S. should seek an "organic" relationship between them and the Soviet Union. (He is now weaseling on the word organic, but, whether he meant to use it or not, that's what the man said.)

Push this argument a bit, and we discover nothing less than the 1930s rationale for appeasement. Had one been at Cliveden, where the British appeasers met, he could well have heard, "You know, old boy, isn't it sad those Czechs won't seek an organic relationship with Nazi Germany?" Or, "Why must those romantic Poles insist on their independence?" (In his comments, Sonnenfeldt noted that the Poles no longer seemed inclined to romantic adventurism, ditto for the Hungarians.)

When the counsellor of the State Dept. and the Chairman's chief confidant in effect suggests it would be in U.S. national interest for the Poles, Czechs, Hungarians, Bulgars, Rumanians and East Germans to apply for membership in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, it really blows your mind.

Mr. Ford, however, sees no inconsistencies: In Milwaukee he said, "The U.S. opposes Soviet domination of Eastern Europe or any kind of organic unity." Excuse an unkind question, but how many foreign policies can we manage at any one time—even in an election year?

Spur to Buying Power:

Tax Justice to Aid Consumers Vital to Economic Recovery

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO testimony on tax reform before the Senate Finance Committee.

WE WANT TAX JUSTICE and we want the American economy to get a continuing boost from mass consumer buying so that this nation can develop a sustainable recovery and move as quickly as possible toward full employment.

This means the AFL-CIO wants Congress to close the major loopholes in our tax structure and we also want Congress to enact necessary measures to continue the current payroll income tax withholding rates through calendar year 1977.

Let there be no doubt about the need to stimulate the American economy and to create jobs. The economy survived near-disaster in 1975 largely as a result of the emergency tax cut of 1975 and the six-month extension of the tax cut through June 30, 1976.

The $23 billion emergency tax measure, adopted in March 1975 and reluctantly signed by President Ford, lifted consumer confidence. The combination of tax rebates, payments to retired people and lower withholding rates on paychecks added more than $10 billion to consumer incomes and purchasing power in May and June last year. The lower withholding rates have provided continuing stimulus at a rate of approximately $1 billion per month. In fact, if the reduced withholding had not gone into effect on May 1, 1975, the average worker's paycheck in terms of buying power would have fallen by some 2.5 to 3 percent.

Furthermore, the economic decline was cushioned by the operations of the unemployment insurance system, back-stopped by food stamps, public welfare, and extended unemployment benefits to the long-term jobless. These cushions prevented a complete collapse of purchasing power for millions of families and forestalled a full-scale depression.

But, in spite of modest improvements since last spring, the American economy remains in weakened condition, with a vast amount of slack, after the longest and deepest recessionary decline in 40 years. Thus, the economy is vulnerable to possible adverse events at home and abroad.

In view of these economic realities we recommend that the Congress extend the present payroll withholding rates until the end of 1977.

Secondly, we feel that the Congress should adopt the proposal which would have given taxpayers the option of taking a $200 per exemption tax credit instead of the $750 personal exemption. That provision would have provided a substantive increase in purchasing power and 98 percent of the relief would have gone to taxpayers in the $20,000 and below income range.

Despite years of rhetoric, campaign promises and some small improvements recently adopted by Congress, the federal tax structure continues to be riddled with injustices.

- In 1973, according to the Internal Revenue Service, 22 individuals reporting incomes of 500,000 and over paid no federal income taxes whatsoever—seven of these super wealthy Americans reported that their income in 1973 was over $1 million.
- Eight large corporations with profits totaling $844 million paid no income taxes in 1974, according to a congressional study. The effective average corporate tax rate for 142 of the nation's largest companies was only 22.6 percent—less than half the statutory 48 percent rate.
- U.S. Treasury data shows that U.S.-based multinational corporations earned $53.6 billion abroad in 1974 and paid U.S. corporate taxes of $1.7 billion—an effective tax rate of only 3.2 percent.

AS A RESULT of these and other injustices, working families pay much more than their fair share of the tax load.

The AFL-CIO position is clear and simple: tax reductions for individuals must be maintained until the end of 1977 due to the depressed state of the economy; however, the role of Congress must be to continue to close loopholes and restructure the tax code, including the discouraging of capital investment abroad with the accompanying loss of jobs and industry.

We also hold that capital investment tax relief "incentives" in an economy that is operating at 71 percent of capacity will simply waste needed federal revenue. Thus, the AFL-CIO urges rejection of the President's proposals and asks this committee to press forward on tax legislation that will help restore our nation's economic health at this critical period and also move America toward greater tax justice.

A Key Issue in Campaign:

Growing Public Demand Spurs Support for Health Security Bill

RISING PUBLIC DEMAND for comprehensive national health insurance is drawing more support to it than ever in Congress and is making it a key issue in the presidential campaign, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman declared in a network radio interview.

Pointing out that more senators and congressmen have joined in sponsoring the Corman-Kennedy National Health Security bill than in any previous session, Seidman said that congressional leaders "feel considerable pressure" to "pass a national health insurance bill" before the session adjourns.

He said chances that such a program will be adopted this year are slight, but the degree of interest shown in the current political campaign is strong evidence that final resolution of the issue is not far off.

Seidman said on Labor News Conference that there is a sharp difference on the issue between the Republican and Democratic presidential candidates. He said that neither Ronald Reagan nor President Ford have offered a plan, "not even a phony health insurance bill, let alone a genuine program of national health insurance," but that all of the Democratic candidates, except for George Wallace and Jimmy Carter—who hasn't decided what kind of bill he would support—"have come out for the Health Security bill supported by the AFL-CIO."

Seidman acknowledged that "some so-called liberals," such as Senators Tunney of California and Muskie of Maine, "have backed off . . . to a certain extent . . . buying the idea of the Fords and the Reagans that we should use the government less to achieve the social goals of the American people," and it's hard to understand why they "are falling for it." He stressed that Health Security, when it takes effect, will cost no more than the present private insurance system, and in the long run, will keep the nation's health bill lower.

Total health care costs last year were $118 billion—8.3 percent of the gross national product—and are still rising about twice as fast as other costs, he pointed out. Health Security, he said, with its tight cost controls, preventive care, early diagnosis and incentives for more efficient delivery of health and medical services, is the surest way "to get a handle on these skyrocketing costs."

The most important way in which Health Security would control costs, Seidman said, is in setting a national budget for health care. The budget would allocate resources by regions and localities.

Reporters questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Judith Randal, medical and science correspondent for the New York Daily News, and John Grimes, freelance reporter and writer on labor and economic issues. The program is aired Tuesdays by Mutual radio.

THE NEW DEAL and the Fair Deal stand in modern American history for periods when the federal government acted with compassion to make life a little better for millions of people.

President Ford, with his veto of a bill that would have provided a modest amount of money to enable states to upgrade day care centers, is well on the way to earning the label of "Raw Deal" for his Administration.

Under the Raw Deal, Ford has run up a string of vetoes. He has vetoed a number of bills that would have created jobs and enabled people to go back to work and regain their self-respect. The Raw Deal is trying to cut off food stamps for millions of needy families. The Raw Deal proposes to raise charges to the elderly poor on Medicare in exchange for "catastrophic" insurance that has been exposed as fraudulent by health experts.

The day care issue is a good example of the Raw Deal in action.

Census data show that about 21 million school-age children have mothers who work outside the home. About 10 million children are being raised in single-parent families, most of them headed by women. And many of these women must work.

Day care facilities of all kinds have been spreading, but the need is so great that this is emerging as yet another critical national problem. The best day care centers are too expensive for working people. Too many of the others are unsafe, unsanitary, inadequately staffed or deficient in other ways.

The bill vetoed by Ford would have provided $125 million in grants to the states to help them bring day care centers up to standards set under a 1974 law. The standards improve the ratio between adult staff and children and stiffen health and safety rules.

The bill also provided a tax credit incentive to encourage the hiring of welfare recipients to staff the centers.

IN HIS VETO MESSAGE, the President said the legislation "runs directly counter to a basic principle of government in which I strongly believe—the vesting of responsibility in state and local government and the removing of burdensome federal restrictions."

The President expressed the view that "the states should have the responsibility—and the right—to establish and enforce their own quality day-care standards."

Ford chose to ignore the fact that the vetoed bill did not concern new standards. The 1974 law setting the standards was enacted because the states failed to act.

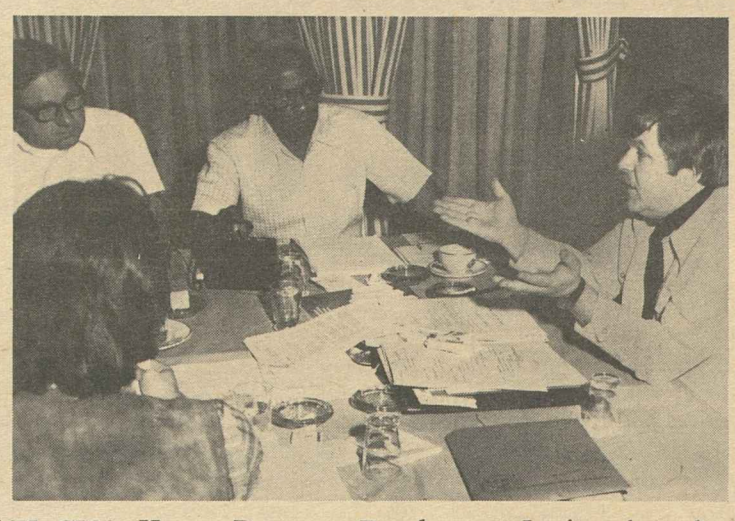
The irony of Ford's veto is that the health and safety standards laid down by the 1974 law now go into effect, with many day care centers expected to close. The vetoed bill would have postponed the effective date until federal funds had enabled the centers to meet the standards.

Rep. Abner Mikva (D-Ill.) called Ford's veto "incredible." He said the biggest problems are in poor neighborhoods. The day care centers in church basements lack the money to meet safety standards and will have to close, Mikva predicted.

The New York Times said in an editorial that Ford has misinterpreted the bill, noting that it would have required the states to live up to their own standards. The Times pointed out that day care centers in New Jersey enabled 29,000 people to work, costing the state only $30 million and saving $100 million in welfare aid. In Illinois, the veto is expected to cut day care enrollment from 40,000 children down to 5,000.

A New York City official agreed that the Ford veto will cost the government much more money in the long run. "This will mean that many mothers will have no choice but to give up their jobs and go back on welfare, at a cost to the government probably three times as much as upgrading the day care centers," she said.

The New York Times editorial observed that "a President ideologically devoted to cutting welfare costs has just committed a whopping reversal with his ill-considered veto."



And that is a Raw Deal.

HEALTH SECURITY has been made a key issue in the presidential campaign by rising public demand and mounting congressional support for comprehensive national health insurance, Director Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Judith Randal of the New York Daily News and John Grimes, freelance labor reporter and writer.

National Conference Told:

Impact of Recession Adds to HRDI Task

New Orleans—A national staff conference of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute explored the impact of the recession on HRDI's job placement mission.

It makes it "tougher," HRDI Executive Director Charles E. Bradford agreed. And Administration cutbacks of manpower programs have added to the difficulties.

The institute, with Labor Dept. funding, works with unions and community groups to search out job and training opportunities, open doors for the disadvantaged, and provide counseling.

"Work is an avenue to dignity," HRDI President Alan Kistler told the conference, "and our focus is jobs."

City and state officials who addressed the conference, including New Orleans Mayor Moon Landrieu, praised HRDI's work in Louisiana. So did leaders of city and state AFL-CIO central bodies and building trades councils that have cooperated with HRDI programs. And the Greater New Orleans AFL-CIO Council showed its appreciation with a reception for the conference participants.

A series of panel discussions included an especially lively session on "non-traditional job development and placement for women."

Alexis Herman, director of a minority women's job training program in Atlanta, spoke of placing women successfully as sheet metal workers, electricians and other previously-closed occupations.

Gwendolyn Poole, reporting on a New York Urban League program, spoke of the need for women to conquer psychological barriers to qualify for good-paying occupations. Sandra Brandt, who directs the Step-Up program of the Virginia State AFL-CIO, discussed counseling of women offenders in prison to encourage them to learn non-traditional skills. And John Rober, HRDI representative in the Toledo, O., area, urged unions to greater involvement in breaking down sex barriers to jobs.

Another panel, discussing resources within the AFL-CIO available to help HRDI's mission, featured AFL-CIO Publications Director Saul Miller; Allen Zack, assistant director of the Dept. of Public Relations, and John J. McManus, assistant director of the Dept. of Community Services.

Others on the conference program included HRDI Sec.-Treas. Harold H. Jack; New Orleans AFL-CIO President Lindsey Williams; A. P. Stoddard of the state Employment Security Dept. and a former central body president; Richard M. Allen, president of the Southeast Louisiana Building & Construction Trades Dept.; AFL-CIO Field Rep. Willie H. Montgomery; Regional Director Nicholas H. Kurko, and area HRDI Rep. Ernest Colbert.

GOP Conservative Wins Texas Seat

A conservative Republican, Ron Paul, was elected to Congress in a special election for a seat that had been held for nine terms by a conservative Democrat.

Paul defeated COPE-endorsed Democrat Bob Gammage with 56.2 percent of the vote in a runoff election. They competed to succeed Democrat Bob Casey, who resigned in January to accept appointment to the Federal Maritime Commission.

Paul, who narrowly trailed Gammage in the first vote on Feb. 28, apparently picked up most of the votes cast for the most conservative Democrat in the field, who had finished third. The Republican, a 40-year-old physician, won in a Houston-area district with a campaign promise to "put big government on a diet."

The House now has 288 Democrats, 145 Republicans, and two vacancies. A June 19 special election in the Texarkana, Tex., area will choose a successor to the late Wright Patman, a Democrat. The death of Pennsylvania Democrat William A. Barrett set up a vacancy in a Philadelphia district.

Government Raises Poverty Guidelines

Poverty-level guidelines, used by government agencies to determine eligibility for various job and training programs, have been raised to reflect higher living costs, the Labor Dept. announced.

The new income level below which an urban family of four is considered poor was increased from $5,050, to $5,500, effective Apr. 1. Higher levels are used for Hawaii, $6,330, and Alaska, $6,880.

For a family of six, in all states except Hawaii and Alaska, the new urban poverty cutoff is an income of $7,300 a year.

Energy Parley Focuses On Alternatives to Oil

Reston, Va.—America's self-interest requires steady movement toward "energy independence" but the effort will succeed only "if the people most directly involved realize their health and safety are being protected by deed as well as by word."

That was the message brought by President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers to the National Summit Conference for Energy Leadership Apr. 7-9. The conference brought together some 300 representatives of labor, government, industry and the academic world.

The sessions were co-sponsored by two citizens' organizations, Americans for Energy Independence and Citizens for a Strong Energy Program.

Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, who was introduced by Abel, reminded the group that "continued reliance on foreign sources and insecure sea routes for nearly one-half of our oil place this nation in a perilous position of vulnerability to economic, political and military pressure.

"If we don't take any effective action now, we'll be importing 50 to 60 percent of our oil by 1985, and things will get still worse after that," the Vice President predicted.

Dr. Hans Bethe of Cornell, a pioneer in nuclear research and a Nobel prize winner, told the conference that "even if we had zero growth, even if we take conservation measures, we have only about 20 years of oil left in America at present consumption rates."

There are only two other sources for the short run, Dr. Bethe said: "coal and nuclear."

Seminar reports by the participants—many of them closely involved in energy production work—indicated a broad consensus that both conservation and development of electric power from nuclear energy as well as from coal must be vigorously undertaken.

A number of union officials participated in the conference. They included Joseph Keenan, recently retired as secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who is vice-chairman of Americans for Energy Independence; Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept.; Sec.-Treas. David Turner of the Sheet Metal Workers; Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers; George Collins of the Electrical Radio & Machine Workers; and Vice President Jack Otero of the Railway Clerks.

Abel, in a statement prepared for the discussion said that "nuclear energy—when proper precautions are observed—is a necessary element in achieving energy independence."

He told the conference that unions are playing "a very important role in fighting what we believe to be a dangerous and ill-considered referendum to stop or delay the construction of nuclear plants."

Nuclear electric production is feasible and has shown itself to be safe, Abel said. Taking issue with extremists among the environmentalists, the steel union president said "union members have no desire to go back to the abject poverty of our early industrial society.

"If no factory is to put smoke into the sky, the price is too high—because the price is unemployment and poverty," Abel told the conference.

Hospital Union of 900 Joins Rubber Workers

Akron, O. — An independent union at Akron General Medical Center has voted to affiliate with the Rubber Workers. The vote, on Apr. 6, was 502 to 130.

The unit, the AGMC Employes Labor Union, becomes the first group of hospital employes to affiliate with the URW. It represented 900 workers.

Labor Presses For Retention Of Tax Cuts

eign investment. "The result is that American workers lose their jobs, the economy loses part of its industrial base, the federal government loses revenue, and the average American taxpayers must pick up the tab."

In an unrelated area, Biemiller called to the Finance Committee's attention a problem that has arisen out of an Internal Revenue Service interpretation of employer contributions to prepaid legal services programs for workers.

Congress in 1973 enacted legislation making prepaid legal services a proper subject for collective bargaining. In the AFL-CIO's view, Biemiller said, that put such benefits in the same category as health service plans and other fringes.

He asked the committee to include in a tax bill clarifying language to make clear that prepaid legal service payments by employers are not part of a worker's taxable income.

Histadrut Role in Israel Impresses Union Editors

The unique contributions the Israeli labor movement—Histadrut—has made to the "building of the only viable democracy in the Middle East" emerged as a major impression of a delegation of AFL-CIO editors who recently concluded a 10-day visit to Israel.

The delegation, headed by Albert J. Zack, public relations director for the AFL-CIO, included Albert Herling of the Bakery Workers, president of the International Labor Press Association; Ray Pasnick, Steelworkers; Diane Curry, Railway Clerks; Gene Klare, Oregon Labor Press; David Selvin, Northern California Labor; Lee White, Communications Workers; Pat Ziska, Laborers; Ruben Levin, Labor; and Roger Sheldon, Carpenters.

In the 10-day trip they were briefed by Histadrut officials, headed by Yerucham Meshel, secretary general; government officials from the labor, defense and foreign affairs ministries; journalists covering labor affairs in Israel and the editorial board of the Jerusalem Post; officials of the Knesset, Kupat Holim and the Afro-Asian Institute for Labor & Cooperative Studies; leaders of Kibbutz Gonen and Moshav Kfar Yeshezkel; and trade unionists in many areas and occupations. The editors were the guests of Histadrut.

"We were impressed," Zack said, "by the warmth and the hospitality of the people and the openness and candor of every official we met. Our questions—from the most general to the most challenging—were answered categorically and frankly.

"We learned about Israel's problems and its successes; its aspirations as well as its accomplishments; its defense needs as well as its determination to remain free and independent.

"We gained a new admiration for its people; a new understanding of the unique contributions Histadrut has made to the building of the only viable democracy in the Middle East; a new regard for those freedom fighters we have long admired from abroad."

Improvements Needed:

Escalator Clauses Protect Record Number of Workers

One of the ways American workers have developed to cope with inflation is through union-negotiated contracts containing cost-of-living escalator clauses that increase pay as prices go up.

But even the best of them have been unable to provide complete protection against inflation, and unions will be seeking to improve them in major negotiations this year, John Zalusky, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, observes in the American Federationist.

"They should be improved to do away with 'caps,' whenever possible, and to decrease the time lag between price changes and wage adjustments," Zalusky says in the AFL-CIO monthly magazine. "They should be extended to cover more workers, where such coverage is possible."

Zalusky finds, however, that even with their imperfections escalator clauses are "a positive factor in the total economic picture."

They are essential to long-term labor agreements since they tend to create economic stability, and they are a reaction to price increases that have occurred, not the cause of such increased living costs, he notes.

"Escalator clauses are not an 'engine of inflation'," Zalusky says. "They are the caboose. But when it comes to paying for the essentials of life, the worker is better off in the caboose than waiting at the station."

Cost-of-living clauses are not a new idea, the author notes. They first appeared in printing and clothing industry labor agreements after World War I. They died out during the 1920s and were not renewed until after the Second World War, as workers tried to catch up with rapid inflation.

As prices increased more rapidly during the late 1960s, the number of workers covered by escalators rose. By the end of 1975, six million workers—or 59 percent of those under major agreements—were covered by COL clauses, Zalusky notes.

"This is the largest number and percentage of workers ever to share the benefits of escalator clauses," he observes. Even then, the statistics actually understate the total number covered.

As Zalusky points out, the Bureau of Labor Statistics which keeps track of such information reports only on major agreements covering 1,000 or more workers in private industry.

Estimates of escalator clause coverage in other agreements in early 1975, based on a BLS sampling, are that an additional 800,000—about 20 percent—of the workers in smaller manufacturing units are covered. Private, non-manufacturing coverage is estimated at 700,000, or 17 percent.

In public employment, 600,000 postal workers are covered by escalator clauses. A number of others in state and local employment, including teachers, have such coverage, but the total is not known.

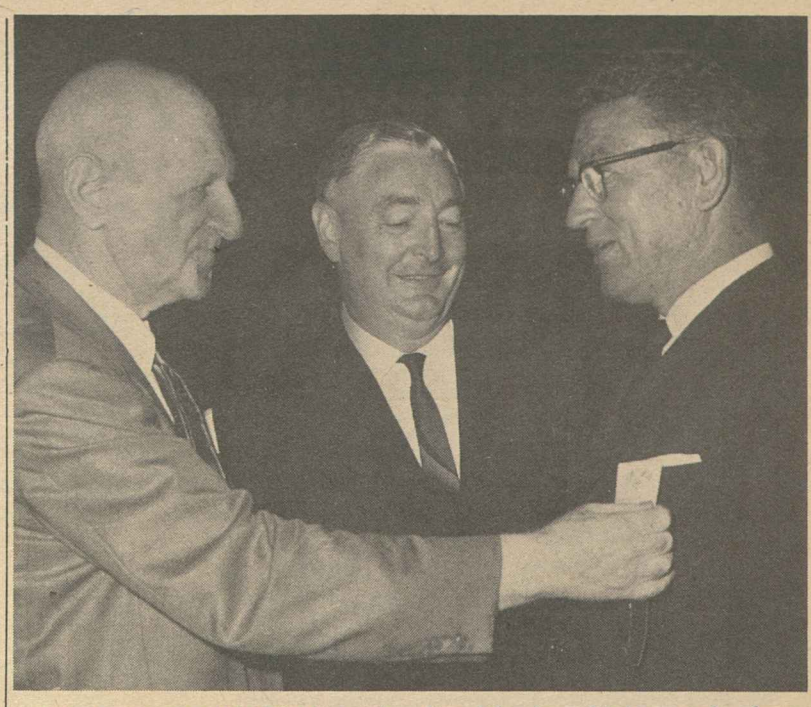
So, by the end of 1975, the estimated number of union members covered by escalator clauses was 8.5 million, with varying effectiveness in how well they protect the buying power of wages, according to Zalusky.

The essential element of an escalator clause is some measure of changes in living costs, the author points out. Most COL clauses use the national consumer price index, prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, as the measure for change.

Various collective bargaining agreements adjust wages upward by 1 cent per hour for as much as a five-tenths of 1 percent change in the CPI to as small a change as two-tenths of 1 percent, with variations in between.

The most common formula last year was a 1 cent change in wages for each three-tenths of a point change in the CPI. Approximately 41 percent of the workers under major agreements with escalator clauses were covered by this formula. The next most common formula, 1 cent for each fourth-tenths of 1 point change in the CPI, applied to 20 percent of these workers.

"Determining whether the rate of adjustment should be based on 0.5, 0.4, 0.3, 0.2, or even 0.1 point change in the index is a fundamental collective bargaining issue," Zalusky observes.



Regardless of the formula, though, escalators do not have the ability to keep the paycheck equal to a rising cost of living.

"In fact," Zalusky says, "with the usual clause, the average worker really only recovers 50 percent of purchasing power lost to price increases. The major reason is the time delay between changes in prices and the adjustment in wages the worker receives."

Factors in that delay include the lag between the collection of data for the CPI and the publication of the index; the contractually agreed upon period for escalator adjustments, such as once every three months or once a year, and the administrative delay, or time between the date the CPI is available and the day the worker receives his actual pay increase.

"The time lag is the major factor in the recovery being limited to around 50 percent," Zalusky observes. But there are others, such as capped escalator clauses. These clauses provide for wage adjustments based on changes in the CPI up to a given amount and none thereafter, regardless of additional increases in the CPI.

"Yet even with these shortcomings, contracts with escalator and productivity adjustments generally do better for workers than those without," Zalusky says. "Unfortunately, they don't fully do the job the worker needs done during this time of sharply increasing prices."

PASSING OF AN ERA in the Graphic Arts Union took place this month with the retirement of these three top officers who played leading roles in creation of the union through two mergers. Retiring as executive vice presidents are John Connolly, left, and William J. Hall, right, and as secretary-treasurer, Wesley A. Taylor. Hall headed the Photoengravers Union before its 1964 merger with the Lithographers. Connally and Taylor were president and secretary-treasurer of the Bookbinders before that union in 1972 became the third element to bring the GAIU into being.

Seven Officers Retire At Graphic Arts Union

One era came to an end and another commenced as the top leadership structure of the Graphic Arts International Union underwent changes called for by the 1972 merger of the Bookbinders and the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

The retirement of John Connolly, 85 years old and executive vice president of the GAIU since the merger, symbolized the passing of the old and the coming of the new

Under terms of the merger. the union's officer structure was changed by two actions to take place over a period of time. These actions stipulated that no officer could begin a term who was 65 years or older, and that the union's international council was to be reduced from 50 to 32 members.

Retiring with Connolly on Apr. 1 were GAIU's other executive vice president, William J. Hall; Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor; Recording Sec. Donald W. Stone, and Vice Presidents Jack H. Wallace, Bert C. Groves and Betty Whittaker.

By constitutional direction, one of the two executive vice presidential posts was eliminated. Replacing Connolly is Eugene M. Boerner, who moves up from his position as a GAIU vice president.

Joseph Hellman of New York Local 119B succeeds Taylor as secretary-treasurer. The positions of recording and financial secretaries were combined into one, which was assumed by Daniel A. Streeter, Jr., who had been serving as financial secretary.

New vice presidents are Leonard A. Adams, former president of Local 32B in Menasha, Wis., who replaces Boerner and Felicia Bonelli, former secretary-treasurer of New York Local 43B, who replaces Marian Moran, who retired last year.

To reduce the council to 32 members, 11 positions were eliminated. The makeup of the union consists now of four executive officers and 10 vice presidents who, along with 18 councilors, constitute the international council.

Connolly, who led the Bookbinders into the GAIU merger in 1972, is a former vice president of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

NLRB Rebuffs Publisher's Attempt To Bar Reporters as Professionals

Newspaper reporters, writers and editors are "generalists" and not "professional employes" under the National Labor Relations Act's narrow definition, the NLRB has reaffirmed.

While the jobs make "intellectual demands," carry special responsibilities" and are "challenging and diverse," they do not satisfy the law's "critical" requirement for "advanced" knowledge and a "prolonged" and "specialized" education, the board said.

That kind of knowledge "might be desirable for a journalist to have," the board observed, but, "it seems clear his work generally does not require it."

Noting "the employer's own testimony" that "it looks for those with a broad education," the board pointed out that the law "specifically distinguishes . . . a general education from that required for professional work."

The 3-to-1 ruling capped a year-long effort by the San Antonio Express and News to persuade the board to reverse its refusal in two cases 28 years ago to classify reporters, writers and editors as "professionals." The papers moved to reopen the question during representation proceedings for all its news room employes by the Typographical Union.

The Newspaper Guild and the ITU joined in opposition to the papers' move in hearings before the full NLRB last September.

Federal labor law bars those who fall within its definition of "professional employe" from inclusion in a bargaining unit with other nonprofessional employes unless a majority of the professionals first vote to be included. The two unions argued that acceptance of the publisher's arguments could seriously disrupt historic bargaining relationships throughout the newspaper industry.

At least five other publishers have since made similar moves in the face of organizing efforts among their papers' newsroom employes — four involving the Guild and the other the ITU.

Guild Counsel David Barr said he can "only deduce" that the finding in the San Antonio case signals the NLRB's future action in the others, "though it is not a certainty."

Guild Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker said the ruling should "mark the end of a publisher attempt to drive a wedge between newspersons and other newspaper employes . . . a tactic clearly designed to weaken the bargaining positions of both."

The board's holding was by members John H. Fanning, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and John A. Pennello. Its chairman, Betty Southard Murphy, who was a reporter for United Press in 1955 and 1956, issued a dissent covering 16 pages, one more than the majority's decision.

Murphy said she would find that editorial workers are professional employes based on the nature of their work, the skills and training required for effective performance and the employes' and their publishers' "unique responsibilities" under the First Amendment.

The board majority, however, said her dissent "failed to distinguish between 'professionals' within the meaning" of the labor act and "the term 'professional' as used to denote a person or persons doing admirable and challenging work."

The majority pointed to the law's requirement for a "prolonged course—or equivalent experience—of specialized instruction" and charged that under Murphy's position all hired as reporters "would instantly become professionals within the meaning of the act."

Since many "with limited academic training in journalism or limited journalistic experience perform well," the majority said, the work of journalists is not "professional" within the law's meaning.

Senate Okays Food Stamps Compromise

If these deductions brought a household's income below an updated poverty level, the household would be eligible to purchase food stamps for which it would pay 25 percent of its net income each month. The Administration wants to require payment of 30 percent of income and the original Agriculture Committee bill would have required 27.5 percent payment.

Regardless of deductions, no family would be eligible for food stamps if its annual income, for a family of four, exceeded $8,000.

Conservatives are heavily represented in the House Agriculture Committee and are expected to mount a stronger attack on the food stamp program than their Senate counterparts were able to put together.

Usery Opposes Sub-Minimum Pay

Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., expressed his personal opposition to the concept of a sub-minimum wage for youth.

He told reporters at a news briefing that the Administration hasn't yet taken a position on the matter. It's being studied, along with other minimum wage issues.

But Usery has "never supported" a lower teen-age pay floor because it would amount to taking jobs away from adults and giving them to youth.

Action Called 'Indefensible':

Ford Scored on Veto Of Hatch Act Reform

A labor-backed bill that would have allowed nearly 3 million federal and postal workers to take a more active part in political campaigns became the latest victim of a presidential veto.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. termed President Ford's veto of the Hatch Act amendments "indefensible" and urged an effort by Congress to override it. The bill passed the House and Senate by solid majorities, but not by the two-thirds margins that are needed to overturn a veto.

Although the bill strengthened existing safeguards against political pressure on government workers by their bosses, Ford contended it would leave them vulnerable to "extremely subtle" pressures to get involved in partisan politics.

At a news conference, Public Employee Dept. President W. Howard McClennan and Sec.-Treas. Clyde Webber termed Ford's veto another example of his administration's "callous and insensitive attitude toward public employes."

McClennan, who is president of the Fire Fighters, saw the veto as strictly political and representing "a partisan, fearful response" to greater political freedom for government workers.

Webber, who is president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said the AFGE and other department affiliates will be active during the Easter recess of Congress in support of the override attempt.

A department fact sheet on "the reactionary record of the Ford Administration" documents vetoes, veto threats and other presidential action against the interests of government workers.

Ford's disapproval of the Hatch Act changes was his 48th veto since taking office less than two years ago.

In an unrelated action, the Administration abandoned its effort to uphold the right of a President to kill a bill by a pocket veto when Congress is in recess, but has not adjourned.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) had filed a suit challenging a recess pocket veto by former President Nixon and one by President Ford.

On behalf of the President, Atty. Gen. Edward H. Levi informed the U.S. district court that the government will not attempt any further defense of the pocket veto device and that President Ford will not again make use of it.

Under the Constitution, a President has 10 days to sign or veto a bill. There is no challenge to his ability to let a bill die without his signature after Congress has adjourned. But in the future, Congress will have an opportunity to vote on overriding any bill vetoed during a recess such as the Easter Week or Christmas season vacations.

Meany Asks Ford to Set Quotas on Shoe Imports

The AFL-CIO asked President Ford to halt the destruction of an important American industry by setting quotas on imports of shoes.

AFL-CIO President George Meany said limiting the number of shoes that can be imported each year would be "the most effective relief for workers, consumers and for the industry itself."

Ford has before him a unanimous finding by the International Tariff Commission that the American footwear industry is being hurt by import competition. The commission was divided as to the remedy, however, and Ford has a free hand to shape his own solution. Three commissioners proposed higher tariffs, two called for a combination of quotas with stiff tariffs for imports above that level, and one recommended only adjustment assistance to workers and the industry.

Meany urged Ford to use his authority to "immediately impose quotas on imports of shoes," the remedy that has been urged by the federation's directly affected affiliates, the Boot & Shoe Workers and the United Shoe Workers.

Last year, imports of non-rubber footwear reached 320 million pairs and threaten to overtake the U.S. production of 434 million pairs.

Meany noted in his letter to Ford that many segments of the U.S. shoe industry "have already moved abroad to benefit from protected markets and subsidized exports to the United States. If relief is not forthcoming," he warned, "the rest of the industry will be inclined to move abroad where tax concessions, protected markets and outright government subsidies permit them to compete unfairly with U.S. companies."

But Meany stressed that American shoe workers and their communities can't leave the country. He cited the impact of closed factories on U.S. cities, and a "ripple effect" on other industries.

Thus, Meany noted, machinists who make dies for shoe machinery have been laid off in St. Louis—even though the Labor Dept. denied them adjustment assistance.

Unless the government acts, Meany warned, this country's industrial base will continue to be eroded. Jobs and production facilities are being exported in manufacturing industries "from apparel to aerospace," Meany reminded the President.

Energy Goals Keyed to Oil Independence

America will have an energy problem until it can free itself from dependence on oil imports "from insecure foreign sources," the AFL-CIO testified.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged the Senate Banking Committee to launch the Energy Independence Authority that has been proposed by Vice President Rockefeller.

The plan, endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting, calls for $100 billion in loans, loan guarantees and other financial assistance to develop all possible sources of domestic energy and conserve energy usage.

Biemiller termed a "stringent and mandatory conservation program" an essential first step.

But more than conservation is needed, he stressed. While coal and nuclear power represent the "best hope" for the short term, shale oil, solar power, geothermal heat and other energy sources should be developed.

Biemiller told the Senate panel that "private industry, left to itself, cannot and will not resolve the energy crisis."

The federal government, he said, must "directly involve itself" and should "engage in the production and distribution of energy whenever the national interest calls for it and private industry is unwilling or unable to do so."

Senate Budget Target Sidetracks Job Goals

tions is less automatic than the Senate pattern. While the Senate committee worked out its compromises in advance and came to the floor with substantial bipartisan agreement, the House committee is more sharply divided. A number of amendments are expected to be proposed when the resolution reaches the House floor after the Easter recess.

Under the congressional budget procedure, there is a deadline of May 15 for the House and Senate to reach agreement on a tentative budget for the next fiscal year—including spending authorizations and outlays broken down into 17 functional categories. It also includes estimates of revenue and the anticipated deficit.

The figures in this first resolution are not binding on Congress, but in last year's "dry run" of the budget procedure they acted as a strong restraint. As Congress considers authorizing and spending legislation, the Budget Committees monitor the bills and sound alarms when the estimates are exceeded.

A second and binding resolution will be adopted by Sept. 15, and thereafter no action breaking that budget ceiling can be taken without first adopting a new budget resolution increasing the ceiling.

Both the House and Senate budget resolutions assume continuation of the existing tax cuts through 1977, and additional revenues from tax reform of $2 billion.

While the determination of annual pay adjustments for government salaried employes and the military is still months off, both Budget Committees assumed that pay increases will be held below the level needed to maintain comparability with private industry. The budget totals assume only a 5 percent pay raise next October.

On public service jobs, the President's budget is based on a phase-out of the present 320,000 jobs to only 50,000 by the end of fiscal 1977. The Senate budget would maintain the program at slightly less than present levels, and the House committee budget would finance an increase to 550,000 jobs.

The House committee also would provide substantially more than the Senate would authorize for job-creating public works. But the Senate figure for water pollution construction grants, also an important job source, is substantially higher than the House. In both these areas, the President is not seeking any new budget authority.

Both the House and Senate budget versions are close to the President's proposals in national defense spending, the biggest single outlay governed by the appropriations process.

The congressional budget committees rejected Ford's request for higher social security tax rates.

The Senate adopted its budget target by a 66-22 vote.

Earlier votes, rejecting amendments, demonstrated the muscle that the Budget Committee recommendations carried. Thus, the Senate defeated, 58-27, a proposal by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to add $3.2 billion for job-creating programs and for added funds for health, urban affairs and aid to the elderly programs.

It rejected, 62-23, a move by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.) to slash $6.8 billion from the spending totals. And it also defeated attempts to reduce defense spending or increase farm aid.

The Senate resolution would continue postal service and mass transit subsidies that the President wants to cut.

This first resolution is not as detailed as the final budget resolution will be, since the various categories embrace a number of programs. Thus a degree of jockeying within the budget figures can be expected as congressional committees seek larger shares for favored programs.

Golda Meir to Receive Murray-Green Award

AFL-CIO President George Meany has announced that Golda Meir, former prime minister of Israel, has been chosen to receive the American labor movement's highest award.

Mrs. Meir will receive the Murray-Green award for public service and a $5,000 check at a dinner in Washington, May 20, highlighting a national conference of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services Activities.

The award honors the memory of Philip Murray, late president of the CIO, and William Green, late president of the AFL.

Mrs. Meir, a former Milwaukee schoolteacher whose father was a member of the Carpenters, is a member of Histadrut, Israel's labor federation.

"All the goals that Green and Murray fought for throughout their lives have been—and are—the goals of Golda Meir," Meany said. "She has fought for freedom all her life; defended human dignity with unquenchable determination; helped create, against tremendous odds, the unique, free labor movement of Israel.

"As a trade unionist and as a person she truly merits this award and we in the AFL-CIO are proud to pay tribute to such a gallant woman."

Labor Gives Full Backing To Rubber Strike, Boycott

Ford Hit on Denial of Shoe Quota

By John R. Oravec

President Ford's refusal to set limits or to raise tariffs on shoe imports — despite government findings that foreign footwear is decimating U.S. production and jobs—may signal the demise of the American shoe industry.

That warning was sounded by union officials who have seen 100,000 jobs wiped out by non-rubber shoe imports in the past eight years. The share of the U.S. shoe market taken over by imports has increased from 21.5 percent in 1968 to 47.9 percent last year, President George Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers pointed out.

President John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers said Ford's decision will encourage further increases in imports that will result in additional shutdowns of American shoe factories. He charged that Ford acts more concerned about the economies of foreign countries than about the problems of American shoe workers.

Mara and Fecteau belittled Ford's call for "expedited" trade adjustment assistance to affected firms, workers and communities. Such adjustment assistance has not worked in the past and will not work now, they stressed.

Fecteau noted that the average skilled shoe worker is in the mid-50s age bracket and has a difficult time finding a new job even after retraining.

When adjustment benefits run out after 12 months, displaced

Back-Home Message:

Congress Prodded On Employment Bill

The AFL-CIO is "serious" about passing the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill this year and setting the nation on a course pointed to "a job opportunity at a decent wage for each person able and willing to work."

That's one of the messages senators and representatives got when they returned to their home states during the Easter recess of Congress.

As in past years, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller enlisted the federation's state and local central bodies to push labor's program during the back-home visits of members of Congress. The grass roots lobbying took on special urgency this year because of four major votes scheduled soon after the Apr. 26 return of Congress.

On the forthcoming votes, the AFL-CIO urged:

- Final passage of the Federal Election Campaign bill that a House-Senate conference agreed on shortly before the Easter recess. It would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission so that public financing of presidential campaigns could continue and it would remedy a ruling by the present commission that would have given employers a weapon to pressure workers to contribute to management-established political funds.
- A congressional budget target that would provide more of a stimulus for the nation's economic recovery. While "both the Senate and House Budget Committee resolutions are totally inadequate in terms of the economic stimulus necessary to put America back to work," Biemiller noted that the House committee budget was more adequate than the version the Senate passed.

"The AFL-CIO opposes all efforts to amend the House Budget

Nursing Home Probes Set In Key Cities

The AFL-CIO has launched a series of community-based investigations of nursing homes designed to uncover abuses and assure "decent conditions for America's older citizens."

An Executive Council resolution last February committed the federation to "a national effort" to improve nursing home services, and AFL-CIO President George Meany enlisted the federation's city and state central bodies to achieve that goal.

Full-scale programs are being launched in 20 target cities with professional guidance from the

Firestone Key Target In Walkout

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO gave its full support to the Rubber Workers' strike against the Big Four tire makers and their boycott against the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., the union's target company in its current bargaining round with the industry.

"The United Rubber Workers' strike is completely justified," AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a statement.

"The boycott against Firestone will help bring this dispute to an early and favorable conclusion. We intend to do all we can to help."

Meany and Kirkland were authorized by the federation's Executive Council at its most recent meeting to give organized labor's backing to a possible URW boycott.

"Therefore, we call upon all members of organized labor, their families and friends, to immediately refuse to buy any products of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., and to continue this action until a satisfactory contract is achieved."

The 70,000 URW members employed by Firestone, B.F. Goodrich, Goodyear Tire & Rubber and Uniroyal, Inc., struck the industry after talks broke off at 2 a.m., on Apr. 21. The walkout earlier had been authorized by 95 percent of the rank-and-file membership.

URW President Peter Bommarito, who said the strike could "last for some time," charged that Firestone's final offer of $1.15 an hour wage increase over

Wage-Hour Chiseling Posts Sharp Increase

Employers shortchanged workers by $93.7 million in violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act uncovered by government investigators during the first nine months of fiscal year 1976, the Labor Dept. reported.

This is an increase of 14 percent over a similar period in the preceding year, while the number of affected workers rose 20 percent to 421,286.

Thus far, employers have agreed to restore $54.8 million to 334,550 workers, Ronald J. James, administrator of the Wage-Hour Division, said.

Most of the underpayments resulted from violations of minimum wage and overtime provisions of the federal labor law. Minimum wage underpayments totaled $29.1 million owed to 219,767 workers, and overtime underpayments amounted to $38.8 million owed to 193,660 workers.

Some workers were counted twice because they were underpaid in violation of both provisions, the Labor Dept. pointed out.

Other underpayments included violations of the Equal Pay Act, amounting to more than $15 million for nearly 20,000 workers, most of them women. The law re-

Contract Talks Open With General Electric

New York—Negotiations with the electrical-equipment industry got under way here as two unions holding national contracts with the General Electric Co. outlined their positions at meetings with management.

In an opening statement, President Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told the company he looked forward to an "early response" to the proposals of the IUE negotiating committee "so that we may expedite these negotiations in a true spirit of collective bargaining, and reach a settlement by the expiration of the present contract." The current pact expires on June 27.

Following Jennings's statement, President Albert J. Fitzgerald of the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers presented the general objectives of the UE negotiating committee.

The IUE represents some 90,000 workers and the UE about 17,000. Together with 11 other unions, they comprise the Coordinated three years was grossly inadequate to meet members' needs.

He said the company's proposal was "short of what we need for a cost-of-living wage catchup for 1976 alone. It does not provide rubber workers with any meaningful new money."

Bommarito, who heads the union's negotiating team, also noted that Firestone's offer contained no cost-of-living escalator provision for 1976 or 1977.

"While Firestone has offered what they call an 'uncapped' cost-of-living escalator clause for 1978 and 1979," he said, "it requires a 3.5 percent increase in the consumer price index before any cost-of-living wage adjustment could be made.

"Our calculations, based on a straight-line projection of a 7 percent annual increase in the cost-of-living, show that rubber workers would therefore receive no increase from this type of escalator clause before April 1978."

The URW wants an immediate wage catchup for its members to put them even with production workers in the automobile industry. The union says auto workers are now $1.65 ahead of the rubber workers in hourly pay.

In addition to a COL escalator, which the union has not had in previous contracts with the industry, the Rubber Workers want improvements in pension benefits, job security and in other fringe areas.

Bommarito reported that in talks with Firestone officials in Cleveland, the company made no offer in many of these areas, including retirees' pension benefits, supplement unemployment benefits, dental coverage, health and safety, and health insurance.

The union's contracts with Firestone, Goodyear, Uniroyal and Goodrich expired at 12:01 a.m., Apr. 21. The firms produce 65 percent of the nation's tires.

Bommarito cited two reasons for the union's industrywide shutdown rather than a selective strike against one of the Big Four firms, its strategy in the past.

First, he said, the four companies have taken virtually identical bargaining positions since negotiations got under way last month.

Secondly, the companies have a mutual aid pact, similar to that in the airlines industry, under which a struck firm receives aid from the other three companies.

Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service representatives sat in on the Firestone talks, which are continuing throughout the walkout.

Support for the strike and the boycott is expected to take on international dimensions. Bommarito was scheduled to meet in Geneva, Switzerland, on Apr. 26 with officials of the International Chemical & General Workers' Federation, the trade secretariat with which the URW is affiliated.

ICF Sec.-Gen. Charles Levinson earlier this spring sat in with the union's policy-setting committee when it drafted bargaining goals for the U.S. rubber industry. The ICF already has alerted its worldwide affiliates to possible solidarity action in support of the union.

In their statement endorsing the boycott, Meany and Kirkland declared that URW members have suffered, "as all workers have suffered, because of the economic mess" created by the Ford Administration.

"These workers, like all workers, need wage settlements that protect them against the erosion of inflation," they said. The government's report on March real spendable earnings showing workers' buying power at about the 1965 level underscores that fact, they said.

AFL-CIO state and local central bodies will receive complete instructions next week on how to implement the boycott, Meany and Kirkland said.

"In the meantime, we have asked the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to mobilize its resources, and we urge the labor press to fully publicize this boycott," they said.

Labor Editors Endorse Postal Service Subsidy

The International Labor Press Association has urged the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee to approve a bill introduced by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) to establish a federal subsidy for the postal service and to include an amendment setting a percentage ceiling on postal rates for non-profit second-class mail.

In a statement filed with the committee, ILPA Sec.-Treas. Allen Y. Zack termed non-profit second class publications "an endangered species." He said, "Trade union publications are being cut back due to the inflationary pressures that affect all publications—newsprint, printing, salaries. But the principal cause of cutbacks has been increased postal rates."

Zack blames the current ills of the U.S. Postal Service on "mismanagement, inflation, and soaring energy costs. Operating costs are going up, services and volume are going down."

The McGee bill—S. 2844—provides for a public service subsidy for the USPS in the amount of approximately $3 billion over a period of the next three years. It further provides for creation of a commission to research, study, and report in two years what should be defined as public service and how much public service appropriations should be meted out to the postal service on an annual basis.

The amendment proposed by ILPA would restore to qualified non-profit organizations the level of postage rates paid by them prior to enactment of the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act— approximately half the applicable commercial rate.

The ILPA represents nearly 450 publications of the AFL-CIO, its subordinate bodies, affiliated national and international unions and their subordinate bodies. Regional and industrial labor press associations affiliated with ILPA represent an additional 250 labor publications, primarily those of local unions. The overwhelming majority of these publications are distributed through the mails under non-profit second-class entries.

Unions to Put Spotlight On Nursing Homes

AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services. Meany expressed the hope that all central bodies will undertake nursing home investigations, and Community Services Director Leo Perlis followed up with guidelines for the central bodies. Local labor councils were asked to cooperate with other community groups, such as affiliates of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

The Executive Council statement mandating the program said that while some establishments provide conscientious care, "scandals continue to mount." It cited "unscrupulous" nursing home operators, laboratories, doctors and others who are "skimming their share off the top of the Medicare and Medicaid programs."

Patients in these homes "are our members, our parents, our friends and our relatives," the council statement said. Findings of labor committees will be made public and sent to Congress.

Perlis, in a follow-up to Meany's letter, told cooperating central body officials that the investigations will require recruiting volunteers to visit selected nursing homes, evaluating them against a checklist of standards established by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, developing a coalition of community groups to seek improvements, enlisting media involvement in the campaign, and gaining support for enforcement of state laws and local health, fire and building codes.

2 New Chairmen Head AFL-CIO Committees

AFL-CIO President George Meany announced the appointment of two new chairmen of federal standing committees on housing and on safety and occupational health.

Vice President William Sidell, president of the Carpenters, is the new chairman of the Housing Committee succeeding Joseph D. Keenan.

Vice President A. F. Grospiron, president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, is the new chairman of the Safety & Occupational Health Committee, succeeding Richard F. Walsh.

Keenan and Walsh resigned from the AFL-CIO Executive Council in recent months.

The chairmen of other standing committees are:

Civil Rights — Vice President Frederick O'Neal, Actors & Artistes.

Community Service — Vice President Peter Bommarito, Rubber Workers.

Economic Policy — Vice President I. W. Abel, Steelworkers.

Social Security — Vice President Floyd E. Smith, Machinists.

Education—Vice President Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers.

International Affairs—Vice President Martin J. Ward, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

Organization — Vice President Paul Hall, Seafarers.

Meany is chairman of the Legislative and Political Education Committees. AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger is chairman of the Research Committee.

Four Women Named To Civil Rights Panel

Four women trade union leaders have been named to the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee to expand the committee's scope and participation in aiding women workers.

AFL-CIO President George Meany named the four women in line with the position adopted by the federation's 11th convention in October 1975 that the Civil Rights Committee be expanded by adding "persons who are knowledgeable about the problems of women workers."

Named to the committee are Dina Beaumont, a vice president of the Communications Workers; Sandra Feldman, a vice president of the Teachers; Joyce Miller, assistant to the president of the Clothing Workers; Louise Smothers, director of women's affairs for the Government Employees.

There are 19 other members of the committee headed by AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes.

The convention action came on a resolution introduced by the CWA to amend the AFL-CIO constitution to add a Committee on Women. The convention's Constitution Committee rejected that approach, noting that issues concerning women are within the area of the Civil Rights Committee. It recommended that the Civil Rights Committee be expanded and that the constitution be made explicit in stating that the committee has the responsibility for dealing with issues concerning women.

The committee's approach was unanimously supported by the convention after brief speeches by CWA President Glenn Watts, the late Myra Wolfgang, a vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees, and O'Neal.

Contract Talks Open With General Electric

Bargaining Committee of GE-Westinghouse Unions.

Although the IUE and the UE separately carry on negotiations for their own members, each union's bargaining committee includes a representative group of members from other CBC affiliates. The CBC also operates a nationwide teletype network during negotiations to keep all unions abreast of developments.

The unions' general goals include a wage increase that would compensate for the three-year loss due to a cap on the present cost-of-living escalator, plus an additional wage boost; improved pensions and early retirement; a shorter workweek with no loss of pay; broader health insurance; a genuine program of supplemental unemployment benefits, and a union shop.

Jennings noted that there has been a "slow but steady improvement" in IUE's relationship with GE in recent years, and expressed hope that this improved relationship would help achieve a "productive and peaceful" settlement.

IUE Sec.-Treas. David J. Fitzmaurice, who will become the union's president on June 1, is expected to play a leading role in the GE talks. Jennings has resigned for health reasons. Chairman of the IUE negotiating committee is John Shambo.

The two union negotiating committees are scheduled to meet with the company next on Apr. 27.

The unions and GE have agreed to follow the practice initiated three years ago of refusing to issue play-by-play accounts of bargaining progress.

The CBC unions have plant-by-plant contracts with GE. However, basic contract patterns for all unions are established in New York.

Union negotiations with Westinghouse are scheduled to begin on May 12 against a July 11 deadline.

AFL-CIO unions participating in the coordinated bargaining effort are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Firemen & Oilers, Carpenters, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the IUE. Unaffiliated unions taking part are the UE, Teamsters and Auto Workers.

'Spy Who Came In From Cold':

Stover Must Rehire Repentant Informer

Russell Stover Candies, Inc., the object of a nationwide labor boycott, has been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to reinstate a warehouse supervisor who was fired after refusing to continue illegal anti-union activities.

The NLRB directed the candy company to rehire Henry R. Johnson with full back pay and to cease other anti-union practices against the Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Johnson was originally hired at the Stover plant in Montrose, Colo., in November 1974, four months after the B&C failed to gain a majority in an NLRB representation election. The NLRB has since ordered a new election at the plant because of the company's unfair labor practices.

Johnson was given the additional assignment of spying on workers involved in union activities at the Colorado facility.

After workers became suspicious of Johnson, he conferred with a lawyer who advised him the spying was illegal and that he should stop it immediately.

Johnson then told his boss he would no longer serve as an informer and called a meeting of the employes at which he apologized for his activities.

Within hours, Johnson was fired. The company management charged that he had done an inadequate job of taking inventory.

An administrative law judge for the NLRB ordered the company to rehire Johnson with full rights and directed it to halt its attempts to spy on B&C Local 72 and other illegal activities directed at the union. The NLRB upheld the ruling Apr. 8.

The spying incident at the Colorado plant is just one aspect of the union's difficulties with the large candy firm, B&C Executive Vice President John DeConcini noted in a letter to members of Congress.

He cited as other examples the delaying tactics and refusal to bargain in good faith at Stover's Lincoln, Neb., plant where the B&C won a representation election in 1974.

The company filed a series of protests after the election, but the NLRB rejected them. All of the firm's objections were determined to have no foundation, DeConcini pointed out.

Although Russell Stover is one of the most profitable candy producers in the country, DeConcini observed, "This company pays inferior wages and benefits to its employes."

Most production workers are paid at or just barely above the federal minimum wage and their pension and health insurance benefits are grossly inadequate, he said.

The B&C has pledged to continue to press its consumer boycott at stores selling Russell Stover candies until the firm complies with NLRB directives and discontinues its illegal and anti-union practices at the Montrose and Lincoln plants, DeConcini stressed.

Cheating on Wages, Hours Found Rising

quires equal pay for men and women doing substantially equal work in the same establishment.

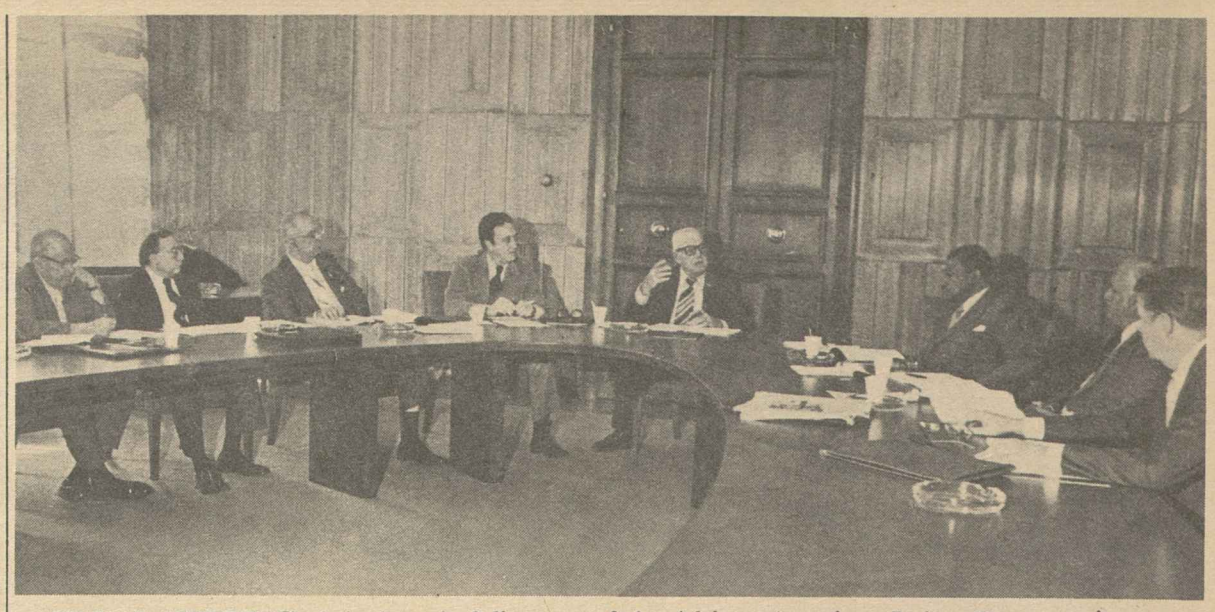
The Wage-Hour compliance officers also found $6.5 million in underpayments owed to about 1,500 workers in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and $4 million owed in back wages to 21,000 workers by employers under federally funded or assisted contracts.

Of the 8,185 child labor violations uncovered during the nine-month period, 1,900 involved the illegal employment of minors in hazardous jobs.

Teachers Ask Increase In Federal School Aid

The American Federation of Teachers called on the House Subcommittee on Labor-HEW Appropriations to boost President Ford's budget requests for education programs in the next fiscal year by more than $2.5 billion and to use a separate appropriations measure as the vehicle.

Gregory Humphrey, co-director of legislation for the AFT, told the subcommittee that after accounting for inflation, federal aid to education has been in steady decline from fiscal year 1971 to 1977.



"An investment in education is an investment in the productivity of our citizenry," Humphrey said. "In spite of the constant veto threat that the annual education appropriation faces, vetoes were overridden on those occasions when there was a separate appropriations bill for education." He pointed out that of five Nixon-Ford appropriations vetoes, the two that were overridden were separate education bills.

Humphrey commented that "the President's budget has almost no relation to the needs of education." He cited several programs slated for extinction by the Administration such as supplemental opportunities grants, emergency school funding, library resources, and instructional equipment.

"The AFT recognizes the value of these programs," he said, "and we strongly recommend the continued funding of the ongoing programs in elementary and secondary education and higher education that are now endangered."

Throughout his testimony, Humphrey emphasized the AFT's support for the forward funding of education programs. Through forward funding, he said, Congress gives local school districts time "to adequately plan for quality education programs by committing the funds necessary to implement them a year in advance."

In a related action, AFT President Albert Shanker wrote all members of the House urging that education funds for the current fiscal year be increased by $375 million. The total would include $60 million to help states meet requirements under new legislation for education of the handicapped. The remaining $315 million, Shanker said, is needed to maintain at present levels the program of educational opportunity grants for college students.

ANNUAL MEETING of the board of directors of the African-American Labor Center reviews conditions affecting trade union activities on the African continent. AFL-CIO President George Meany is the board chairman. Others taking part in the discussions included AALC Sec.-Treas. Frederick O'Neal and Executive Director Patrick O'Farrell.

Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Delegates Ask Election Year Vote Drive

Pittsburgh—Labor's bicentennial year challenge is to make the trade union vote count in 1976 elections, the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO declared.

More than 2,000 delegates to the state convention here adopted a three-part political agenda. It calls for a massive voter registration drive among union members and their families, an effective campaign to get out the vote on election day, and voluntary political contributions to assist COPE-endorsed candidates.

The four-day convention of one of the AFL-CIO's largest central bodies marked the retirement of Executive Vice President Michael Johnson after 14 years in the post and 40 years of service to the labor movement. He has been named to a fulltime post as a member of Pennsylvania's Public Utility Commission.

As his successor, delegates elected James Mahoney, a business agent of the Philadelphia Joint Board of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Mahoney won in a contest with John Hormell, secretary-treasurer of a Pittsburgh Meat Cutters local.

Convention delegates gave an enthusiastic welcome to Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), and the warmth was returned. "You've been my strength, my inspiration," he told the cheering, applauding delegates.

Humphrey's advice to candidates was that "Democrats should run against the Nixon-Ford Administration that has given us double-digit inflation and depression-level unemployment . . . not against the Washington of social security and Medicare, jobs and economic growth."

Other major speakers included Sen. Richard S. Schweiker, a Republican whose labor endorsement helped him win re-election by a big margin in 1974; Gov. Milton Shapp, and a galaxy of prominent union, state and federal officials.

In major resolutions adopted by the convention, the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO:

- Asked stepped-up enforcement of the federal Occupational Safety & Health Act in order to "stop industrial manslaughter" in the state. It also urged affiliates and union leaders "to redouble their efforts in searching out potential dangers at the workplace."
- Called on the Labor Dept. to make its unemployment statistics more valid by including as jobless "those who are working part-time" because they can't find full-time jobs "and those who have become so discouraged that they have given up looking for work."
- Urged local central bodies to cooperate with the national AFL-CIO in investigating nursing homes in their communities.
- Put a high priority on labor's effort to get the state legislature to curb injunctions in labor disputes. A state law patterned after the federal Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed in 1937 but was gutted two years later under a conservative administration, the resolution noted. Since then, it said, injunctions have become the tools of employers to break strikes.
- Asked federal subsidies for postal services and opposed cutbacks in service and layoffs of workers.
- Sought overhaul of the Landrum-Griffin Act "to prevent unnecessary intrusion into democratic union elections and internal union affiairs."

Karth to Retire From House Seat

St. Paul, Minn.—A former union organizer who has served nine terms in Congress announced that he will not be a candidate for re-election this year.

Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D-Minn.) told leaders of the St. Paul AFL-CIO of his decision at a meeting in which he thanked the labor movement for its consistent support. Karth, 54, is a former international representative of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Denial of Shoe Quotas Seen Destroying Jobs

workers must then use up their living savings, Fecteau said. After that, they must resort to public welfare.

In effect, Fecteau said, "trade adjustments assistance is nothing more than a few extra flowers for the funeral."

He stressed that the American shoe industry needs a chance to exist, but Ford's decision will not provide that chance.

AFL-CIO foreign trade economists noted that in February, the U.S. International Trade Commission unanimously found that imports were seriously injuring the American shoe industry. Three of the six commissioners recommended higher import tariffs and two others urged a tariff rate-quota system, but only one called for nothing more than the continuation of trade adjustment assistance—the recommendation embraced by Ford.

Fecteau charged that Ford had been under heavy pressure by foreign trade lobbyists and footwear retailers, who hailed the White House decision as a victory. They claimed consumers would benefit by lower prices on imported shoes.

But data compiled by the United Shoe Workers shows that prices on foreign-made footwear are being raised even as the volume of imports soars. Fecteau said that while the retail markup on domestic shoes averages 50 percent, the markup on imports ranges from 100 to 300 percent—reflecting higher profits for retailers, with little or no savings passed on to consumers.

Most foreign shoes coming into the United States are produced at substandard wages in Italy, Spain, Taiwan, Brazil and South Korea, the unions said.

In rejecting the recommendations for quotas or higher import duties, Ford released statistics showing U.S. shoe production and employment in the industry increasing in the first two months of 1976 over the comparable period of 1975.

However, the USW said that the two-month comparison does not take into account the broader impact of imports on the industry over the past decade.

While U.S. production plunged from 642 million pairs in 1968 to an estimated 378 million in 1975, imports surged from 175 million to an estimated 345 million last year.

At the same time, Fecteau said, the number of production workers in the domestic shoe industry dropped from 204,100 in 1968 to an estimated 137,600 last year. Thousands of jobs in industries that supply components for shoe manufacturers were also lost during the eight-year period.

The continuing rise in imports is affecting workers and manufacturers alike as hundreds of production plants have been shut down in the past decade. The only firms that have shown any gains are those that have shifted production operations to low-wage countries overseas, Fecteau said.

Mara warned that Ford's decision will encourage many more domestic manufacturers to follow this trend in the quest of higher profits.

The Prevailing Rate Concept

THE AMERICAN TRADE UNION movement has fought hard over the years to improve the standards governing the conditions of employment for all of the nation's workers. As a result of these efforts, both in collective bargaining and in legislation, the country today has far fewer sweatshops, much less exploitation of wage earners, and many more safe and healthy workplaces.

The families of workers, the unorganized as well as the organized, live better and eat better, and enjoy more economic security, than could ever possibly be the case in the absence of these efforts by the trade union movement.

The accomplishments were not easily achieved. Every step of progress—every piece of protective labor legislation, every move to improve the workers' health and security, every reduction in hours of work, every improvement in wages, including the minimum wage—has come grudgingly and in the face of strong resistance from the forces that always place profits before people. The record, however, amply demonstrates that social progress and economic profits are not at all incompatible.

Except for those who seek to gain through sweatshop conditions and the exploitation of workers, the social progress that is represented by the improvements in labor standards thus far achieved has been accompanied by growth in profits. Those improvements have not inhibited the nation's economic advance but have, instead, contributed to it.

Despite this, every effort to promote the well-being of America's working people still meets with the same intense resistance, and pressures to turn back the clock persist. A prime example is the assault to which the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act have been subjected by those who would destroy the labor standards these laws are intended to protect.

These two statutes are designed to assure that contractors who do business with the federal government will pay their workers on the basis of prevailing conditions.

The Davis-Bacon program covers construction work, and the Service Contract Act applies to a variety of service-type activities—custodial and janitorial work; laundry, food, cafeteria, and security services; and some maintenance and miscellaneous housekeeping functions. Although some skilled jobs are involved, most of the work covered by the Service Contract Act is unskilled, and the wages, even for unionized employes in these types of jobs, are rather low.

The use of the prevailing rate concept is fair and equitable, and constructive. It places all bidders on an equal footing insofar as wage payments are concerned. But most important, properly administered, it keeps the government from being put in the position of contributing to the thrust for wage-cutting and tearing down standards, practices engaged in by all too many profiteers even now.

Ripoffs Disguised as Religions Shouldn't Escape Tax Collector

By John P. Roche

SOME YEARS AGO I suggested to the other families who belong to our summer commune on Martha's Vineyard that we reorganize ourselves as a church. We had great fun with this proposal—which as treasurer I had made in rueful jest after paying the property taxes. A patriarch was designated, the trustees were named apostles, and even the lowly treasurer became an archdeacon. We tentatively decided to call our religious fellowship the "Chilmark Center for Divine Rationality."

It was good fun for one summer, but passed with the season. (The year following we discussed getting federal assistance as a "pocket of poverty.") However, the more I read about the wealth that some religious cults have accumulated, the more I wonder whether we bypassed a good thing.

After all, if a family came to the Chilmark Center for Divine Rationality for the month of August to participate in a "retreat" (on South Beach), the expenditure could presumably be deducted from gross income as a religious activity. So could all capital assessments and naturally we would escape local property taxation.

Before our good friends, the permanent residents of Chilmark, get upset, let me assure them there will be no such caper. But many communities (and the Internal Revenue Service) are confronted with the very sticky question: When is a religion not a religion but a ripoff? A hard-line atheist would, of course, argue all religions fall into the latter category. Strict believers in the separation of church and state can duck that punch by insisting that no religious activity should be tax exempt. While I am prepared to admit that one person's belief may be another's superstition, there are I submit significant historical grounds for differentiating between bona fide churches and religiously disguised rackets.

The first is ecclesiastical continuity or, if you prefer, bureaucratic stability. A church is not a one-person band (I use person because in the 1920s Aimee Semple McPherson's Angelus Temple in Los Angeles was a one-woman operation and a spectacular exercise in malversation); it is not built upon the ephemeral charisma of some guru. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the theological views expressed, a church is a continuing service organization. This is as true of Judaism, reaching far back into the past, as it is of Mormonism or Christian Science, 19th Century innovations.

Then there is the cold-blooded question I picked up from my friend Inspector Maigret: "Who gets the money?" Does it go to support personnel engaged in the care of souls, or into fancy real estate and even fancier cars? If churches were private corporations, they would be subject to both internal audits and to the IRS. Most established churches do in fact inform their parishioners of the state of their finances (usually these days in woeful words), but any organization claiming the protected status of a religious body should be required to open its books. As an evaluative rule of thumb, I would suggest that no group be accredited if more than 10 percent of its annual income is devoted to the perquisites, direct and indirect, of its leader.

HOWEVER, THERE IS a constitutional problem: Does the First Amendment guarantee of religious freedom prevent the federal government or the states (via the 14th Amendment) from defining bona fide religious organizations? The answers to this are mixed. In the latter part of the 19th Century federal authorities, with the blessings of the Supreme Court, gave the Mormons a very hard time.

On the other hand, the court has tip-toed around a number of delicate issues in this category, and the late Justice Robert Jackson once (in dissent) went so far as to argue that for the Supreme Court, a governmental organ, to take up religious questions was in itself a violation of the separation of church and state!

Yet—perhaps because I just paid my income taxes—I think some litigation against some of the more notorious cults is in order. It would have been nice to deduct our summer retreat to South Beach as a religious contribution.

'U.S. Cannot Wait':

Unfair Foreign Trade Policies Demand Immediate Correction

By Nat Goldfinger

The following is excerpted from an article on world trade written for publication in the Journal of Commerce.

THE AFL-CIO CONTINUES to support strong, vigorous and fair international trade, but in 1976 world trade is neither strong nor fair. The rising tide of restrictions abroad, the untreated injury from imports and the ever-increasing impact of multinational firms and banks require action now. These companies and banks, often with government partners or management, now dominate the trading scene.

World trade statistics fare better than national economic trends in a recession-bound world. Inflation and recession make national trade figures zig-zag while unemployment and lost output depress living standards.

Last year, for example, world trade rose in value 4 percent to $800 billion. Volume dropped 6 percent. U.S. exports rose to more than $107 billion, but both U.S. imports and exports declined in volume. Many multinationals and the Administration hailed the unexpected U.S. trade surplus of exports over imports. But even that surplus vanished in January 1976.

The American economy is suffering damage from imports — past, present and potential. Other nations seek to export their recessions here and erect even higher barriers at home to further protect their economies. U.S. firms continue to export their technology and operations abroad to serve their foreign markets and, in many instances, to produce for this market.

With one in ten Americans unable to find full-time work, organized labor did not hail the 1975 export surplus. Export gains were largely in grains and raw materials shipments, where few high-paying jobs exist. Other increases came from shipments of production machinery and the newest technology to many points in the globe.

Imports of many product lines—from garments to machinery to electronics—continued to rise even after the U.S. market and production fell to low levels. The U.S. took virtually no action.

But elsewhere in the world, rich and poor nations alike took strong actions. Some, like Brazil and Mexico, tightened restrictions on their already highly protected economies. Some put quotas on products like shoes or cars—Sweden and Australia, for example. Others reached agreements to restrain shipments of key products among themselves—such as steel restraints between the Common Market and Japan. Many pressed their government-managed industries to export to the United States to keep their mills running while U.S. shut-downs continued in specialty steel and autos, for example.

To American workers, the result can be summed up in a single word well-known to American labor: "Unfair."

The Trade Act of 1974 was supposed to promote "fair" trade, full employment and economic growth. Negotiations were authorized to solve problems. But those who had insisted that the Congress pass that law began to oppose carrying out any provisions that hurt their special interests.

Foreign nations acted without negotiations and asked for pre-negotiation actions. And the U.S. complied. Foreign nations took steps that burdened U.S. trade even further. The U.S. did not act to make the law's provisions work to press the rights of U.S. industries. Many multinationals, now producing abroad, fought every attempt to save U.S. industry.

Instead, the United States gave pre-negotiation concessions, and continued the tax and trade provisions of U.S. law which grant preferential status to foreign production.

On Jan. 1, 1976, the United States announced tariff reductions to zero on 2,700 products. These are imports from more than 100 nations and territories, including Romania and Brazil, Mexico and Chile. Multinational corporation producers abroad will now intensify their exports to the U.S. from the lowest wage areas to wipe out more U.S. producers and American jobs. These losses will be felt by Americans at every skill and income level, every race, creed and color.

On Mar. 1, the United States announced changes in these regulations—adding more products and removing others. The tariffs will change, but imports will continue to assault American production and jobs.

These so-called "preferences" are added to long-standing U.S. laws which give preferential status to foreign production by U.S. firms abroad. These are loopholes in the tariff code—technically described as items 806.30 and 807. Despite almost a decade of U.S. labor opposition, these two provisions continue to encourage foreign production for shipment back to the United States.

Multinationals also continue to export jobs through co-production agreements which provide for jobs and production abroad to produce much of the final U.S. "sale" to that country. Increasingly these agreements are with Communist countries.

We therefore urge the following steps to achieve fair and strong world trade:

- Enforcement of provisions of the Trade Act of 1974 that assert U.S. rights to act to keep industry and jobs from destruction from unfair practices abroad.
- An end to all preferential tax treatment for the foreign operations of multinationals.
- Federal monitoring of multinationals to measure their impact on employment, investment and productivity.
- Regulation of exports of advanced productive equipment, capital and technology.
- Restrictions on imports into the United States to help build American jobs and protect the economy.

To Meet Human Needs:

Screening, Referral Agencies Expand Community Services

NEW AND INNOVATIVE local community service programs are being shaped by the labor movement in a dozen major cities, John McManus, assistant director of the Federation's Dept. of Community Services, reported.

The labor-created and operated screening and referral programs are organized in a framework outlined by the AFL-CIO Executive Council aimed at reaching more people, with better service, to meet "day-to-day human needs not covered by the union contract," McManus said. He stressed that the labor agencies are not "in any way in competition with the United Way," but "actually compliment the services in the general community."

Labor agency services, while designed primarily for union members and their families, are available to the total community, regardless of union membership. The agencies, he said, are governed by a voluntary board of directors from the community, and are staffed by trained and experienced trade unionists, who are "highly-skilled, know the resources of the community and know how to match those resources with the needs."

The labor agency, he added, "puts the problem squarely on the table and without razzle-dazzle, tries to find the solution."

McManus said on Labor News Conference that the hard economy and high unemployment of the recent years have brought a sharp increase in requests for help, and that assistance with the food stamp program is among the most frequent requests.

He said that labor agency staffs and other labor community services representatives are also reaching out to inform people who may be eligible for food stamps but don't realize they qualify. He said the Ford Administration's drive to slash the food stamp program should be centered on correcting the Dept. of Agriculture's "botched-up mess" in administering the law, instead of cutting millions of very needy families out of the program.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WITH TWO OF THE YEAR'S major collective bargaining showdowns now out of the way, the word "pattern" is becoming ever more popular.

Newspaper editorial writers, government economists and industry analysts have been poring over the fine print in the recent Teamsters' trucking settlement and an earlier Ladies' Garment Workers agreement. From this they are extracting their "pattern" nugget—the pattern being "what labor will get this year."

Arnold R. Weber, the first chairman of the Cost of Living Council in 1971, has emerged as a member of the pattern pack. Weber, now dean of the Graduate School of Industrial Administration at Carnegie-Mellon University, told an investors' conference that the Teamsters' settlement is a potentially inflationary trend-setter. But, he intoned, the United States could squeak by in 1976 with wages in the unionized sector rising by 9 to 9.5 percent—a range he called "tolerable."

A few days earlier, top Administration economist Alan Greenspan said the Teamster agreement was "at the outer end of the range at which we could say the contract was not of the triggering variety" in terms of inflation.

Thus the inference from both Weber and Greenspan that anything over that amount is tantamount to an inflationary spiral that could destroy the nation. Weber and Greenspan, like other conservative economists within and without the Ford Administration, are trying to lock the door on future negotiations, trying to set the "pattern" in concrete so hard that public sentiment might go against any union with the audacity to fight for something different in its own industry.

The Teamsters, negotiating for nearly 450,000 truckers, won a contract calling for what is generally believed will come to 9 to 10 percent a year in increases. The ILGWU, negotiating for some 55,000 workers in the apparel industry, signed a three-year contract worth roughly 25 percent in wage and fringe increases.

Weber, Greenspan and their economic bedfellows would have us believe it's now just a question of everybody else simply falling into line short of these 8 to 10 percent settlements—"the outer end of the range."

It isn't that easy or simple. While Weber and Greenspan may select a "pattern" which they would like to see followed, the complexity of collective bargaining more closely resembles an old-style quilt—the pieces carefully chosen and sewn together into the unique whole that best serves the needs, desires and whims of the makers.

THE AMOUNT OF MONEY a union can negotiate is, as a recently defrocked U.S. President liked to say, "the bottom line." Each fringe benefit won, each improved safety rule bargained, has a price tag. Even if there is no actual monetary cost involved, employers are sure to claim that any changes sought will somehow cut into profits and therefore have an impact in an overall settlement.

All unions want to win larger paychecks for their members. But, at the same time, a potentially larger paycheck means little to a worker who will be laid off the day after payday, maybe for months. So other considerations come into the bargaining picture—job security, safety, pensions or any one of literally thousands of items that affect a worker's wages, hours or working conditions.

Some 750,000 construction workers are in the grip of a tragically high unemployment rate—16 percent at last count, with little hope of quick recovery. While wages are important to them as well, perhaps more important is reaching agreement with industry employers on ways to create more jobs and get the industry back on its feet.

All down the line—in electrical manufacturing, meatpacking, farm equipment and in other industries—specific problems call for specific solutions. No mythical pattern can be the panacea.

What it all comes down to is that there really is no such thing as a "pattern" and it can be a tragic mistake for an employer to think there is. Each industry is different, each industry's workers have different needs.

NEW EFFECTIVENESS is being built into union-operated community service programs in a dozen major cities, Assistant Community Services Director John McManus, center, reported on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Lloyd Schwartz, left, of the Fairchild Publications and David Prosten of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO-produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Houston Displays The Union Label

THE 200 YEARS OF PROGRESS in labor-management relations in America was symbolized by the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show at Houston, featuring the products and services of union members and their employers.

Thousands of visitors jammed the Albert Thomas Hall daily to view the more than 400 exhibits during the week-long event.

The bicentennial edition of the show, sponsored annually by the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept., proved to be one of the most successful in terms of exhibitor participation and attendance.

An estimated $100,000 worth of prizes, gifts and souvenirs were distributed as show-goers toured the exhibits of union-made goods and witnessed the skills of various craftsmen.

Tree-Harvesting Threatened:

Bill Backed to Avert Shortage of Lumber

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to help avert a lumber shortage that would set back the nation's housing goals while adding to both unemployment and inflation.

Legislation is needed to overcome a federal appellate court's interpretation of an 1897 conservation law, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said. The court had ordered the Forest Service to stop allowing clear-cutting of portions of national forests, even though the trees removed are replaced through reforestation.

Earlier, the Carpenters warned that the practical effect of the court ruling would be disastrous to the union's 150,000 directly affected members in forest-related industries and to many more workers and consumers generally who would be hurt by shortages and higher prices.

Another directly affected union, the Woodworkers, also asked congressional action in a resolution passed at its recent convention.

Under the court ruling, since adopted by district courts in other jurisdictions, only individual trees designated by the Forest Service as dead or mature could be cut down.

Bills introduced by Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Rep. Harold T. Johnson (D-Calif.) would amend the 1897 law to allow regulated clear-cutting to continue.

The Humphrey-Johnson bill was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO and the unions most affected.

The Carpenters noted that the direct impact of the appellate court decision, which dealt with timber contracts in the Monongahela National Forest of West Virginia, has been to cut supplies to the extent that "mills have already begun to close in the Appalachian region, where unemployment has been a chronic problem," and communities heavily dependent on national forest timber are "on the brink of disaster."

The Woodworkers convention warned of a lumber crisis in the Pacific Northwest if the ban on clear-cutting is spread nationwide, as several lower court decisions would indicate.

Biemiller, in letters to the House and Senate Agriculture subcommittees dealing with the issue, stressed that "the supply of timber from our national forests has been a basic source of construction lumber for home building."

He noted that the Humphrey and Johnson bills assure that conservation principles would continue to be followed and provide for "public participation in the development and review of proposed national forest management plans" to obtain "the views of all concerned interests."

Biemiller warned that unless such legislation is enacted, shortages of softwood lumber would sharply increase construction costs.

"Resultant high unemployment of construction workers would contribute to economic recession," he said, "while the resultant housing shortage would contribute to inflation through increased housing prices and rents."

Employment Bill Termed Pressing Goal

Committee proposal by cutting back funds for economic stimulus," Biemiller wrote. "The AFL-CIO supports any effort to increase funds for economic stimulus."

- Override of President Ford's veto of Hatch Act amendments that would give federal and postal workers greater political freedom while protecting them against improper political pressure. The veto override attempt will first be made in the House.

- An override of Ford's veto of the bill providing federal funds so that day care centers serving children of low-income working parents can be brought up to federal minimum standards. The override vote is set for May 4 in the House, with Senate action soon after if the needed two-thirds majority is achieved.

Cleveland Center Seeks Jobs for Ex-Offenders

Cleveland—The Cleveland AFL-CIO has taken on a tough task made even more so by the current period of high unemployment—finding jobs and new lives for ex-convicts.

To do so the central body has established the Leo Perlis Remotivation Center, named in recognition of the contributions of the director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

The $410,000 center was dedicated on Apr. 2, and Perlis also was honored at a luncheon here.

In 12 weeks, the center was able to meet a placement goal it had estimated earlier would take a year. The center's staff placed 65 ex-offenders in jobs ranging from apprenticeship training to factory work at wages up to $5 an hour.

"We believe that to break the cycle of crime we must find good jobs for ex-offenders and those on probation so they are not forced to return to a life of crime," said Mel Witt, Cleveland AFL-CIO president and president of the United Labor Agency (ULA).

The ULA is a combined program of the AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers and the Teamsters. It was launched with $208,154 in federal funds approved by Ohio Gov. James Rhodes.

Keith McClellan, Perlis Center director, said he hopes to attract $1 million in federal, state and foundation funds this year to expand the work. McClellan has an extensive background in social work and urban planning. He has a staff of 10, most of whom are job counsellors and job placement workers. Three ex-offenders are on the staff full time and others work part time.

McClellan said employers like the program because of the buddy system used through the ULA's Union Counsellors Association. Trained counsellors in the federation take ex-convicts under their guidance in the plants.

Unions also are helpful in identifying job opportunities even before management sometimes knows a job will become vacant, McClellan said.

Candidates are now training in shoe repair, furniture repair, social services and maintenance. A food service training program will be established soon with $100,000 in donated kitchen equipment. Other training will include auto mechanic, auto body repair, small appliance repair and glass installation.

The Perlis Center also houses a Criminal Justice Public Information Center, with a budget of $87,000, whose aim is to increase public awareness of crime and find ways to reduce it and Teen Challenge, a program helping problem teenagers.

TWUA Gains Northeast Pattern, Launches Southern Wage Drive

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America reached a breakthrough agreement on new two-year contracts with six northern manufacturers providing wage and fringe benefit improvements averaging 60 cents an hour.

TWUA President Sol Stetin said the package is expected to set a pattern in bargaining with some 70 other cotton-synthetic companies employing 20,000 workers in the New England and Mid-Atlantic states.

Meanwhile, the union began a wage drive in southern states to recover workers' buying power lost due to inflation.

The new contracts in the northern cotton-synthetic division have been ratified by workers at all six plants, American Thread Co., in Willimantic, Conn.; Bates Manufacturing Co., Lewiston, Me.; Edwards Textiles, Augusta, Me.; West Point-Pepperell and Biddeford Textiles in Biddeford, Me., and at Berkshire-Hathaway in New Bedford, Mass.

Workers at three of the companies — West Point-Pepperell, Biddeford and Berkshire-Hathaway—struck on Apr. 15 over the contract dispute. The striking workers met with federal mediators in Boston before a settlement was reached.

Regarding the southern wage drive, Stetin noted in letters to TWUA leaders at southern textile plants that the union intends to bargain for an increase substantially larger than 8 percent "so that we can cut down the widening gap between textile wages and the average wage for all U.S. factory workers."

The industry is reaping highly profitable returns from a rapidly expanding volume of sales, he noted. Yet the gap between textile wages and the average factory wage has increased by 31 cents an hour in the past two years, he said.

In May 1974, Stetin said, the southern textile average hourly wage was $2.98, or $1.18 below the U.S. factory average of $4.16.

"In January 1976, the southern textile average, $3.35, was $1.49 below the factory average of $4.84," he said. "We must negotiate a substantial wage increase to restore the loss in our members' real wages and to reduce the gap between textile wages and the factory average."

TWUA's 18-member contract policy committee, which worked out the agreement with the six northern firms, is headed by Stetin; Sec.-Treas. William DuChessi, and Alton Hodgman, the union's northern cotton-synthetic and woolen director.

Retail Clerks Gain Racetrack Unit

Baltimore — Some 1,000 employes of Maryland's five racetracks voted to merge their independent union with Retail Clerks Local 692 here.

The RCIA local defeated a Teamster local in a runoff vote, 353 to 201. The new RCIA members formerly belonged to the Independent Association of Racetrack Employes, which had been in existence for about 25 years.

439,000 Gain Overtime Pay After 40 Hours

An additional 439,000 workers will be entitled to overtime pay after 40 hours a week under a provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act that takes effect May 1, the Labor Dept. announced. The present overtime requirement for these workers is time-and-one-half only after 44 hours.

The largest groups affected by the phase-in to the basic 40-hour straight-time ceiling are:

- An estimated 256,000 food service workers who are not employed in regular restaurants. They include employes of catering establishments and persons who work at lunch counters or snack bars in stores or other retail or service establishments. The test is whether food service is only an incidental part of the operation, such as in a department store's tea room.

- About 92,000 local transit operators, such as bus drivers or subway conductors.

- An estimated 48,000 seafood canning and processing employes.

Another changeover on May 1 will affect some 266,000 maid and custodial employes of hotels and motels.

This group has been entitled to overtime rates after 46 hours. On May 1, the ceiling drops to 44 hours, and next year, on May 1, 1977, to the standard 40 hours.

Many workers in all of these groups now receive overtime pay after 40 hours or sometimes even less under union contracts. But in the absence of a contract, their employers are bound only by the wage-hour requirements of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act, or by state laws in rare cases where state protection is superior.

Union Staff Posts Urged For Interns

AFL-CIO President George Meany has urged the presidents of all affiliated unions and officers of state and local central bodies to give special consideration in filling staff openings to seven young trade unionists in the 1975-76 Labor Intern Program.

The interns are completing a year of on-the-job training at AFL-CIO national headquarters in the areas of civil rights, legislation, publications and public relations, social security, research and in the Industrial Union Dept. They have attended courses at the Labor Studies Center and worked in the field with AFL-CIO staff representatives and affiliated unions.

The federation initiated the intern program in 1970 to train young people for staff positions in the labor movement. Since that time 48 have completed the training and more than 75 percent are presently working for organized labor or in related areas.

Meany asked the union officials to consider the interns for opportunities in their organizations, and suggested that they contact AFL-CIO Education Director Walter Davis for additional information and interviews.

Fewer Hours Worked:

Real Earnings Down But Prices Stabilize

Living costs rose a slight two-tenths of 1 percent in March, but the average worker's buying power declined seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The drop in real spendable earnings—take-home pay adjusted for the effects of inflation—meant that a worker with three dependents last month had a purchasing power equal to $91.56 a week in 1967 dollars.

That was 66 cents less than in February, and only 24 cents higher than the $91.32 averaged during the year 1965. Last month's decline in real earnings was due largely to a drop in average weekly hours.

Prices in March rose more than they did in February, but less than in any other month over the past year. For the three-month period ended last month, the government's consumer price index rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.9 percent—the smallest three-month rise in almost four years, BLS said.

Much of the slowdown in the rate of price rises was attributed to lower costs for food and fuel. Overall, the CPI was 6.1 percent higher than a year earlier.

Food prices fell eight-tenths of 1 percent, after dropping by a full precentage point in February and two-tenths of 1 percent in January. Prices of commodities other than food rose by three-tenths of 1 percent, about the same as in the previous six months.

The cost of services, however, continued to climb in March. The rise over the month was seven-tenth of 1 percent, the same as in February. In January, service charges rose 1.1 percent.

In other economic news, the government reported a 7.5 percent rise in "real" gross national product from January to March. Real GNP is the nation's total output of goods and services adjusted for inflation.

The increase was significantly higher than the 5 percent growth rate during the fourth quarter of 1975. The rate of inflation in the first quarter of 1976, as measured by the GNP price index, slowed to an annual rate of 3.7 percent.

In its detailed report on monthly changes in the CPI, BLS said prices of grocery-store foods declined 1.2 percent in March. Sharp price cuts were reported for beef, eggs, poultry, fresh vegetables, dairy products, sugar and processed fruits and vegetables. Fresh fruit prices and coffee prices continued to rise, however.

The gasoline and motor oil index declined 1.7 percent in March, slightly more than in February and January. Leaded regular gasoline sold at a national average of 56.9 cents a gallon in March, while unleaded gas averaged 59.4 cents and premium 61.7 cents.

Almost one-fifth of the rise in service costs was due to higher auto insurance premiums, BLS said. Other increases were reported for the cost of household services, utilities, babysitting, laundry and other services.

Mortgage interest rates, however, declined for the second consecutive month, reflecting lower interest rates on both conventional and FHA loans.

The cost of medical-care services continued to rise in March, BLS said. Physicians' fees rose 1.3 percent, the same as in February, and nearly double the seven-tenths of 1 percent rise in January.

Hospital service charges increased nine-tenths of 1 percent in March, compared with 1.5 percent in February and 2.2 percent in January.

UNION WITNESSES urged full funding of the National Endowment for the Arts at House appropriation hearings. John C. Hall, Jr., is shown testifying on behalf of the Musicians. At right is Earl Hyman, who spoke for Actors' Equity. They urged Congress to appropriate the full $126 million authorized for the program instead of the $87 million partial funding sought by the Administration.

Added Wage Protection Sought in Bankruptcies

Changes in the federal Bankruptcy Act are needed to give workers more adequate protection when their employer can't meet his bills, a labor spokesman testified at House hearings.

Max Zimny, general counsel of the Ladies' Garment Workers, suggested strengthening amendments to a bill being considered by a House Judiciary subcommittee. His testimony was also given on behalf of the AFL-CIO, the Clothing Workers and the Auto Workers.

Similar testimony was given by representatives of the Industrial Union Dept., Building & Construction Trades Dept., Service Employees and Steelworkers.

Under present law, the preference given to wage claims in meeting the obligations of a bankrupt firm applies only to a maximum of $600 in back pay owed within three months of the time the employer filed for bankruptcy. The ceiling has been unchanged in 50 years, and the time span is actually less than set in an 1841 law.

In addition, the extent to which various fringe benefits are included in a worker's preferential claim on a bankrupt employer has been curtailed by two restrictive Supreme Court decisions.

The bill sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman Don Edwards (D-Calif.) would raise the wage ceiling to $1,200, with up to six months retroactivity. It would also provide a preferential claim for overdue payments to pension, insurance and "similar" benefit plans.

Zimny urged that the ceiling on priority back pay be raised to at least $3,000 and that the six-month retroactivity date from the time of substantial cessation of business, if that were earlier than the filing of the petition. He noted that workers and their unions sometimes agree to defer payment of a portion of wages in an effort to help their employer stay in business. Likewise, an employer is sometimes allowed to defer payments to a benefit fund because administrators don't want to force an employer into bankruptcy if there is a chance that his business could revive.

The labor attorney also urged a clearer listing of the type of benefit funds with priority wage claims and suggested that the committee adopt the term "employe benefit plans" as used in the 1974 Pension Reform Act.

In an area not covered by the bill, Zimny asked Congress to confine the power of a court-appointed bankruptcy trustee to abrogate or unilaterally change contracts to commercial-type agreements, eliminating any authority over labor-management contracts.

"The labor contract is as much a part of the worker and the workplace as tools or the workbench," he said, and is "worlds apart from the commercial transaction between debtor and creditor which a trustee is empowered to reject."

Arts Unions Push Funding Of Aid Plan

Unions representing musicians and actors urged Congress to provide more money for the National Endowment for the Arts so that theater and music in America won't become a luxury that only an elite few can afford.

A House Appropriations subcommittee is considering an $87 million Administration budget request, and union witnesses urged that the amount be raised to the full $126 million Congress authorized when it set up the federal subsidy program.

Both John C. Hall, Jr., testifying for the Musicians, and Earl Hyman, a member of Actors' Equity's national council, saw aid to the performing arts as yielding a rich return to the nation.

Hyman refuted the myth that professional theater is concentrated in New York, and said the nonprofit resident theaters that are especially dependent on federal aid are located in every part of the nation.

Last season, he noted, only 26 percent of Equity's members found work in live theater productions. The talent that is "wasted," he suggested, could be used "to bring theater of all types — repertory, children's, school programs, experimental — to every region of the country."

Hall, who is assistant to Musicians President Hal C. Davis, said the United States is still "far behind" other major nations in assistance to music and other forms of the arts.

Budget restrictions to a symphony orchestra can't be met by laying off musicians, he said, because then it no longer is an orchestra but "something considerably less."

And apart from the major orchestras and opera companies, Hall noted, there are hundreds of other community cultural groups that are being helped by federal funds. Live performances that attract audiences produce a ripple effect on the economy of a community, he testified. Restaurants, parking lots, print shops and other businesses flourish. When the arts are neglected, communities deteriorate and "repel, rather than attract."

Bidding System Urged On Medicaid Lab Tests

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to extend federal regulation of interstate clinical laboratories and to hold down costs of Medicaid by choosing laboratories through competitive bidding.

A statement submitted to a House Commerce subcommittee by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller noted the success of a 1967 law that required federal regulation of laboratories doing an interstate business in medical tests. It endorsed, with strengthening provisions, a bill by Subcommittee Chairman Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.) to apply the same standards to the very much larger number of laboratories operating in a single state.

The AFL-CIO urged, however, that there be no provision for the federal government to delegate enforcement or supervision to the states. Also, Biemiller said, there is no reason to exempt small laboratories connected with doctors' offices.

Also endorsed was a bill by Rep. James H. Scheuer (D-N.Y.) that would direct states to set up competitive bidding procedures for lab tests that are paid for by Medicaid funds.

Biemiller noted that a number of doctors are owners and investors in laboratories. "Too many doctors give their lab work not to the lowest bidder, but to the laboratory in which they are owners or stockholders," he charged. "No wonder then that a doctor sends his specimens to a lab that charges $45 for a test that could be done for $10 in another laboratory."

Biemiller protested the fact that when a group of laboratories sued to prevent the New York City Health Dept. from instituting a bidding system for publicly-financed lab tests, the federal Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare filed a court brief supporting the challenge.

Meany Rips Ford Record, Asks All-Out Voter Drive

Jobs Bill Wins First House Test

A House subcommittee voted a 10-3 endorsement of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill, acting the day after President Ford unleashed a vitriolic attack on the labor-supported measure.

Subcommittee approval paved the way for quick action by the parent Labor Committee and made likely a House floor vote this spring.

Ford had denounced the bill as an "election-year boondoggle" in a speech to the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce.

The President scoffed at the notion that government has a responsibility to provide jobs if the private sector falters. He voiced horror at the thought of the federal government getting "deeper into social and economic planning," and claimed that the recession will be "long forgotten" before the target date for full employment is reached.

The way to create jobs, Ford asserted, is through "tax incentives" to private enterprises.

Both principal sponsors of the bill — Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.)—were quick to retort.

Humphrey noted that Ford has opposed and vetoed virtually every effort by Congress to provide jobs for the unemployed. The full employment bill "may not be perfect." But it's a "serious attempt" to deal with the problem of providing jobs without inflation, he said, and should be subjected to "constructive debate" on its merits.

Hawkins noted that the bill that Ford attacked so vehemently would require the President to submit programs and policies keyed to achieving full employment.

"Obviously," Hawkins suggested, Ford "does not want to be required to submit to Congress programs which effectively put the nation back to work." While the bill may be a "boondoggle" to the President, he said, "it is an economic bill of rights for the American people."

The House Manpower subcommittee, headed by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), made only minor changes in the Humphrey-Hawkins bill. It retains the national goal of bringing the adult unemployment rate down to 3 percent or less within four years, and keeping it there. And it sets up procedures for the President, the Federal Reserve Board and Congress to move in the same direction—toward full employment, production and purchasing power.

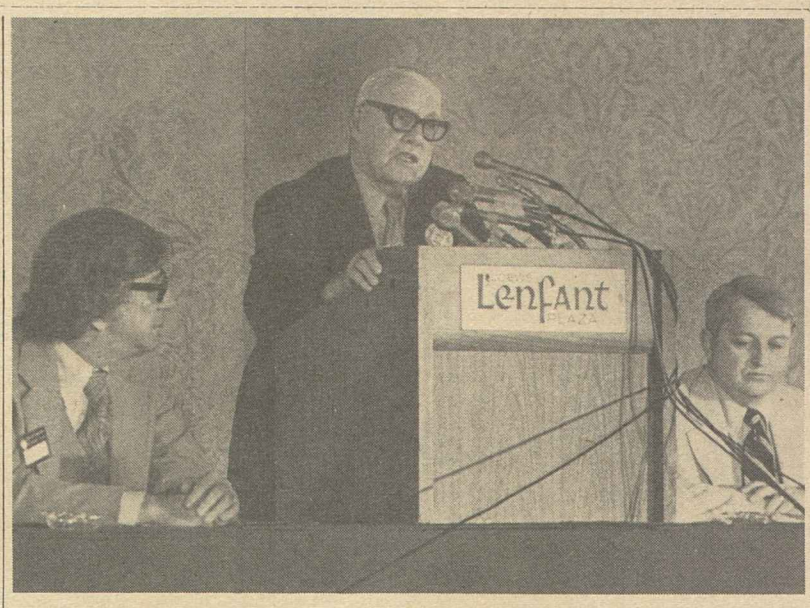
Health Care Costs Show Sharp Rise

The cost of medical care in the United States is rising much faster than the overall rate of inflation and will continue this trend in the foreseeable future, according to a staff report of the President's Council on Wage & Price Stability.

During the first three months of 1976, the 30-page report noted, the overall cost of medical care services rose at a 14 percent annual rate. Physicians' fees rose at a 14.2 percent rate while hospital service charges increased at a "startling" 20.1 percent rate during the same period.

"By contrast, other service prices rose at an 8.9 percent annual rate and the overall consumer price index, less medical care, at a 2.4 percent rate," the council's director, Michael Moskow, pointed out.



The rapidly rising medical costs cannot be fully explained by increased labor costs, or by a "bulge" effect brought on by the end of wage and price controls in this sector of the economy, the council's report observed.

Price increases higher than those in the rest of the economy were present in the health sector "long before the controls period," the agency noted.

Moskow said that health care expenditures have tripled since 1965 —from $39 billion to $119 billion —and that the increase of $14.5 billion from 1974 to 1975 was the largest in the nation's history.

For the 12 months ended in June 1975, Moskow said, the country's outlay for health care came to $547 per capita, an increase of 13 per-

Firestone Deadline Set:

Central Bodies Gear For Rubber Boycott

A united labor campaign in support of the Rubber Workers' strike and boycott against the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and its products was pressed by AFL-CIO President George Meany.

In letters to heads of all state and local central bodies, Meany called on organized labor to mobilize its purchasing power behind the Firestone strikers and to join in bringing the boycott message home to the public at large.

"Firestone can still avert this boycott, if it chooses," Meany asserted. "All it has to do is engage in realistic collective bargaining and end the strike."

The URW will launch a nationwide boycott of all Firestone products on May 8 unless a satisfactory settlement of its contract dispute with the company has been reached by then.

The union is on strike against all of the Big Four tire makers—Goodyear, Goodrich and Uniroyal as well as Firestone—but is concentrating its boycott effort against Firestone, the "target" company in the current bargaining round with the industry.

Support for the boycott widened as the Rubber Workers' strike entered its second week. The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. pledged its full support, and foreign trade unions affiliated with the International Federation of Chemical & General Workers' Union promised worldwide solidarity for the action.

Meanwhile, talks with Firestone in Cleveland continued but with little apparent success. The union reported some progress on hospitalization benefits, but the main issues—wages and a cost-of-living escalator provision—still kept the two sides far apart.

The URW's 70,000 production and maintenance workers at the Big Four's 47 plants around the country walked off their jobs on Apr. 21 after negotiations on a new contract broke down.

While the planned boycott is limited to Firestone, the union said it is also contemplating extending it to the products of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., the nation's largest tire producer.

Boycott picketing against Firestone is scheduled next week in Akron and Dayton, Ohio; Des

'76 Election Seen Key to 'Better Day'

America's workers have "had enough" of the Ford Administration's "do-nothing" economic policies, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared as he blistered Ford for clinging "blindly and stubbornly" to policies that plunged the nation into a disastrous recession.

Meany told participants in a conference sponsored by the American Federation of Teachers that there will be "better days ahead" if labor does an effective political job this year.

The nation cannot afford "four more years like the last seven," he declared.

"Between now and Election Day," Meany said, the labor movement's task is to assure:

- "That all union members and their families are registered to vote.
- "That they know the candidates and the issues, the platforms and the voting records.
- "That they go to the polls and vote on Nov. 2."

Meany spoke of the special burdens that have been imposed on public workers—by legal obstacles to collective bargaining, by shortages of funds and by a national administration that tries to "dump" the problems resulting from its economic failures on cities and states.

He emphasized the AFL-CIO's continuing commitment to "the best education that can be provided" for all Americans—from day-care centers to graduate schools.

Congress Pressed to Strengthen Extended Jobless Benefit Plans

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to shore up emergency programs of extended benefits for the long-term unemployed and follow through with permanent improvements in the unemployment insurance system.

Labor's testimony was presented to a House Ways & Means subcommittee that is holding hearings on the future of two temporary programs that were enacted to deal with the double-digit joblessness of the Ford Administration.

One program, which will end after this year unless Congress acts, provides up to 39 weeks of unemployment compensation protection for about 12 million workers whose jobs aren't covered by state programs.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman urged the House panel to go beyond a bill that would merely extend the law another year.

He expressed the hope that Congress will soon provide universal unemployment insurance coverage as part of permanent legislation. But until it does, Seidman said, the temporary program should be continued without a cut-off date. Further, he stressed, the workers affected should have the same maximum duration of benefits as if their jobs had been covered by state programs—up to 65 weeks at present.

Also before the subcommittee is a bill introduced by its chairman, Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.), which would extend the Federal Supplemental Benefits program (FSB) an additional six months and make it easier to "trigger-on" the added weeks of benefits.

Under this program, the maximum 39 weeks of state and state-federal benefits allowed under permanent law is extended to 52 weeks when the insured unemployment rate in a state is between 5 percent and 5.9 percent, and to a maximum of 65 weeks when the insured rate

Surveys Find First-Quarter Profits Surge

Early reports on first-quarter corporate profits indicate good times are here again for the big American companies.

A U.S. News & World Report survey of company financial statements shows that after-tax profits of 858 firms in the January-March period totaled about $7.7 billion. The same companies earned a little over $5.5 billion during the like quarter of 1975.

The increase of $2.2 billion is about 39 percent. Of the 858 companies surveyed, the weekly magazine reported, 717 had higher earnings than a year ago. Only 141 reported declines.

Another indication that the profits comeback is in full swing came is over 6 percent. (An insured rate of 6 percent translates to an unemployment rate of close to 8 percent by the Bureau of Labor Statistics standard and substantially above that by the AFL-CIO's definition of actual unemployment).

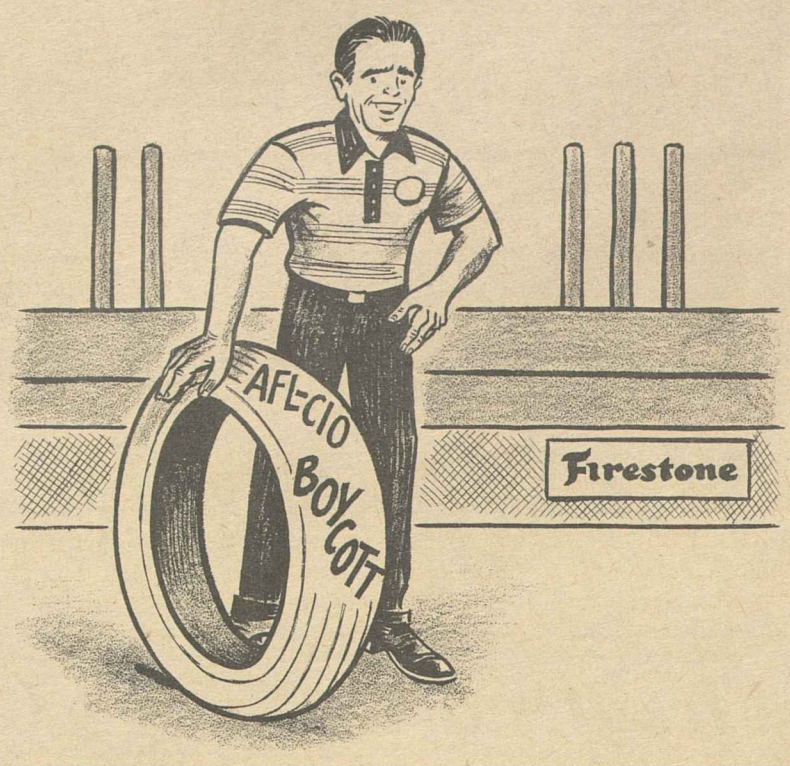
As of mid-April, supplemental benefits have been discontinued in 12 states that had not met the trigger levels of unemployment.

Corman's bill would establish a national trigger of a seasonally adjusted 4.5 percent insured unemployment rate in order to provide a maximum 52 weeks of benefits. It would allow up to 65 weeks, as at present, in any state with a 6 percent rate.

While this would be some improvement, Seidman said the trigger levels would have to be "much lower" to effectively help the long-term jobless in the months ahead.



He reiterated the AFL-CIO position that the trigger approach should be replaced by a combination of extended benefits coupled with vocational training and guidance for all long-term unemployed —regardless of the unemployment rate in their states.

But if the trigger approach is continued, Seidman urged that the national trigger be dropped to 3.5 percent unemployment by the BLS tally, not the insured rate. And the state trigger, he urged should be dropped from 6 percent to 4 percent.

Seidman stressed that "the insured rate of unemployment used to trigger the national program is dropping monthly mainly due to the defects in the trigger computation—exclusion of exhaustees, uncovered workers and other groups." He said there is only a "slight" factor of improvement in the job picture.

"Despite all the politically-inspired rhetoric and optimistic predictions," Seidman told the panel, "the AFL-CIO is convinced unemployment remains America's number one economic problem."

'Buy This One!'

Optical Settlement Ends 43-Month IUE Strike

Latham, N.Y.—A small band of determined strikers is returning to work with improved conditions after surviving three and one-half years on a picket line, an official decertification by the National Labor Relations Board, and heavy company pressure to give up.

Members of the United Optical Workers Union, Local 408 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the strikers left their jobs at the American Optical Co. here Sept. 11, 1972, after the union and the company failed to reach agreement on a first contract.

The local had won a representation election and certification for about 25 technicians, clerks, messengers and typists at AO's automated laboratory where wholesale eyeglass prescriptions are filled.

Talks came to an impasse when the company, a subsidiary of the Warner-Lambert conglomerate, insisted on staying within the Nixon wage guidelines although higher increases were warranted.

Early on, the company sent letters to the strikers calling on them to abandon the walkout and threatening them with replacement if they did not return to work. After several months of shutdown, the company reopened the facility using management and non-union help.

In a 1974 decertification election, only four votes were accepted as valid, all for "no union." Still, Local 408 members continued their daily informational picketing of the AO facility.

During the last 15 months of the strike, negotiations were held, and eventually a breakthrough occurred which led to a settlement.

The agreement provides for full reinstatement of all strikers with no loss of rights or benefits, and wage increases of up to $1 an hour. The workers regained seniority and pension eligibility with no service break and were placed on a new wage progression schedule that provides for future increases.

Local Business Manager Sebastian J. Rebaldo, in announcing the settlement, praised the 13 holdout strikers for their three and a half year struggle against great odds.

"Not a single one of them left the picket line, nor looked for another job," he said. "They will all be going back to work." A new laboratory is being built, and all workers will be back on the job by July, the IUE local said.

Rebaldo expressed thanks for assistance during the strike from the IUE and the inter-union National Optical Workers Conference. A boycott against American Optical products garnered support from a large number of unions and union members, the IUE said.

Also lending support were the New York State AFL-CIO, the Schenectady Area Central Labor Council, the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and other labor groups.

Multinationals Refuted On Domestic Job Gains

American-based multinational corporations that boast about their job-creation achievements at home all but ignore the fact they are expanding employment in foreign countries 10 times faster.

That point was brought out by President I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in response to a report released by the Business International Corp. to rebut labor's criticism that multinationals are exporting American jobs.

Business International claimed that 111 manufacturing multinationals had expanded their domestic workforce at a greater rate than the average U.S. company from 1970 to 1973.

But data in the report also reveal that while these firms were increasing their American employment by a rate of 3.3 percent from 1969 to 1973, they were expanding overseas employment by a rate of 31.5 percent.

In one phase of the study, Abel pointed out, "figures show U.S.-based multinationals creating a net increase of 360,373 jobs abroad and only 90,283 at home — or about four foreign jobs for every one in the United States."

Abel also noted that figures showing the higher employment growth rate for multinationals over other American companies could be expected since the multinationals are among the nation's largest and technologically most sophisticated, in addition to holding the largest share of U.S. government contracts.

"The fact that other manufacturing companies increased their employment by only half as much attests less to the multinationals' dynamism than to the general weakening of our industrial economy," Abel stressed.

That deteriorating economic condition was caused not only by ill-conceived government policies, he said, but also "by the multinationals' exportation of American capital, technology, production and their ultimate exportation of American jobs and job opportunities."

He pointed out that the multinationals included in the survey expanded their overseas investments 50 percent between 1970 and 1973 —nearly two and one-half times their domestic expansion rate.

To spur investment in the American economy, Abel called on Congress to close the tax loopholes that encourage multinationals to invest overseas and shield their foreign profits from U.S. taxes.

COL Increases Due 400,000 in Steel

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers announced that 400,000 USWA members employed in the basic steel industry would receive a cost-of-living wage increase of 4 cents an hour effective May 1. A similar adjustment will be made for 36,300 USWA members in the container industry May 15.

In Rubber Strike:

Labor Movement Gears for Boycott

Moines, Iowa; Memphis; Long Beach, Calif.; New Haven, Conn., and Pottstown, Pa.

In his letter to state and local bodies, Meany observed that "if the boycott takes place, it will be because Firestone forced it, just as it forced its workers to strike."

Accompanying Meany's letter were specific instructions on implementing the consumer boycott, including a list of brand names under which Firestone tires are marketed. The company sells its tires under Dayton and Seiberling labels and under at least 35 private-brand names.

Meany listed some of the steps that need to be taken to "bring Firestone strikers the victory they deserve":

- The message — "Don't Buy Firestone"—should be spread by every possible means: at meetings, on bulletin boards in union halls and in plants, through flyers at plant gates, and by personal contacts by shop stewards.
- Handbills should be prepared and distributed to consumers at Firestone stores and independent retail outlets handling Firestone products.
- Informational picket lines should be established in front of all retail outlets featuring Firestone products.
- Senior citizen and similar groups should be contacted to man the picket lines during peak shopping hours, especially during the day when members are working.
- Retailers should be urged to stop selling Firestone products and to allocate advertising and promotion to products of other manufacturers.
- Purchasing agents at every level of government should be used to halt all buying of Firestone products.
- Builders and contractors should be urged to halt all buying of Firestone products.
- Local advertising, including newspapers, radio, TV and billboards—should be used to spread the "Don't Buy Firestone" message.
- Whenever possible, full-time union representatives should be detached from other duties to coordinate the "Don't Buy Firestone" campaign.

International support of the boycott came at a two-day strategy meeting held by URW President Peter Bommarito and representatives of foreign trade unions in Geneva, under the auspices of the ICF, the trade secretariat to which the Rubber Workers belong.

After a first-hand report on the bargaining situation from Bommarito, the delegates agreed on a "solidarity action" plan by their unions at the Big Four's overseas facilities.

The agreement calls for a ban on overtime work at plants of all four struck companies to offset the production loss caused by the American strike. The ICF-affiliated unions also pledged to monitor their inventories to block any diversion of their output to offset the loss of production at the U.S. plants.

A joint statement wired to Bommarito by IUD President I. W. Abel and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman, pledged "full support" of the strike.

"We are with you all the way. If there is anything we can do to help, you only need to let us know," they said.

Role of HMOs Stressed In Curbing Health Costs

Philadelphia—Labor and management should actively encourage prepaid group health plans that effectively serve workers and their families, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said here.

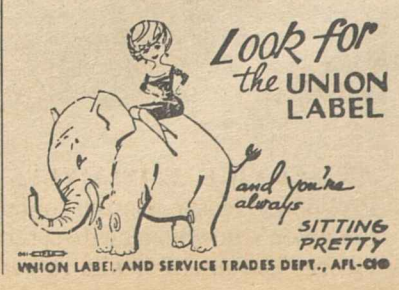
Seidman told participants in the Philadelphia Conference on Health Maintenance Organizations that unions and management have a common interest in stressing preventive health care. That's the only way to hold down the "escalating cost" of medical care for workers and dependents, he said.

Traditional fee-for-service methods of paying doctors are a form of piece work, Seidman suggested, and reward physicians who provide "as many billable services as possible—needed as well as unneeded."

That may be profitable for the doctor, "but it's bad for both the health and the pocketbook of the patient," he said.

Seidman endorsed the "dual choice" concept that workers should be able to choose the form of health insurance they prefer. But he said firms and unions should actively promote HMO plans that will provide the best value and services.

That's especially true, he said, in communities where prepaid group health programs are relatively new.



More and more money has to be negotiated at the bargaining table merely to maintain the same level of health services, Seidman noted.

While the AFL-CIO is convinced that prepaid group practice provides better quality medical care than single-doctor practice, Seidman noted that "there are some so-called HMOs . . . which neither labor nor management should want to touch with a 10-foot pole."

The better plans are not cheap, he said. But they tend to be comprehensive in coverage and emphasize prevention, early diagnosis and early treatment so that "HMO members have to be hospitalized only about half as often as the rest of the population."

Seidman attached great importance to the consumer control concept in prepaid group health plans. Health maintenance organizations should negotiate with their medical staff, not be controlled by its doctors, he stressed.

Currently, he reminded his audience, Americans spend $118 billion a year for health care and union members work the equivalent of "one month a year for doctors, hospitals and other providers without having any say at all as to how this money is spent."

Per Capita Boosted:

Service Employees Map Expansion Plan

Honolulu—Delegates representing more than 550,000 members of the Service Employees backed up an expansion program proposed by President George Hardy by approving a per capita increase to finance it.

Hardy, who was unanimously re-elected to a second four-year term, sought funds to step up organizing, strengthen political education activities and establish a new program for the union's older members and retirees.

The convention's response was to approve a 50-cent increase in the SEIU's per capita—from $1.30 to $1.80 a month.

The 600 delegates elected Anthony G. Weinlein to succeed George E. Fairchild as secretary-treasurer.

Fairchild held the post for more than 20 years and has been an SEIU member since 1931. He helped organize several locals in the Chicago area and for many years was an officer of the Chicago Joint Council.

Weinlein joined the SEIU staff in 1943 as research director and has held key posts in the union, most recently as SEIU executive secretary. He holds a Ph.D. degree from the University of Chicago.

Hardy urged each SEIU local to establish a senior member committee and he promised the international union's assistance in developing a coordinated older member program.

The older members "are the ones who helped build our union," Hardy said, "and we owe them a debt of gratitude."

Speakers at the convention included Nelson Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, who praised the AFL-CIO's current campaign to eliminate abuses in nursing homes.

Cruikshank attacked unscrupulous operators who "skim off profits, while skimping on patient care." He said some drug firms push sales of tranquilizers for nursing home use as being "cheaper than paying wages to attendants."

The convention approved establishment of an additional vice president from Canada, to represent SEIU members in the province of Quebec. It also authorized election of the two Canadian vice presidents by a caucus of Canadian delegates to the convention.

Aime Gohier of Montreal was elected to the Quebec post, while incumbent Canadian Vice President Albert G. Hearn was re-elected to represent the other Canadian provinces.

Among the policy resolutions adopted by the convention was an endorsement of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill. The resolution also called President Ford to account for failing to implement the 1946 Employment Act.

Delegates also urged that agency shop agreements be authorized in all areas of public employment, along with full bargaining rights for government workers.

They called for enactment of National Health Security and reaffirmed support of other major labor goals.

Hawaii's two representatives in the House—Democrats Patsy Mink and Spark Matsunaga—were given warm ovations after speeches lashing at the Ford Administration for its mismanagement of the economy and hostility to workers.

Teachers Win U. of Florida Faculty Vote

Orlando, Fla.—The United Faculty of Florida, an American Federation of Teachers local here, won the right to represent all 5,500 members of the bargaining unit in the nine-campus system of the University of Florida.

UFF won about 54 percent of the votes cast in an election supervised by the state's Public Employee Relations Commission. Of the 4,570 men and women eligible to vote, UFF received 2,344 ballots.

Another 701 votes went to a rival union, the American Association of University Professors—Florida, while 1,304 were cast for "no agent" and 221 were challenged.

Balloting for collective bargaining rights culminated more than a year of efforts by the UFF to get the Board of Regents to allow an election in accordance with Florida's collective bargaining law.

UFF belongs to AFT's state organization, Florida Education Association/United, which was formed in 1974 from a merger of the state's AFT and National Education Association affiliates.

AT SERVICE EMPLOYEES convention in Honolulu, SEIU President George Hardy confers with Anthony Weinlein, right, the union's newly elected secretary-treasurer. Weinlein succeeded George E. Fairchild, who retired.

KEY POSITIONS of the AFL-CIO on domestic and international issues are detailed for Stanford-Sloan Fellows by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. The group, made up of middle management persons taking extended study courses at Stanford University, also met with business and government officials during its eastern field trip.

First-Quarter Wage Gains Show Slight Decline from 1975 Levels

Wage increases negotiated during the first three months of 1976 averaged 8.8 percent for the first contract year under major collective bargaining settlements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Total agreed-upon pay raises over the full life of the contract averaged 7.4 percent a year, BLS said. These averages compare with a first-year increase of 10.2 percent and an average life-of-the contract raise of 7.8 percent in 1975 settlements. The percentage increases do not include possible gains under cost-of-living escalator clauses.

The data for the first-quarter report on wage increases were derived from 84 collective bargaining agreements covering 270,000 workers, most of them in the apparel, construction and air transportation industries.

"Relatively few settlements were concluded in the first three months of 1976 compared with the heavy bargaining activity scheduled for the remainder of the year," BLS said. The new Teamsters agreement, one of the major settlements reached so far this year, was not included in the report since it was negotiated after Mar. 31.

The data pertain to contracts covering 1,000 workers or more, except for certain key settlements covering 5,000 workers or more. Highlights of the BLS report included the following:

- Wage and benefit gains combined, in contracts covering 5,000 workers or more, averaged 9.5 percent for the first year and 7.6 percent annually over the life of the pact. This compared with 11.4 and 8.1 percent, respectively, in 1975.
- Contracts concluded during the first quarter of 1976 had an average duration of 32.3 months, compared with 28.5 months when the same parties previously negotiated. First-year gains were greater than those deferred to subsequent years and their size tended to increase as contract duration grew, as did second- and third-year adjustments.
- The size of settlements appears to have been influenced by the possibility of additional increases under COL escalator clauses.

Contracts containing escalator provisions, covering only 14 percent of the workers under major settlements concluded during the quarter, provided for annual wage-rate adjustments of 6.8 percent over the life of the contract. Contracts without escalator clauses provided for annual adjustments averaging 7.5 percent. These compare with gains of 7.1 and 8.3 percent, respectively, last year.

During the first three months of 1976, new COL escalator provisions were introduced in three settlements covering 7,000 workers, BLS said. Escalator clauses now cover approximately 59 percent—5.9 million—of all workers in major bargaining units.

In manufacturing industries, wage increases in new settlements during the January-March quarter averaged 9.8 percent in the first contract year and 7.4 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 9.8 and 8 percent, respectively, in 1975.

In nonmanufacturing industries, wage-rate adjustments averaged 7.7 percent in the first year and 7.3 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 10.4 and 7.8 percent, respectively, in 1975.

For settlements in the construction industry, wage increases averaged 6.4 percent in the first year and 6.2 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 8 and 7.5 percent, respectively, in 1975, BLS said.

The government noted that the pace of collective bargaining will pick up sharply in the current quarter. During the April-June period, BLS said, 451 major agreements covering 1.6 million workers are due to expire or permit reopening of wage provisions.

Key agreements in the second quarter of 1976 are in the rubber, electrical equipment and construction industries.

At least 2.1 million workers will receive deferred wage-rate increases averaging 5.5 percent during the current quarter under provisions of existing major collective bargaining agreements, BLS said.

In addition, 2.6 million workers will be affected by COL escalator reviews, principally in the auto and steel industries.

Fire Fighters Get Job Training Grant

The Fire Fighters will recruit and train 790 minority group members for fire-fighting jobs in 10 cities under a one-year, $397,149 contract with the Labor Dept.

Special training programs, lasting up to 16 weeks will operate in Akron, Atlanta, Houston, Memphis, Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Norfolk, San Antonio, St. Louis and San Francisco.

Under previous contracts, IAFF has helped 3,390 of 3,565 trainees pass civil service tests.

House Panel Approves Humphrey-Hawkins Bill

While the bill has some bipartisan support, particularly in the Senate, the subcommittee vote followed party lines with all Democrats supporting it and the three dissenting votes cast by Republicans.

An important test of House sentiment was expected to come during consideration of a resolution setting the initial budget targets for Congress.

In the House Budget Committee resolution was a specific provision of $50 million as "start-up" funds for the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, under the assumption that it can become law during the fiscal year starting next October.

The House was considering the budget resolution as the AFL-CIO News went to press, and a Republican motion was pending to delete the start-up money from the spending ceiling.

In any event, the measure would have to be reconciled with a Senate-passed resolution that was less specific in its funding of job-creating measures. But the House vote was looked on as a test of congressional support for full employment legislation.

All of the major candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination have endorsed the Humphrey-Hawkins approach and prominent religious, civil rights, business and education leaders joined with the trade union movement is testifying for the legislation.

Refugees Find Jobs In 1,200 Communities

Employment service offices throughout the United States have placed more than 5,500 Indochinese refugees in jobs, the Labor Dept. said. An additional 6,900 of the 27,000 refugees listed were referred to training and other services. The jobs were found in more than 1,200 communities, an average of less than five jobs per community.

Bargaining and the Schools

TEACHERS HAVE BEEN making themselves heard all across the land in recent years, and they have taken a great deal of heat as a result. I hope they will go on doing so as long as necessary, because nothing, except national defense, is more important to the future of America than the preservation and improvement of the educational system.

When a teachers' local goes on strike because classes of 60 and 70 students cannot be taught effectively, they are putting concern for the students first—something all too many elected officials neglect. And such issues—which are really part of a general downgrading of education—have been key issues in every recent teachers' strike I have heard of.

Teachers and other public employes labor under a handicap that is not shared by workers in industry. For the most part, these workers don't have the lines of communication, the forums for discussion and the machinery for resolving problems that other union workers have—a federal law that sets guideposts for collective bargaining.

That is the result of a blunder made by the Congress in 1935, when it excluded public employes from the protection of the National Labor Relations Act, and the country is paying dearly for that mistake today.

In recent decades the number of strikes in industry has been going down. That's because industrial management has learned how to listen to its employes, how to negotiate fair agreements, how to settle grievances. The number of strikes in the schools and other public services has been steadily rising, simply because public administrators have never learned how to do these things or just don't want to learn.

All too often they barricade themselves behind unfair laws that forbid public employes to strike or they seek court injunctions to keep teachers from exercising their rights as free men and women.

WITH A FEW honorable exceptions, state legislatures have failed abysmally to meet this problem. Four states have actually passed laws forbidding all collective bargaining in the public sector. Only about half have laws authorizing any sort of collective bargaining for state and local government employes.

So it is high time for Congress to bring public employes into the mainstream of 20th Century labor-management relations. It is high time for Congress to require state and local administrators to negotiate with public employes on every aspect of their wages and working conditions, exactly as is done in private industry.

Collective bargaining can go a long way toward ending the friction and solving the problems that exist in our schools, but it can't solve all of them. It can't create the funds and the leadership needed to restore our schools to their rightful place.

The AFL-CIO happens to believe that schools are essential and that they are more important today than ever before. We believe that every American has a fundamental right to the best education that can be provided. We want a far more comprehensive school system than has ever been tried. We want everyone to have access to all the education that a person can possibly absorb, at every stage of life. We want day-care centers, graduate schools, adult-education programs on a national scale.

A Word Edgewise:

Communist Beating in Portugal Turns Nation Toward Freedom

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE TIMES when, despite all those years in college and as a professor, I suddenly become a simple, superstitious peasant. Such an instance is perfectly exemplified by developments in Portugal over the past year—a pious believer would see the results of last Sunday's election as the ontological proof of the existence of God. I am going to visit an orthopod to get my fingers uncrossed. True, the military have yet to put away their guns, and the President will undoubtedly be elected from their ranks, but in basic terms Portugal has joined the battered ranks of free nations.

This transition from dictatorship (tempered by incompetence) to freedom has further symbolic implications for the Iberian peninsula. It is an indication to nervous Spanish leaders that the options are not authoritarian, that Communism is not the only alternative to Franco's heritage. The results should encourage King Juan in his liberalization struggle with the antediluvian Council of the Realm.

On the other hand, the Soviets—who poured resources into Portugal to help Alvaro Cunhal's Communist Party and the fake trade union, "Intersindical," pull off a 1948 Czech-style coup—have taken a terrible beating.

Internationally the Communist track record remains unchanged: they have never taken power in a free election. As Stalin told Milovan Djilas, who inquired why the French and Italian Communists had flopped, "No Red Army." (In this connection, the Portugal election should be compared with the charade in Vietnam—indeed, if one wanted to push the point, the current Vietnamese election should be compared with the undoubtedly corrupt, but open, free-for-alls of the former Republic of Vietnam.)

What stopped the Portuguese Communist Party? For a time it seemed as though Cunhal and his military co-conspirators were in the driver's seat. They were, but they started driving too fast and announcing at full blast their allegiance to Moscow. This aroused the patriotism of a powerful segment of the military, many of whom were convinced that General (later President) Spinola—who led the overthrow of the ancien regime—had been framed and driven into exile. Then the Socialists, led by Mario Soares, and other non-Communist parties refused to commit suicide by volunteering for the salami-slicer (that is, agreeing to form a united front with the PCP).

The international focus on Portuguese events helped. Socialist parties all over Europe denounced the Communists' patent preparations for a coup, and there is reason to believe that both Harold Wilson of Britain and Helmut Schmidt of the German Federal Republic gave the Portuguese Socialists desperately needed assistance. Even Boris Ponomarev, the Soviet Politburo's man in charge of operations in non-Communist countries, must have been startled by the solidarity of the Socialists — even the Swedes came on like gangbusters. Then the European Economic Community, the nine members of the Common Market, dropped a none-too-obscure hint that aid to bankrupt Portugal was contingent on free elections.

FINALLY, IN ONE OF the classic self-gambits of the century, the Portuguese Communists set themselves up for the kill. When the pro-Communist governor of Angola, Adm. Rosa Coutinho, abruptly pulled out and turned power over to the pro-Communist guerrillas, the MPLA, he did not return alone to Lisbon. With him came crack regiments of thoroughly embittered Portuguese troops (notably the para-commandos who later put down the pro-Communist military revolt) and between 350 and 400 thousand civilians, mostly from the fiercely anti-Communist, Catholic smallholder stock of Northern Portugal.

They, and their relatives, wanted vengeance hot, and proceeded to burn Communist headquarters in various towns. By an odd coincidence the local military commander, a northerner had been exiled from Lisbon by the leftists to get him out of the way, which may help explain why it took his troops the better part of five hours to cover 15 miles to suppress an anti-Communist riot! If the Communists had held off abandoning Angola for another year, there might have been a different ball game.

The Portuguese have unequivocally ranged themselves on the side of freedom. We must now reciprocate by providing massive economic aid to demonstrate that the concept of the "free world" is not rhetoric but comradeship.

Labor Backs Efforts:

High Living Costs Spur Growth Of Consumer Co-Op Groups

By Sidney Margolius

IN TIMES of high living costs as now, there's a noticeable increase in efforts to hold down expenses through various kinds of co-ops and buying clubs. In recent years such mutual-aid groups have sprung up all over the country.

Interest in repair and service co-ops especially has boomed, reports Philip Dodge, field representative of the Cooperative League of the U.S.A. Another phenomenon is the growing interest of students and young families. Most large universities now have student co-ops operating a variety of self-supporting services from book stores to boarding houses.

New England and the West Coast especially have seen a proliferation of food co-ops among young people. Often these are small buying clubs using guidance and facilities of long-established large co-ops such as the Hanover, N.H., co-op, and co-op supermarkets in Berkeley, Calif., and Washington, D.C., the Hyde Park Co-op in Chicago, and the Mid-Eastern Wholesale Co-op in New York City.

One of the fastest-growing mutual-aid activities is co-op nursery schools run by young parents joined together in the Parents Cooperative Preschools International.

Senior citizens, too, are using the cooperative idea in some useful ways to cushion the impact of inflation on their meager resources, as in taxi-type transportation co-ops, and the fish buying clubs which recently appeared in Florida. They dispatch members to the docks to buy fish cheaply from returning fishing boats.

But most of the thousands of U.S. co-ops of various kinds are compromised of families; low- and moderate-income wage earners seeking to stave off the erosion of inflation by contributing some of their own planning and small amounts of capital to a mutual pool of resources.

These co-ops take many forms including, as well as food stores, apartment houses; repair and service co-ops, credit unions; optical and drug services; medical and dental clinics; burial co-ops; rural electric co-ops and many others.

But small co-ops and sometimes even large ones often are plagued by lack of capital. Now consumer co-op and trade-union spokesmen have begun an all-out effort to secure enactment of federal legislation for a national cooperative bank. A bill has been introduced into the Senate seeking to create a Self-Help Development Fund to give technical and other aid to low-income and undercapitalized co-ops. The bill would also create a Cooperative Bank & Assistance Administration.

TESTIFYING IN SUPPORT of the measure, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., pointed out that the Farm Credit Administration and the Federal Land Bank encouraged a network of farm co-ops which helped bring about a better life for farmers. It was the farm experience that last fall led the Industrial Workers to support the idea of a national co-op bank, he noted.

The National Council of Senior Citizens, representing "the single most disadvantaged group of consumers," also supports the bank proposal. Self-help co-ops have proved they can provide decent housing, health care and other goods and services at reasonable cost, the seniors organization pointed out.

A third large national organization, the Consumer Federation of America, also is making a strong effort on behalf of the co-op bank idea. Executive Director Carol Foreman noted that the seed capital would be provided by the government but would be returned subsequently by investments by co-ops.

Enactment of the co-op assistance and bank bill could be one of the most helpful events on behalf of not only consumers but the entire economy. Co-ops have an important yardstick function in measuring expenses and prices charged by private businesses. But they also already have provided many vital services at sizable savings such as housing, optical, drug and medical services, inexpensive consumer financing, and others.

Many of these co-op enterprises have been directly sponsored by labor unions and have aided literally millions of working people.

Nationwide Campaign:

Boycott Essential in Battling Stover's Bitter Anti-Unionism

TACTICS USED by the Russell Stover candy company to block efforts of its employes to form a union and negotiate a contract have spurred the labor movement to a national boycott of all Stover products.

John DeConcini, executive vice president of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, outlined the union's ten-year drive to overcome Stover's "19th Century stonewall opposition to unionism of any type." He said that while the dispute centers mainly on Stover's Lincoln, Neb., and Montrose, Colo. plants, Stover's "vicious anti-union attitude, its flagrant violation of federal law, its refusal to bargain with our union" prevail throughout the company's entire operations.

DeConcini put major blame for the long and bitter dispute on the company's principal officer, Louis Ward, who is determined "to keep things the way they are—wages are low, fringe benefits are practically non-existent."

He said that Stover is a highly profitable company that can afford the wages and conditions bargained by the union with other candy industry employers. He said that shortages and high sugar prices that hit the candy industry hard a year or two ago have been largely overcome, and the industry is now pretty well back to normal.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, DeConcini acknowledged the difficulty of mounting an effective consumer boycott of national scope, but said that the B&C's effort against Stover products is on schedule.

Pickets are now outside Stover stores and other outlets in all areas of the country, he said, but it takes a great deal of time to get the facts of the dispute and the reasons for the boycott to the public. He said the union is prepared and committed to sustaining the effort until a full and fair settlement is reached.

He said the union won representation rights at the Lincoln plant two years ago, but every effort to bargain a reasonable contract for those workers has been rebuffed by the employer. He said that to strike the plant while the others stayed in full production would have been a no-win situation, and that a national consumer boycott is the only way to bring enough economic pressure to resolve the issues.

DeConcini was questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and David Prosten of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

SHOULD THE FEDERAL MINIMUM wage be raised to $3 an hour?

Ask the millions of working poor, those who are trying to survive in an inflationary economy on a minimum wage which holds them below the official poverty line.

The present minimum of $2.30 an hour adds up to only $4,600 if a person is employed 40 hours a week, 50 weeks a year.

The federal government in April revised its poverty line upward to take account of inflation over the past year. The poverty line for an urban family of four was revised upward to $5,500 a year.

Therefore, unless Congress acts much more quickly than it has in the past, the nation's most poorly-paid workers will find themselves falling even further behind.

Opponents of the $3 minimum wage argue that it could cost jobs. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce predicts that the higher minimum for many small businesses could mean layoffs of some employes in order to meet the new minimum.

But that position has been unsupportable. The Labor Dept. recently noted in a report to Congress that "no one has been able to provide evidence sufficient to produce a consensus on the net impact of minimum wages."

Why have congressional battles over raising the minimum wage been so bitter? Opponents of a living wage have been many, moneyed and tenacious in their efforts to keep the minimum wage as low as possible.

Even the Supreme Court once ruled against the minimum wage. In 1923, the court decided that a District of Columbia minimum wage law was unconstitutional.

The minimum wage picture has changed dramatically since those days, but Congress historically has been slow in maintaining the minimum wage at a decent level. Some of the bitterest and most time-consuming battles in Congress have been over the minimum wage, one of the reasons the impact of new floors traditionally has been "a day late and a dollar short."

IN VIEW OF THESE perennial struggles, congressional leaders have begun looking at more effective means of keeping the minimum up to date.

One approach that is gaining support is an automatic escalator similar to social security adjustments.

A former Labor Dept. expert on minimum wage legislation told PAI: "If we had begun indexing back in 1968, when the minimum wage was $1.60, we'd be up to $3 in January and without the annual congressional fight."

Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards, is drafting a bill that would raise the ceiling to $3 immediately and link future increases to the consumer price index.

There are differences of opinion over what the indexing should be tied to. Some advocates are looking at hourly earnings as one starting point.

But whatever means may be preferable, most supporters agree that something must be done to avoid congressional battles that result in long delays in increasing the minimum.

Another issue that could create controversy at coming congressional hearings is the so-called youth differential. Administration conservatives are pushing behind the scenes for the establishment of a sub-minimum wage for youth, ostensibly to combat teenage unemployment.

Labor strongly opposes this concept because it would give employers a strong incentive to lay off experienced workers and hire low-paid youngsters—firing a father to hire his son.

A living wage for all Americans, a decent minimum standard, seems like a reasonable demand to make on behalf of those people still below the poverty line.

NATIONWIDE BOYCOTT of Russell Stover candies is essential in the struggle of Bakery & Confectionery Workers to overcome the firm's vicious anti-union policies, B&C Executive Vice President John DeConcini said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Ann McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and David Prosten, right, of Press Associates, Inc.

CURRENT DEVELOPMENTS in civil rights and equal opportunities were explored at a five-day conference at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center which drew 45 representatives from federation affiliates. Key participants in the discussions included, from left, Daniel E. Leach of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission; E. T. Kehrer, AFL-CIO southern area civil rights director; Cynthia McCaughan, coordinator of women's activities in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Vice Chairman Ethel Bent Walsh of the EEOC; Raymond L. Telles, EEOC, and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard.

Cement Union Hits Shift In Safety Enforcement

Chicago—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers accused the Occupational Safety & Health Administration of caving in under the pressure of employers to weaken the safety and health protection for 20,000 cement plant workers across the nation.

The union charged that OSHA has secretly shifted its enforcement authority for manufacturing operations in cement plants to the Mining Enforcement & Safety Administration—an Interior Dept. agency that has a poor record in enforcing government job safety regulations.

Thomas F. Miechur, president of the 37,000-member union, said that OSHA abrogated a 1972 agreement with the union and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. in relinquishing its enforcement powers in manufacturing operations to MESA.

In a letter of protest to Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr. and Assistant Labor Sec. Morton Corn, head of OSHA, Miechur charged that the change in enforcement authority resulted from a private arrangement between the government agencies and the employers' Portland Cement Association.

Under the 1972 agreement on safety enforcement in cement plant operations, Benjamin W. Mintz, then associate solicitor for OSHA, told the IUD and the union that "OSHA has the authority to prescribe and enforce safety and health standards related to all working conditions within the manufacturing process," while the Bureau of Mines would have jurisdiction over all mining and milling operations.

Sheldon W. Samuels, IUD occupational safety and health director, noted that labor also was assured in 1972 it would be consulted on any future changes in enforcement policy.

But that change has been made without public notice or hearings because of the Portland Cement Association's pressure to have manufacturing operations covered by MESA's less stringent safety and health regulations, the Cement Workers said.

First notice of the change was made when a local union official observed a MESA inspector touring the entire plant of Arkansas Cement Co. in Foreman, Ark., in late March.

The union has since observed additional MESA compliance officers inspecting entire mining and manufacturing operations in a number of plants in Texas and Missouri.

The shift of enforcement jurisdiction from OSHA to MESA has a significant impact on the rights of workers, the union pointed out.

"It takes away the workers' rights to complain about their working conditions without fear of discrimination, their legal right to accompany an inspector on a tour of the plant, and the knowledge that their employer could be penalized for not complying with health and safety standards. These are all rights guaranteed under OSHA that are not a part of MESA's policy."

Because of the change, Miechur said, "OSHA has made these workers second-class citizens with respect to their right to a safe and healthful workplace."

In his letter to Usery, Miechur noted that the plant operators viewed OSHA enforcement policies as a "great inconvenience."

He called on Usery to investigate the "underhanded interagency agreement" to shift enforcement authority, stressing that "we believe that 'convenience' to the industry is no basis to take away the legal protections of 20,000 workers."

Miechur also said labor attorneys are studying the shift in safety enforcement to determine if the move was legal.

AFL-CIO Asks Prompt Action On Postal Bill

A Senate committee was urged by the AFL-CIO to take "prompt action" on a public service subsidy for the U.S. Postal Service and to support a ceiling on postal rates for publications of non-profit organizations.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller asked the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee to support the bill introduced by Chairman Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) to fund the public service costs of the postal service while a study of the rate structure is undertaken.

Biemiller also expressed the AFL-CIO's strong support for an amendment to the Postal Reorganization Act that would set the non-profit postage rate at 50 percent of the commercial rate for the applicable class of mail. Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.) is sponsoring the amendment, which would be in line with the rate srtucture that prevailed prior to 1971.

Veto Upheld On Changes In Hatch Act

The nation's 2.8 million federal and postal workers will continue to be barred from active participation in politics.

A majority of the House voted to override President Ford's veto of labor-supported changes in the Hatch Act. But the 243-160 vote was less than the two-thirds needed to overturn a veto.

The AFL-CIO, its Public Employee Dept., and unions representing government and postal workers had sought to overturn the veto.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller stressed in a letter to House members that the vetoed bill "makes more effective" provisions in the Hatch Act to protect federal and postal workers against political pressure from their supervisors or agencies. That was supposed to have been the intent of the law passed in 1939.

At the same time, it would have enabled government workers, off the job, to take an active part in politics, help raise campaign funds, or even run for office themselves.

Last October, the House passed an earlier version of the vetoed bill by a 288-119 margin. But by Mar. 30, on final passage of a very similar bill, the margin dropped to 241-164. Only a handful of Republicans supported the legislation.

95% Placement Record:

Role of Unions Cited In Worker Training

Unions are helping to provide updated training in job skills for more than 400,000 persons through Labor Dept. programs funded for about $35 million annually.

The effectiveness of these union-sponsored efforts is reflected in the high placement rate for graduates, which the Labor Dept. reports, is near 95 percent with starting wage rates well over $4 an hour.

"In programs of this type," Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr. noted, "unions along with other sponsors have shown a strong commitment to help minorities, disadvantaged persons, veterans and young people prepare for satisfying and financially rewarding careers."

Key programs administered by the department's Employment & Training Administration in which unions play a major role include the National On-the-Job Training Program, the Job Corps, the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, Apprenticeship Outreach Programs and the National Apprenticeship Program.

Thirteen unions are involved in the OJT program under departmental contracts totalling $11.5 million. These projects are currently providing classroom and on-the-job training for 10,200 unemployed, underemployed and economically disadvantaged persons, with emphasis on veterans, minorities and young people.

Eight unions are participating in Job Corps training projects for 3,900 young men and women under contracts amounting to $9.5 million. Training provided at 60 residential centers included remedial education, vocational courses, work experience, and counseling for disadvantaged young persons aged 16 through 21. The placement rate for Job Corps graduates is better than 95 percent, the Labor Dept. said.

HRDI, the federation's manpower arm, operates with $5.6 million in federal grants to develop about 20,000 job openings for trainees and trained persons. Working through AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and federation affiliates, HRDI has extended its operations to 54 major metropolitan areas. The institute provides a wide range of services in developing job opportunities for low-income inner city workers, veterans, women and handicapped persons.

Apprenticeship Outreach Programs are in operation in 100 cities across country under contracts totaling $2.6 million to assist young workers in entering labor-management sponsored apprenticeships. Organizations involved in the program include HRDI, the National Urban League, R-T-P, Inc. and others.

A number of unions are also involved in the National Apprenticeship Program in planning and carrying out skills training for about 350,000 persons. Management pays apprentices' wages and training costs, but the federal expenditure to promote and expand the program comes to nearly $12 million annually.

Iron Workers Get New Training Pact

The Labor Dept. has awarded a 12-month contract for $2.2 million to recruit and train 900 disadvantaged persons through a joint Iron Workers labor-management program.

Under five previous contracts, 1,500 persons received training and about 1,000 were given full union membership in the Iron Workers. The Labor Dept. said about 700 of the new members are black, 150 are Spanish surnamed, and 100 are American Indians.

The training project is operated in 39 states by the National Ironworkers & Employers Training Program. Its sponsors are the Iron Workers, the Crane Rigging Division of the Heavy Specialized Carriers Conference, National Association of Reinforcing Steel Contractors, and the National Erectors Association.

CONVENTIONS

The 1976 Georgia AFL-CIO convention will be held Aug. 26-28 in Savannah.

The Alaska AFL-CIO convention will be held Sept. 20-24 in Anchorage.

The North Dakota AFL-CIO convention will be held Oct. 13-15 in Dickinson.

Labor Board Ruling Sets Guidelines For Union Solicitation in Hospitals

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that a hospital may not apply a no-solicitation rule to ban all union organizing activities on the premises, but may enforce the rule in certain areas to insure a "tranquil atmosphere" for patients.

In a decision signed by all five members of the board, the NLRB held that St. John's Hospital and School of Nursing in Tulsa, Okla., may be warranted in prohibiting solicitation, even on non-working time, in "strictly patient-care areas, such as patients' rooms, operating rooms, and places where patients receive treatment, such as X-ray and therapy areas."

The board ruled, however, that the hospital may not restrict solicitation or distribution of union literature in other areas to which patients and visitors have access but which are not involved in patient care, such as cafeterias and lounges.

The overall ruling represented a partial victory for the Laborers, which had brought charges against St. John's for reprimanding four of its members for allegedly violating a no-solicitation rule posted by the hospital.

The Laborers and District 1199 of the Hospital Employees Union, a division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, which filed a supporting brief in the case, asserted that health-care workers should be treated as all other employes and that the NLRB's traditional solicitation and distribution rules should apply.

An NLRB administrative law judge, acting on the Laborers' complaint, found that the hospital rule unlawfully restricted solicitation during non-working time.

The full labor board agreed that the rule was presumptively unlawful for the reasons cited by the ALJ. But it modified the decision to permit the prohibition of organizing activities in patient-care areas.

The NLRB said that solicitation at any time in patient-care areas "might be unsettling to the patients—particularly those who are seriously ill and thus need quiet and peace of mind."

It ordered the hospital to rescind its rule restricting the areas in which employes may solicit on behalf of a union during non-working time insofar as it applied to other than immediate patient-care areas.

The board also struck down that part of the rule prohibiting distribution of union literature during employes' non-working time in non-working areas of the hospital. In addition, it ordered St. John's to expunge from its records any disciplinary warning to the four employes involved in the case.

Profiting from Violations:

J. P. Stevens Cases Reveal Shortcomings of Labor Law

J. P. Stevens & Co., the nation's number one labor-law violator, has been able effectively to trample workers' rights largely because of inadequacies in the basic federal labor law, the National Labor Relations Act.

The NLRA, which was designed to protect the rights of workers and their unions and to prevent unfair labor practices and stop companies from interfering with workers' right to organize, continues to be flouted by Stevens, J. Gary DiNunno observes in the current issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly publication.

Since 1965, the National Labor Relations Board has found the southern textile firm guilty of violating NLRA provisions in 15 separate cases. Eight times these NLRB decisions have been upheld by federal appeals courts, and three times by the U.S. Supreme Court.

DiNunno, an intern in the AFL-CIO Departments of Publications and Public Relations, notes that in 1968 a House labor subcommittee prepared a report stating that "employers who violate (the NLRA) are encouraged to do so as the penalties come too late for effective enforcement, and in any event have little or no deterrent force."

Eight years later, DiNunno points out, no action has been taken to provide the NLRB with the teeth necessary to enforce the law adequately.

"Meanwhile, J. P. Stevens has polished stalling through litigation into a sophisticated weapon and given it a place in union-busting history alongside the hiring of infiltrators or the importing of professional strikebreakers," DiNunno says.

Stevens' anti-union practices are so renowned, he points out, that Boyd Leedom, chairman of the NLRB under President Eisenhower, described events at the firm as "so out of tune with a humane, civilized approach to industrial relations that it should shock even those least sensitive to honor, justice and decent treatment."

The company's flouting of U.S. labor law has intensified in the last 13 years as the Textile Workers Union of America has tried to bring its workers under a union contract. After years of organizing efforts, TWUA won the right to represent workers at seven J. P. Stevens plants in Roanoke Rapids, N.C.

The election victory was heralded by the New York Times as "a major step toward unionization of the largely unorganized and traditionally low-wage textile industry."

Actually, DiNunno observes, "it was really only the signal for a new round of anti-union tactics by Stevens. Eighteen months later, the company was still refusing to negotiate a contract covering some 3,500 workers."

TWUA Sec.-Treas. William DuChessi says the union meets with the Stevens negotiating team "two or three times a month, but nothing gives." As DiNunno points out, this is the classic case of surface bargaining—sitting at the bargaining table without ever making an attempt to bargain in good faith—for which there is no remedy in national labor law.

The NLRA isn't the only law Stevens has violated, DiNunno notes. Government inspectors have found noise and cotton dust levels at Stevens plants well above the limits set under the five-year-old Occupational Safety & Health Act, for example.

In 1967 Stevens entered a "no contest" plea to government charges that it and other fiberglass manufacturers held secret meetings and conspired to fix prices and rig bids on government contracts. Stevens agreed to pay the government $260,000 in damages.

And three years ago, a federal district court found two Stevens officials guilty of wiretapping a telephone used by two union organizers during a campaign in Wallace, S.C.

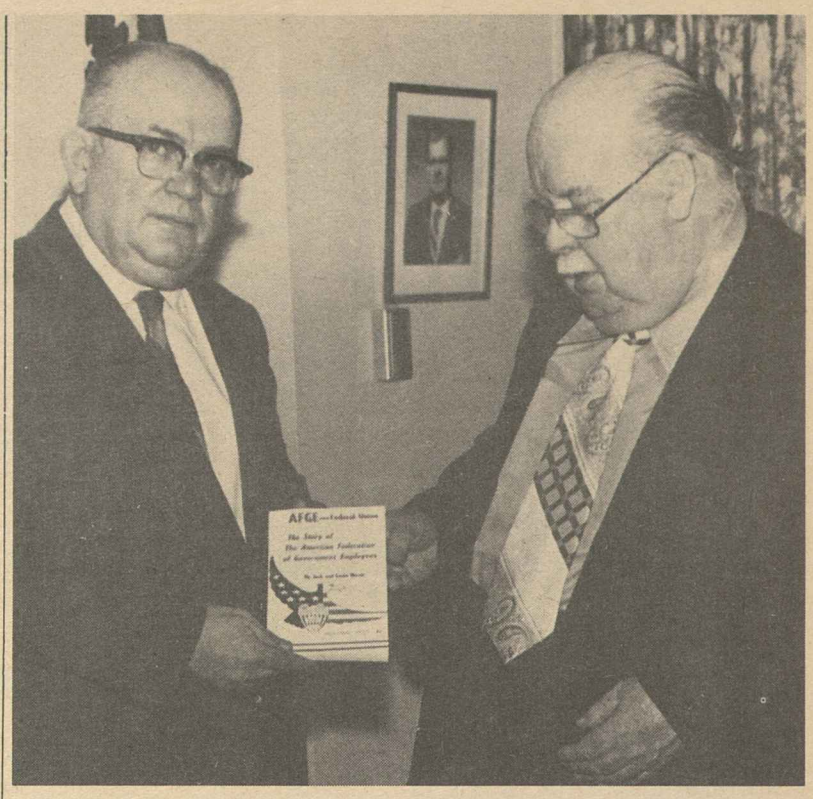
The nation's second largest textile manufacturer, trailing only Burlington Industries, Stevens employs 44,000 workers in 85 plants, most of them in the Carolinas.

Like most of the textile industry, the Stevens chain has concentrated production in the South since World War II to take advantage of lower wages, taxes, energy costs and the lack of unionization.

Only 10 percent of the 700,000 textile workers in eight states in the South are unionized. TWUA President Sol Stetin has pointed out that the wages of southern textile workers "are, on the average, about $1.42 an hour below the average of all manufacturing."

While unionization is the answer for the southern workers, the climate of law, custom and propaganda is inimical to union organization, especially in the textile mills.

By paying low wages and staving off union efforts to organize its workers, Stevens saves millions of dollars while setting an example to other southern textile giants to maintain the same low employment standards, the article notes.



Apparently, in no small part due to lucrative contracts from the federal government, Stevens is doing quite well, DiNunno observes. Despite protestations from organized labor, the government continues to hand out contracts to Stevens.

Nearly 10 years ago, AFL-CIO President George Meany urged the Johnson Administration to stop awarding contracts to firms found in violation of the labor law—specifically J. P. Stevens & Co. In response, Meany was told nothing in the law compels the Defense Dept. to pay attention to the fiindings and directives of the NLRB.

A number of solutions has been proposed, including congressional amendments to the NLRA that would speed up the processing of complaints by the labor board and the enforcement of its rulings by the courts.

For labor's part, the AFL-CIO Executive Council has established a special committee of union presidents to work with TWUA and the federation's Industrial Union Dept. "to help Stevens workers organize and get a contract."

The AFL-CIO's position is that J. P. Stevens is challenging not only the TWUA and the IUD but the labor movement as a whole, and that Stevens presumably will remain an outlaw until the company's vicious anti-union campaign becomes unprofitable.

Pennsylvania Primary Extends Carter's Gains

For the seventh time in nine outings, former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter won a Democratic presidential primary as he finished well ahead of Sen. Henry M. Jackson and Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona in Pennsylvania.

Carter gathered 37 percent in the presidential preference race and about 64 delegates in the separate Pennsylvania balloting for delegates to the Democrats' July convention. In the preferential vote Carter was followed by Jackson with 25 percent; Udall 19; Alabama Gov. George Wallace 11 and anti-abortion candidate Ellen McCormack 3 percent.

It was Carter's first victory in a major northeastern state, after losses to Jackson in Massachusetts and New York, and it came in the first head-on test among Carter, Udall and Jackson without someone's attention being partially focused elsewhere.

Carter went from his Pennsylvania victory to compete just four days later in Texas, where his delegates are running against a slate committed to Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.). Bentsen dropped out of the race earlier but is seeking to hold Texas as a favorite son. Texas has no presidential preference balloting and Wallace has the only other delegates filed.

Texas was also scheduled to be one of the biggest tests to date for the Republicans, with President Ford seeking to withstand the southern and western state strategy of former California Gov. Ronald Reagan. Ford leads Reagan by more than 2-1 in GOP delegate totals, with 100 more at stake in Texas.

Reagan has won ony one of six contests against Ford, with Pennsylvania marking the third state in which he was not entered. GOP delegates there were uncommitted but pro-Ford, and Ford won 90 percent of the preferential vote against a 10 percent write-in effort for Reagan.

The Pennsylvania results carried Carter to a delegate total of about 330, which can be extended to 380 off his early showing in the caucus states. By that reckoning, Jackson has about 250, Udall 180 and Wallace 109.

Udall got 23 delegates from Pennsylvania and Wallace three. Jackson's delegates were harder to count because his slates were partially merged with previously uncommitted delegates or those pledged to Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp.

State party officials counted a total of 37 to 41 delegates for Jackson, 19 of whom carried his name on the ballot and about 21 who were part of the merger agreements. That would leave another 40 uncommitted in Pennsylvania's total of 178.

Pennsylvanians also nominated two House members, Democrat William Green and Republican H. John Heinz III, for the November race for the Senate seat being vacated by Hugh Scott.

Green, who has a labor voting record of 100 right votes and 4 wrong, won easily while Heinz took a close race over former Philadelphia District Atty. Arlen Specter. Heinz has a labor voting record of 41 right and 17 wrong.

Pennsylvania COPE made seven endorsements in contested Democratic House races. All four endorsed incumbents—Representatives John Dent, Robert Nix, Joseph Vigorito and Joseph M. Gaydos—won. COPE-endorsed Joseph S. Ammerman and Eugene V. Atkinson also captured Democratic nominations to oppose incumbent Republicans in the fall, but the seventh COPE-endorsed candidate, Harold Swenson, was defeated.

After the Saturday Texas primary, eight more presidential primaries are packed into a seven-day span, with Alabama, D.C., Georgia, and Indiana on May 4; Tennessee on Thursday, May 6; and Nebraska, West Virginia and Connecticut May 11.

After that 10 more primaries remain before the tripleheader in California, New Jersey and Ohio closes out the schedule June 8.

Labor Studies Center Lists Schedule for May

Six programs are planned for the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in Silver Spring, Md., during May. The schedule:

Flight Attendants—An institute for local officers of the Association of Flight Attendants. Topics: grievance processing, the airline industry, basics of collective bargaining, and accounting and balloting procedures. From 4 p.m. Sunday, May 2, to Friday, May 7.

Operating Engineers—A program for union training directors on job analysis. From 4 p.m. Sunday, May 9, to Friday, May 14.

Government Employees—An AFGE program for local union officers and stewards. Topics: Equal Employment Opportunity, contract negotiations and administrative procedures. From 9 a.m. Monday, May 9, to Friday, May 14.

Negotiated Health Plans—An institute open to officers, negotiators, staff representatives and business agents of all AFL-CIO unions. Topics: health and welfare programs under collective bargaining, including eye care and dental care; negotiating and costing; relations with insurance companies; dual choice; the health care crisis, and AFL-CIO policy on National Health Security. From 4 p.m. Sunday, May 16, to Friday, May 21.

Labor Editors—A seminar for editors of national and international union publications. Topics: political semantics of 1976, jobs and a clean environment, the multinational world, workers attitudes, economics of full employment, and the elements of modern design. From 6 p.m. Thursday, May 20, to Sunday, May 23.

Corporate Power—An institute for officers, negotiating chairmen, research directors, educators and economists of AFL-CIO unions. Topics: issues growing out of concentration of power in multinational corporations, case studies of problems faced by individual trade unions in bargaining with conglomerate multinationals. From 4 p.m. Sunday, May 23, to Friday, May 28.

Further information about these or other Labor Studies Center programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. Phone 301/431-6400.

State-County Wins Library Runoff

The State, County & Municipal Employees won the right to represent the 1,996 non-professional employes of the Library of Congress. The union was chosen over the Black Employees of the Library of Congress by a vote of 636 to 432 in a runoff election.

The library's 969 professional employes, meanwhile, were scheduled to vote Apr. 2 to determine whether they wanted to be represented by AFSCME or by no union. In a Mar. 24 election, there was a tie.

Ford's Record Assailed:

Meany Calls Election Critical to Recovery

"But we are under no illusions that we will make much progress until the country as a whole gets out of the economic mess it is in," Meany said.

The price President Ford demands for what he terms fiscal responsibility means cutting public services to the bone," he said. It means a falling standard of living.

Meany contrasted the massive deficits under the Ford and Nixon Administrations resulting from high unemployment with the supposedly "spendthrift" policies under the Johnson, Kennedy and Truman administrations.

"Under those earlier administrations, America had something to show for its money. It paid for schools and hospitals, highways and airports, manpower programs, job programs that upgraded the nation's citizens and their standards of living, and improved the quality of American life."

By contrast, Meany said, the deficits under Nixon and Ford have had to be spent "for unemployment benefits and welfare programs . . . for giveaways to corporations and tax breaks that encourage the export of jobs."

He termed the Ford-Nixon economic policy "complete and utter waste." Unemployment, not spending, is wrecking the American economy, he charged.

The AFL-CIO has "launched its biggest fight for the future of America" with the campaign to pass the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act, Meany said. The lesson learned 30 years ago, when the Employment Act of 1946 became law, is that it is not enough just to set a goal. The strong point of the new bill, he said, is that it "spells out specific steps and specific programs to get the country back to work."

Further, "it doesn't merely authorize the Administration to take firm measures to implement the law, it requires it to do so. It reflects the lesson learned over the last seven years that Congress cannot simply rely on the good judgment and the good will of a President to properly administer the law when America has a President who has neither."

Ford's re-election platform, Meany said, amounts to "a President of the United States running against the United States government" by advocating "a general retreat from the idea of a strong federal role."

Meany scoffed at Ford's insistence "that America can't afford to care for its sick, can't afford to feed the hungry, can't afford to educate her children decently, can't afford to keep her cities from falling apart."

In fact, Meany retorted, "the only thing this country can't afford is four more years like the last seven."

Surveys Find First-Quarter Profits Surge

from a Business Week survey of early company returns. The magazine reported that 12 out of 13 companies had higher earnings than in the first quarter of 1975 while 6 out of 7 chalked up improved profit margins.

"Corporate profits are higher and healthier than they have been in years," commented Business Week. The magazine noted, however, that the earnings picture may be somewhat distorted by comparisons with the same period a year ago when corporate profits hit their lowest point since 1972.

Companies benefiting most from the recovery are the auto makers and firms that supply tires, glass and components for new cars. Output and prices also were up in the paper industry.

Substantial profit increases also were scored by the producers of computers and other electrical equipment, chemicals, textiles and clothing.

Health Care Outpaces All Other Price Rises

cent in just one year. The nation's health bill last year was $118.5 billion, of which 40 percent was paid by federal, state and local governments.

About 10 percent of Americans' income is spent for health care, the council said. It plans to hold hearings in various parts of the country this summer on ways to reduce health care costs.

In its report, the council suggested that the "unique structural characteristics" of the health care industry may have contributed to the rapid and substantial cost increases. One peculiar aspect of the industry, it noted, is the "passive" role of the consumer in health services.

In the health care sector, the council said, the patient relinquishes the consumer's power to the physician who becomes the "key decision-maker" in the transaction, even though the latter's professional training has not emphasized the "complex issues of cost and efficiency."

"In traditional markets, incentives to providers to be efficient would exist and would presumably restrain inflation," the council noted in the report. "In the health sector, by contrast, the incentive structure of the industry appears to encourage greater quantity of service rather than efficiency."

The report noted that the portion of the federal budget spent for health care has risen from 8.9 percent in 1969 to 11.3 percent in 1975 and is projected to increase to 11.7 percent in 1977.

NEW DAY CARE CENTER is dedicated at Winchester, Va., by the Clothing Workers to serve more than 300 children of working parents. Officiating at the dedication were from left, ACWA Vice President Sam Nocella, Matthew H. Hirsh of the J. Schoeneman Co. and ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman.

Clothing Union Opens Model Day Care Unit

Winchester, Va.—The Clothing Workers dedicated a $1 million day care center here—the sixth in a network of facilities operated by the ACWA Baltimore joint regional board to serve the children of union members.

The new Winchester center is a joint venture of the union and the J. Schoeneman Co., a men's and boys' clothing manufacturer under ACWA contract. The facility will serve both Schoeneman employes and the public.

Built on a three-acre site, the center can accommodate more than 300 children. It has 10 spacious classrooms, a fully equipped health clinic, complete kitchen facilities and a library containing audio-visual equipment, educational materials, games and toys. Outside, there are two playgrounds and one enclosed activity area.

On hand for the dedication of the center, ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman noted that each of the new day care centers opened under the sponsorship of the Baltimore board has been an improvement in layout and design.

"But the overriding guideline has always been to make each center fit the needs of the children who use it," Sheinkman stressed.

Since the inception of the Baltimore board's joint union-management day care venture in 1963, more than $10 million has been invested in the six centers now serving 1,300 children. The five other facilities are in Verona, Va., Chambersburg, Hanover and McConnellsburg, Pa., and Baltimore.

In a message read at the dedication ceremonies, ACWA President Murray H. Finley called on the federal government to "face up to its responsibility" and provide funds for day care centers.

Sam Nocella, an ACWA vice president and manager of the Baltimore joint board, expressed hope Congress would enact a national day care center program and that "the next President" would sign it into law.

The Winchester center will provide the services of a full-time registered nurse, weekly visits by a pediatrician, two hot meals daily, and professional instruction for the children.

Pollard, Lucy Listed As Most Influential

William E. Pollard, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Civil Rights, has been named to Ebony magazine's list of 100 Most Influential Black Americans.

Also named in the magazine's annual selection was William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The main criteria for selecting the top black leaders were how the individual affects the lives, thinking and actions of large segments of the nation's black population, and the extent of the person's national influence on policies and practices that significantly affect a large number of blacks.

Senate Adopts Labor-Backed Housing Bill

The Senate ignored a veto threat and passed a bill that would tilt the nation's housing programs in a direction urged by labor—stressing new construction of low-income housing and not just the rent subsidies for existing programs the Administration favors.

As sent to the House by a 55-24 vote, the bill would require the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development to use most of its new funds for new construction or major rehabilitation.

In the face of an HUD moratorium on new public housing, the Senate bill would require the department to spend $200 million of its funds for that purpose.

During the debate, Sen. Edward Brooke (R-Mass.) disagreed with the Administration position and said public housing construction, "despite its flaws, has proven to be the only effective means of providing decent housing for low-income persons."

Senate Housing Committee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) said a byproduct of the bill would be 1.2 million new jobs over a three-year period.

The measure now goes to the House, where similar legislation is being considered in committee. The death of Rep. William A. Barrett (D-Pa.) left a vacancy in the chairmanship of the important Subcommittee on Housing & Community Development. Rep. Thomas L. Ashley (D-Ohio) was unanimously chosen the new chairman.

HUD Sec. Carla Hills has warned that if the final version is along the lines of the Senate-passed bill she will ask President Ford to veto it.

Tally R. Livingston has been appointed deputy director of hte Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Before becoming a federal mediator, he was active in the Machinists union at Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Arkansas Coalition Sets Drive to Repeal R-T-W

Little Rock, Ark.—A broad-based coalition is helping the Arkansas labor movement's attempt to end a ban on union shop agreements that was written into the state's constitution 32 years ago.

Labor's petition drive to put the issue before the voters in November is being backed by prominent religious, black, farm, business and academic figures through a new organization called Arkansas for Progress.

While 55,000 signatures are needed by July 2 to put the constitutional proposal on the ballot, State AFL-CIO President J. Bill Becker is hoping for a symbolic 106,000 signatures. That would be 1,000 more than the total vote cast for the so-called "right-to-work" amendment in 1944.

The acting chairman of Arkansas for Progress is Floyd Sexton, president of the Arkansas Council of Churches. Other charter members include the president of the Arkansas Farmers Union, Bill McCarty, and Jack McCoy, president of the state Junior Chamber of Commerce. Another prominent founding member is Robert Lefler, former dean of the University of Arkansas Law School and chairman of the state's last constitutional convention.

In one of the first programs sponsored by the group, Rep. Andrew Young (D-Ga.) urged a gathering of black ministers to support the campaign for a "rights of labor amendment" to the state constitution.

Young, also a minister and a civil rights leader from a state that also has a compulsory open shop, told the gathering that the only reason for so-called "right-to-work" laws is "to keep wages low and keep people poor."

Becker told a State COPE convention that the National Right to Work Committee will be pouring in money to try to defeat the attempt to change the constitution. "Already the opposition has hired the largest advertising agency in the state," he said.

The proposed "rights of labor amendment" would make union security a subject for bargaining if a majority of workers in the bargaining unit voted to authorize it.

Becker said about 100 employers in the state, including several major firms, have contract clauses agreeing to a union shop if it were to become legal. In such cases, he said, the approval of the workers affected in an election conducted by the State Dept. of Labor would be required to put a union shop into effect.

Severe Joblessness Persists in Nation

Rate Tops 6% in 130 Key Areas

Substantial unemployment blanketed most of the country in April as the Labor Dept. reported jobless rates of 6 percent or more in 130 of the 150 major labor areas that it surveys each month.

While three areas were removed from the government's substantial unemployment list, two others were added to it. A year earlier, as the recession began to bottom out, the number rose by 22 in one month to 127.

In the previous four months, the number of areas with high unemployment rates had held steady at 131. The number peaked at 135 last September.

Taken off the list last month were Washington, D.C.; Little Rock-North Little Rock, Ark., and Steubenville, Ohio-Weirton, W. Va. Areas added were Des Moines, Iowa, and Tulsa, Okla.

Substantial joblessness, as defined by the Labor Dept., means 6 percent or more unemployment, discounting seasonal factors, that is likely to continue at that rate for at least two more months.

Areas with substantial unemployment may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts if firms located there agree to hire 25 percent of their new employes each month from among the area's disadvantaged residents.

In both the Washington and Steubenville-Weirton areas, the improvement in the job picture was attributed mainly to recent employment upswings in wholesale and retail trade, construction, and service activities.

In the Little Rock-North Little Rock area, job gains in manufacturing—principally in the metal industries—were responsible for the improved employment situation.

The rise in joblessness in the Des Moines area was due largely significant job declines in wholesale and retail trade. In the Tulsa area, the increased unemployment was caused principally by recent payroll reductions in metal processing and transportation equipment, together with employment drops in construction.

The area rates are based on state employment security agencies' preliminary data on employment and unemployment.

In addition to the changes in major area classifications, 32 smaller labor areas were added to the Congress Urged to Stiffen Labor Law's Protections

RUBBER WORKERS President Peter Bommarito, right, and URW Education Director Robert Strauber hold up the message of the consumer boycott launched May 8: "Don't Buy Firestone." Picketing of Firestone outlets and retail stores selling Firestone products got under way in eight major cities. (Story, this page.)

Weak Penalties Seen Aiding Anti-Unionists

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates prodded Congress to strengthen the National Labor Relations Act and tighten its enforcement.

"Hard-core, anti-union employers" flout the law with impunity, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller charged. He told a House Labor subcommittee that the case histories it has heard from union witnesses during nearly two months of hearings reflect basic weaknesses in federal labor law, not isolated exceptions.

Officials of the Industrial Union Dept., Clothing Workers, Steelworkers and Ladies' Garment Workers concluded the presentation of labor's case for reform, and Biemiller then summed up.

He told the panel, headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., that the NLRA functions as it was intended where employers accept the right of workers to organize, however grudgingly.

In such cases, Biemiller said, "the NLRA provides the legal framework whereby the parties can settle their disputes in a reasonable fashion through a board-conducted election, through the guidance provided by the decisions . . . or, where there are doubts as to the facts of the law by precipitating a legally binding decision that carries with it a cease-and-desist order or other mild remedy."

But where voluntary compliance is lacking, Biemiller said, the odds are heavily against workers who try to organize and negotiate a first contract in the face of an employer's determination to keep a union out.

As was the case before the original Wagner Act was passed 41 years ago, Biemiller noted, there

Congress Okays New Election Act

Congress gave final approval to a bill to restructure the Federal Election Commission, and sent it to President Ford.

It would reconstitute the commission as an Executive Board agency so it can pay out federal matching funds that are owed to the candidates who have been competing in the Democratic and Republican presidential primaries.

The bill passed by Congress would also equalize the law's treatment of corporation and union political funds, remedying a pro-management tilt. It would nullify an opinion by the election commission, strongly protested by the trade union movement, that would have allowed employers to solicit rank-and-file workers for a management-controlled political fund and even collect the money through a checkoff.

Under the labor-endorsed compromise adopted by Congress, cor-

House Votes Start-Up Funds:

Employment Bill Gains on 2 Fronts

By David L. Perlman

The Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill, the cornerstone of labor's economic program, won an important double endorsement in the House.

It moved out of the House Labor Committee, unscathed by amendments and supported by a 25-10 vote. The committee instructed Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), a supporter of the bill, to bring it to the Rules Committee "at the earliest time possible" in order to get it scheduled for the House floor.

Meanwhile, a 206-177 vote by the full House assured the employment bill a warm welcome.

The test vote came on the spending targets proposed by the House Budget Committee for the fiscal year that starts in October.

The committee earmarked $50 million as "start-up money" for the full employment program, in effect anticipating and endorsing its passage. An equal amount was budgeted for national health insurance, another major AFL-CIO goal, although the form of the health program was not spelled out.

A conservative coalition made two tries to delete the funds, an action that would have been interpreted as a rejection of the legislation.

First, the House defeated by a 230-153 margin an amendment by Rep. Omar Burleson (D-Tex.) to drop the start-up funds for both the health insurance and full em-

Ford Veto Sustained On Child Care Funds

President Ford won another veto battle, and the losers were low-income working mothers with children in day care centers that don't meet federal standards.

The Senate failed by three votes to reach the two-thirds majority needed to overturn Ford's veto of a bill giving states an additional $125 million to meet staffing and safety standards. Most of the money would have been used to hire welfare mothers as adult aides, so the net cost would have been minuscule in federal budget terms.

But Ford said the legislation would be too "costly," and he urged Congress to deal with the issue by suspending the standards that had been drawn up by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

In a letter sent to all representatives and senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller had appealed to Congress to override the "unconscionable" veto.

"Because of the lack of adequate funds," he wrote, "many of the

URW Rallies Launch Boycott of Firestone

Support for striking Rubber Workers in their dispute with the Big Four tire makers widened as a nationwide boycott of Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. products began.

Picket lines went up outside Firestone outlets and independent retailers selling Firestone products in Akron and Dayton, Ohio; Des Moines, Iowa; Memphis; Long Beach, Calif.; New Haven, Conn.; Pottstown, Pa., and in Toronto, Canada.

The largest picketing operation was in Akron where URW President Peter Bommarito addressed thousands of Rubber Workers at a kick-off rally in the Rubber Bowl. Similar rallies were held in other cities.

Meanwhile, pledges of support for the two-and-one-half-week-old strike poured in to URW headquarters in Akron from labor groups both at home and abroad. The International Federation of Chemical & General Workers' Unions, based in Geneva, sent out a call for solidarity and support action to its nearly 100 affiliates throughout the world.

In Detroit, delegates to the Auto Workers' National Ford Council unanimously adopted a resolution pledging full support for the Rubber Workers.

Trailways Bus Lines Struck In Nine States

Three locals of the Amalgamated Transit Union struck Continental Trailways May 1 in nine southern states after failing to get an acceptable agreement with the bus line on new three-year contracts.

ATU Locals 1531, 1534 and 1491 — representing more than 1,000 drivers, mechanics and terminal personnel — rejected the firm's final offer and voted overwhelmingly to strike when their old contracts expired Apr. 30.

Key issues in the dispute involve wages, cost-of-living adjustments, paid holidays and paid sick leave, the union reported.

ATU negotiators are seeking to narrow the disparity in mileage rates for bus drivers and obtain increases for hourly paid mechanics and terminal staffs.

Additional improvements are needed in the COL formula, which now provides a 1-cent-an-hour increase for every rise of six-tenths of 1 percent in the government's consumer price index, the ATU said.

The union is also asking for improvements in holiday benefits. The Trailways division employes currently are paid for five irregular holidays, but must work on regular holidays to receive time and one-half pay.

Other ATU proposals call for fully paid sick leave and increased company contributions for health insurance coverage. Currently, Trailways employes receive no paid sick leave and must pay 40 percent of the health insurance premium.

FREEDOM RALLY for Soviet Jews is addressed in New York by Michael Mann, AFL-CIO regional director, who delivered a message from Federation President George Meany. More than 100,000 persons took part in the May 2 observance of Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry at the United Nations headquarters.

Meany Assails Soviets On Treatment of Jews

New York—More than 100,000 persons—including thousands of trade unionists—thronged Dag Hammarskjold Square and the streets around the United Nations headquarters to express support of freedom for Soviet Jews.

The demonstration on May 2, the fifth annual "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry," was highlighted by the presence of city, state and national dignitaries. A message from AFL-CIO President George Meany was read to the rally by Michael Mann, director of the federation's New York region.

"I am proud to raise my voice in support of Soviet Jews and in condemnation of the Soviet government's encouragement and perpetuation of the disease of anti-semitism," Meany's message declared.

"That this disease can flourish, with official backing, in a nation which answers to no moral authority and is now deterred by no superior military power—and whose capacity for destruction dwarfs by far the war machine of Adolph Hitler—can only chill the hearts of all mankind."

He urged the American people to regain the "pride in our democratic institutions and the unquestioned will to defend them that have made this country the hope of the world."

Meany was joined in these views by New York Gov. Hugh Carey, who said: "Let us substitute for the word 'detente' in our foreign policy the word 'determination'—determination that all people should enjoy the freedom of worship as they choose and to emigrate from tyranny.

Mayor Abraham Beame summed up the crowd's feelings when he asked: "How long will the Soviets continue to abuse the patience of free people everywhere? How long will the Soviets keep denying in systematic and wholesale fashion the rights of Soviet Jews? How many more years must we hold these rallies in order to wake the world to the worldwide dangers of Soviet injustice?"

Among labor groups taking part in the demonstration were the New York City Central Labor Council, the Jewish Labor Committee, the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Teachers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Pay Cut Demand Forces N.Y. Apartment Strike

New York—A strike by building service workers at New York apartment houses spread as the walkout neared the end of its first full week.

Members of Local 32B of the Service Employees, representing some 23,000 superintendents, handymen, elevator operators, porters, mechanics and guards in 4,000 apartment buildings, left their jobs on May 3 after negotiations on a new contract broke down.

The workers are seeking higher pay and improved benefits while the apartment house owners, represented by the Realty Advisory Board, have proposed a pay cut and other retrogressive changes in benefit provisions and working conditions.

The union has proposed a new one-year contract to replace the three-year agreement that expired on Apr. 30. It also wants a better cost-of-living escalator clause, a shorter work week and improvements in pensions, welfare coverage, sick leave and vacations.

Talks came to an end on May 2 when the realty board abruptly terminated the negotiations which were being mediated by the State Mediation Board. Union negotiators charged the owners were not bargaining in good faith.

Support for the walkout was pledged by the New York City Central Labor Council and other local labor groups. The realty board represents owners and managers of about 1,600 apartment buildings in the city.

John J. Sweeney, president of the striking local, said the union business agents were talking to workers in other buildings to persuade them to join the walkout.

Sweeney cited an independent study by a Washington consulting firm that indicated custodial workers in private apartment buildings would require a 68-cent hourly pay increase to restore the same earnings relationship they had in 1973 with comparable workers in other unionized industries.

Present wages of the building employes range from $180 to $201 a week, and to $15,000 a year for superintendents.

The building owners asked for a reduction in present fringe benefits to help them meet increased real-estate taxes, higher fuel and material costs and continued rent control.

They also want to pay only straight time pay for work on holidays, eliminate the workers' present COL clause, eliminate certain paid holidays, and require workers to pay $3 a week to their welfare fund and $1 a week to the pension fund. The funds are currently supported entirely by employer payments.

Cement Masons Receive New Training Grant

The Plasterers & Cement Masons received a new Labor Dept. contract for $1,028,768 to provide on-the-job training for 735 disadvantaged persons and veterans and to upgrade the skills of 280 experienced plasterers.

The training will be conducted in 29 states in cooperation with the Portland Cement Association.

Since 1967, more than 6,000 persons have completed training programs under previous Labor Dept. contracts with the union.

Credit Unions Report Gain in Membership

Madison, Wis.—Membership in labor-sponsored credit unions exceeded 1.1 million last year, the Credit Union National Association, Inc., announced.

In addition, CUNA said, millions of union members belonged to other credit unions serving employe groups or communities in 1975.

Total assets of union-sponsored credit unions topped $989 million at the end of the 1975 calendar year, CUNA reported in its new 1976 Credit Union Yearbook.

Awaits Ford Decision:

Congress Approves New Election Law

porations could directly solicit only stockholders and administrative-level employes, with unions given similar solicitation rights within the bargaining unit. Each group could solicit the other's constituency by mail, but only under elaborate safeguards that prevent the soliciting group from knowing who contributed.

The bill would prevent corporations and unions alike from setting up a proliferation of political committees so as to evade the ceiling on contributions to candidates or parties. It would also require unions and other membership organizations to report expenses over $2,000 an election for communications to members designed primarily to elect or defeat a candidate for federal office.

Also in the bill is a provision cutting off public financing to presidential candidates receiving less than 10 percent of the vote in two successive primaries where they did not voluntarily withdraw from the ballot. However, candidates who cease to "actively seek" nomination could continue to receive funds to defray expenses incurred before they dropped out.

Either the House or Senate could reject, but not otherwise change, a regulation of the Federal Election Commission.

Congressional Republicans were divided on the bill, which passed the House in final form by a 291-81 vote and then was approved by the Senate. 62-29.

In other congressional developments:

● The House gave 287-42 approval to a bill that would continue, at least through September, a program of public service jobs for areas with high unemployment. President Ford wants to phase out the program, and a veto is considered likely.

The bill is intended to prevent the program from running out of funds during the "transitional quarter" of this year that bridges the gap between the June 30 end of the 1976 fiscal year and the Oct. 1 start of the 1977 fiscal year.

The program that the Administration claims is no longer needed is Title 6 of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act. Without congressional action, supporters of the bill told the House, funds will soon be exhausted and 115,000 persons now in public service jobs will be put off the payroll by mid-June.

● The House approved a conference agreement on a Beef Research & Information bill that would finance an industry program through what amounts to a value-added tax passed on to consumers. The AFL-CIO and the Meat Cutters opposed the legislation, but the House adopted it, 200-170.

● The Senate's Agriculture and Interior Committees unanimously approved a labor-endorsed bill that would allow continued tree harvesting in national forests, under federal guidelines. The legislation was needed after court rulings that an 1897 conservation law banned "clear-cutting" of trees threatened a lumber shortage that would send prices higher and add to unemployment in both lumbering and construction.

Senate Vote Sustains Veto On Child Care

states have had to cut back on the day care services they were providing and have indicated they may have to reduce them even further. The result will be that parents working or in training programs will be forced to leave their jobs or training and join the ranks of the unemployed or those on welfare."

If the veto were sustained, Biemiller warned, "it would force cutbacks in the pitifully inadequate amount of day care presently available."

The House voted first, and the motion to override carried by a resounding 301-101, which was 33 more than the needed two-thirds.

But the Senate, under what a wire service story termed "heavy pressure from the White House," could muster only a 60-34 majority to override.

Hillman Awards Cite 5 as Media Standouts

New York—Outstanding work in mass communications brought awards to two newspaper reporters, a magazine writer, an author and a national television network from the Sidney Hillman Foundation.

The Hillman prizes, made annually in the memory of the first president of the Clothing Workers, were presented at an awards luncheon here by Murray H. Finley, president of the ACWA and the foundation. Each award carries a $750 prize.

The award winners are:

William S. Randall and Stephen D. Solomon of the Philadelphia Inquirer for investigative reporting on work-related health hazards and cancer deaths among workers.

Susan Sheehan for an article in New Yorker magazine titled A Welfare Mother, which explored the problems of trying to hold a family together while on public assistance.

E. J. Kahn, Jr., for his book, The China Hands, an in-depth study of U.S. relations with China and America's mistreatment of its foreign service officers during the Joe McCarthy era.

The Columbia Broadcasting System for its two-hour special, Fear on Trial, a drama based on the blacklisting of radio-television personality John Henry Faulk and his subsequent successful libel suit.

Faulk, a former vice president of the Radio & Television Artists and member of the Screen Actors Guild, was a guest speaker at the awards luncheon.

Judges for this year's Hillman awards competition were Alan Barth, retired editor-writer for the Washington Post; Edward P. Morgan, director of the Public Broadcasting Laboratory, and Harrison E. Salisbury, former associate editor of the New York Times.

Stiffer Enforcement:

Labor Law Reforms Urged on Congress

are employers who fire workers who are active union supporters. Now, however, "a year, or two, or three, after the event, and long after the organizing drive has been defeated, the discriminatee may receive back pay with interest and an order restoring him to his job." But an employer who has killed off a union organizing drive considers it a small price to pay.

Citing testimony of previous witnesses, Biemiller stressed the ability of an employer to utilize an arsenal of delaying tactics to put off, sometimes for several years, "the day when he has to sit down and bargain with the representative chosen by his employes."

Then, "an employer can simply refuse to bargain in good faith" and face "no sanction other than an order to cease and desist" long after the offense.

And finally, Biemiller noted, if the employer at the bargaining table offers workers little or nothing, "their only recourse is to accept the offer, disband their union, or go out on strike." If they choose to strike to obtain a contract of limited duration, he said, they risk being permanently replaced.

When employers hostile to unions see firms such as J. P. Stevens repeatedly violate the law and get by with little more than slap-on-the-wrist penalties, "the moral force of the law's prohibitions . . . is corroded," Biemiller suggested. He told the panel:

"The testimony you have heard indicates that more and more employers are concluding that the lack of prompt and effective remedies against flagrant violators demonstrates that this society does not have a serious commitment to collective bargaining, and are therefore acting on the premise that only timid fools respect the rules."

Biemiller urged that Congress redress the pro-employer tilt of the Taft-Hartley Act by providing swifter remedies for employer unfair labor practices as it now does for union offenses such as secondary boycotts or picket line misconduct.

To curtail delaying tactics used by employers to stall representation elections, Biemiller asked that the NLRB be given back the power it once held "to hold pre-hearing elections where there is no substantial legal issue and to require that in every case an election take place within a specified period, with the understanding that issues unresolved at that time can be raised through appropriate election challenges."

He said the AFL-CIO "heartily endorses" a bill to require that elections be held within 45 days of the filing of a petition.

To deal with employers who refuse to bargain, Biemiller urged "a clear legislative mandate to impose a compensatory remedy" along lines suggested by a two-member minority of the NLRB. In that case, they endorsed a proposal to require the company to give its workers as back pay an amount equal to the estimated increased compensation and benefits they would have received if the employer had bargained in good faith from the beginning.

Also, Biemiller urged, the law should require an employer to honor a voluntary checkoff for union dues—a standard provision in almost all contracts and normally a point of controversy only when an employer is out to break a union.

On the issue of dismissals of union supporters during organizing campaigns, Biemiller urged that the NLRB be obligated to seek court injunctions to immediately restore the worker to his or her job, and that the worker be authorized to bring a triple-damage suit against the employer.

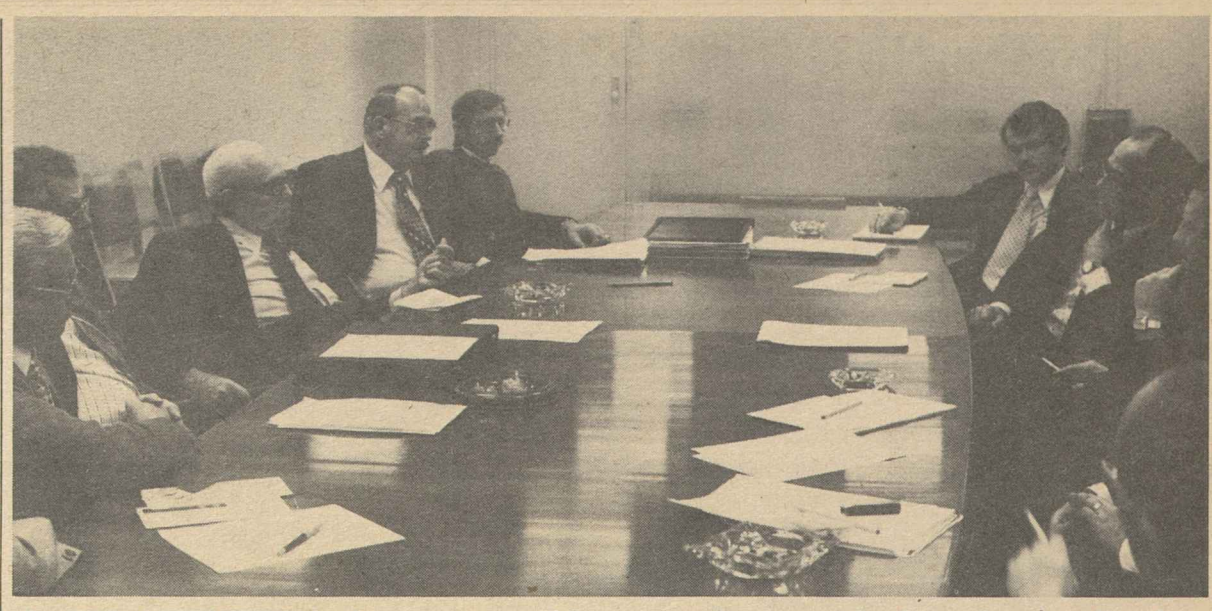
An employer who persistently violates his workers' rights to organize and bargain should be subject to the same penalty of loss of government contracts as an employer who illegally discriminates on the grounds of race, creed, color, national origin or sex, Biemiller urged.

To speed up NLRB procedures, he urged that opinions of administrative law judges be final unless the labor board accepts a case that is appealed to it for review—in somewhat the same fashion that higher court decides through a certiorari procedure whether to review decisions of a lower court.

Further, he said, decision of the NLRB should be self-enforcing subject to the right of a party to obtain a stay from a federal appellate court within 30 days, and then only on a showing that the NLRB order is defective as a matter of law. At present, if a board order is defied, the NLRB must initiate enforcement procedures in a court of appeals.

Profits Survey Confirms Sharp Surge for Quarter

A Wall Street Journal survey of first-quarter corporate profits showed the largest year-to-year spurt in 17 years, an increase of 41 percent.



After-tax earnings of 569 major American firms totaled $11.9 billion during the first three months of 1976, compared with $8.5 billion in the same quarter a year earlier, the Journal said.

The sharp increase was largely attributed by the Journal to the dismal profits a year ago at the low point of the recession, but some analysts indicated the first-quarter performance would continue through the year.

The profits upturn was relatively broad-based, affecting all but the banking and metals-producing industries, the Journal said.

The biggest gainers were textiles, up 346 percent; railroads, up 161 percent; building materials, up 128 percent; rubber companies, up 93 percent, and chain grocery and drug stores, up 83 percent.

"Bolstering first-quarter earnings besides the general economic growth was increased worker productivity—up at an annual rate of 4.6 percent in the quarter," the Journal said.

LABOR ACTIVITIES in Asia are reviewed by country directors of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute at a meeting with AFL-CIO President George Meany in Washington. Meany is flanked by Morris Paladino, left, AAFLI executive director, and Charles Gray, deputy executive director.

Unions Cite Frustration, Delays As Weapons of Defiant Employers

"Our experiences and frustrations are shared by every union in America."

That comment, by Steelworkers Organizing Director Elmer Chatak, drew no dissent from other union witnesses who testified to the ease with which union-busting employers can defy the intent of federal labor law.

It was affirmed by Clothing Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman and it echoed also in the testimony of the two labor attorneys who also testified during the final week of House "oversight" hearings on the National Labor Relations Act—Elliot Bredhoff, general counsel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Joseph Good, associate general counsel of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Sheinkman agreed with the need for legislative action. But he strongly urged the NLRB to use its administrative powers to reduce the "unconscionable" delay which has been a recurrent complaint "of witness after witness."

One easily remedied cause of delay, he said, is the labor board's insistence on setting policy on a case-by-case basis instead of formulating policy guidelines in the manner it now promulgates procedural rules.

He noted as an example a recent Supreme Court decision holding that the right to picket in private shopping centers is not a constitutional issue but subject "exclusively" to the National Labor Relations Act.

It may be years, Sheinkman suggested, before the NLRB has acted on sufficient cases to give unions and employers the guidance that could be achieved in a single NLRB policy formulation.

Bredhoff, testifying for the IUD, spelled out the urgency of legislation to make it more difficult for employers to kill off a union by taking advantage of every opportunity for delay, or simply ignoring the law.

Last year, he noted, the median time lag between the filing of an unfair labor practice charge and a decision by the NLRB was 332 days, almost a full year. But then, it typically took another year to file an enforcement petition against a recalcitrant employer and to obtain a decision from a court of appeals.

With even longer delays not uncommon, Bredhoff said, an employer can thwart a union drive for a "relatively small outlay of perhaps some backpay and his attorney's fees."

Good, the ILGWU attorney, stressed the token nature of remedies imposed by the labor board for employer misconduct. When a union drive has been broken by employer intimidation and other illegal practices, he suggested, the eventual posting of plant bulletin board notices promising not to interfere with the right to organize becomes "a cruel hoax."

By that time, Good said, "the employer has effectively demonstrated to its workers that it can defy the United States government with impunity."

Chatak showed to the House subcommittee instructions a company had issued to its supervisors during a Steelworkers organizing drive.

It told supervisors to "try" to stay within the law, and cited examples of illegal actions.

But it also declared: "The illegal acts we have been referring to are unfair labor practices. They are not crimes. No individual is punished for committing them."

And it concluded, "You stand the most to lose from the organization of your department."

John Pecoraro Heads Seniors' Political Unit

John J. Pecoraro, retired legislative director of the Painters, has been named executive director of the Concerned Seniors for Better Government, the labor-supported political committee affiliated with the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Pecoraro, 64, had been legislative director of the Painters since 1969.

10 Unions Accept Cuts To Keep Paper Alive

Ten unions have ratified an agreement with the Washington Star to cut the newspaper's operating costs about $6 million a year through an eight-month wage freeze and a reduction of 200 jobs.

The Star, which has 1,700 workers on its payroll, has been losing money for the past decade, including more than $9 million since coming under new management a year ago. It is the only daily competitor of the Washington Post in the nation's capital.

A joint statement issued by the unions and the Star management said the "economies would keep the Star alive and reinforce its prospects for the future."

Publisher Joe L. Allbritton, a Texas millionaire who acquired the newspaper last year, said he would inject an additional $6 million of new operating capital to match the commitment from the unions.

The agreement calls for economic incentives for union members who voluntarily retire or resign. The 200 job cutbacks would include 100 of the 270 printers of the International Typographical Union; 37 of the 540 editorial-commercial employes of the Newspaper Guild, and 20 of the 80 pressmen represented by the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

Allbritton offered a one-time bonus of $18,000 to ITU members who left the payroll immediately and $15,000 for those who would retire by the end of the year.

The pressmen, stereotypers and the ITU mailers also agreed to workforce and work-practice changes. In addition, the printers agreed to a four-day workweek until the composing workforce is reduced to agreed levels.

Members of the eight Star unions will be affected by the moritorium on wage increases through Dec. 31, 1976. Excluded are the ITU and Service Employees, which had been working under expired contracts when the negotiations on the economic reductions took place.

The agreement was reached with the assistance of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, including several sessions in which union and management representatives negotiated around the clock.

AFGE Certified at Information Agency

The Government Employees union received official recognition as bargaining agent for some 2,100 foreign service employes of the U.S. Information Agency.

AFGE Local 1812, the declared winner of a representation election last Mar. 23, was certified as bargaining agent by the Employee-Management Relations Commission of the Board of the Foreign Service.

The AFGE local now represents all of USIA's more than 4,000 general schedule and foreign service employes. In the March election, it defeated the American Foreign Service Association.

Frustrating Organizing

THERE ARE THREE entirely distinct labor-management relations systems in this country. The best known is that covering industries or companies that are well organized and that accept the concept of collective bargaining. So far as one would gather from the media, and from management spokesmen, the collective agreements negotiated by such companies and the unions with whom they deal and the economic confrontations that from time to time mark those negotiations, constitute the entirety of our industrial life. But such mature bargaining relationships, which are not a prime concern of the regulatory scheme embodied in the NLRA, are unfortunately the exception not the rule.

At the next level are the employers who grudgingly accept their employes' right to organize. These employers seek to come as close to the legal line as possible in opposing unions, and from time to time go over that line. But they are not dedicated to returning the law to where it stood prior to the Wagner Act.

The relationships between such employers and their employes form the grist for the board's mill. In this context the NLRA provides the legal framework whereby the parties can settle their disputes in a reasonable fashion through a board-conducted election; through the guidance provided by the decisions elaborating the meaning of the act's commands in great detail; or, where there are doubts as to the facts of the law, by precipitating a legally binding decision that carries with it a cease-and-desist order or other mild remedy.

Particularly when the Congress turns its attention to how the act is working, great emphasis is placed on this latter group of employers as proof that the law has taken hold.

BUT THIS distorted partial view ignores entirely the far different situation of workers who, in the face of employer opposition, commit themselves to the task of self organization and of negotiating a first contract. The economic resources at their command are pitiable. The resources of the unions that seek to aid them are not that much greater. Those resources are derived from the dues payments of the already organized, and, of course, the first call on those dues is to meet the complex demands placed on unions properly representing their present members. Moreover, the legal resources the NLRA provides these workers and unions are just as inadequate.

In contrast, the anti-union employer normally has the money to hire the lawyers and labor relations experts who specialize in breaking organizing drives. Of equal importance, he has the power of the initiative derived from his status as the owner of the enterprise. The resulting disparity in power is most stark in areas where there is no union tradition and where a way of life has been constructed by instilling the community with a fear of the adverse consequences that will flow from employe exercise of the right declared in the NLRA to form and join a union.

With very rare exceptions, the often desperate and heartbreaking struggles that mark these confrontations between anti-union employers and their workers who wish to secure the benefits of collective bargaining are ignored. Except to the participants they are nonevents. This committee's willingness to break this veil of silence and to plumb the situation of the unorganized is in itself an enormous service.

The central lesson of these hearings is that the NLRA, as it stands, often frustrates and impedes fulfillment of the act's promise, to encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining.

Bringing Morality to Money:

Church Groups Strive to Instill Conscience Into Corporations

By Gus Tyler

FROM THE PULPIT recently the Episcopal Bishop of New York, Paul Moore, Jr. excoriated the immorality of corporations with the righteous wrath of an Old Testament prophet. He poured fire and brimstone on the companies that were fleeing New York and other cities.

Whatever the "economic considerations," he thundered, "most industries' decisions to leave the city are basically immoral." He called the companies "rats leaving the sinking ship."

Indeed, these were rats who were eating away at the fiber of the cities and causing them to sink. As companies leave, unemployment rises. Income from taxes falls and city services collapse. Into the chaos strides crime to drive more business out of the city. And so the once proud metropolis sinks in a vicious swirl to the lower and lowest depths.

"It is not just a problem of New York," intoned the bishop, but of the industrial society, with the urban blight spreading to the suburbs. "There is nowhere to flee in a dying land."

In the spirit of the resurrection, he called for a moral rebirth: "Cut through the fog of statistics and see the moral decisions behind them," he appealed. "Be part of the rising, not the dying."

In these stark statements, the outspoken bishop has posed the problem of economics versus ethics. Just how far can any corporation go in dispelling the "fog of statistics" to follow the straight-and-narrow road of righteousness?

A couple of years ago, the Council for Economic Development pretty much summed it up by noting that "corporations are necessarily limited by various internal constraints on what and how much they can do to improve society."

They noted that "no company of any size can willingly incur costs which would jeopardize its competitive position and threaten its survival." Second, beyond staying alive, the corporation had to show profits that would please its stockholders and appeal to the financial market.

In short, by its very nature, a corporation has to be dedicated to making money—first and foremost.

Having set down these limits on corporate social "responsibility" the CED still felt that there was leeway for some do-gooding by these companies.

Among the most militant forces in America presently pushing for the development of a corporate conscience is a consortium of churches that are using their vast collective investments to pressure the soulless companies into finding a soul. In their "occasional bulletin," entitled "Churches as Shareholders," they recount their many missions.

Thus they report in their spring number that the United Presbyterian Church, as a shareholder in ITT, has gotten the corporation to agree not to bid "on South African military or police procurements."

A RESOLUTION SPONSORED by the Adrian (Mich.) Dominican Sisters and the Sisters of Mercy of Chicago asks that Abbott Laboratories disclose information about the marketing and sales of infant formulae in developing countries. The Sisters of St. Joseph and the Center for Social Action of the United Church of Christ want to view the commercials and advertisements of Colgate-Palmolive to see whether they square with "the changing role of women in society."

These and many similar actions are part of a concerted effort to bring a conscience to the corporation, to find some way to bring morality to money.

Instead of driving the money changers from the temple, these modern Christians would drag them back into the temple to hearken to the voice of the Lord.

In Election Campaign:

Ford, Reagan Ignore Key Issues To Exploit 'Big Government'

The following article, "The Phony Issue of Big Government," appeared in the Apr. 26, 1976, issue of Memo from COPE.

EVERY ELECTION YEAR has a phony issue. "Big government" is the Number One phony issue for 1976.

Sure, the government is big. It's a big country. In population, we are 215 million people. Our mainland stretches 3,000 miles east-west and about 1,800 miles north-south—not to mention Alaska and Hawaii.

In short, we're not Monaco to be administered by Princess Grace and Prince Ranier and a couple of hired hands. We need programs to serve people, employes to conduct the programs and taxes to fund them.

So, what do they mean when they talk about cutting back "big government?" President Ford by his actions and Ronald Reagan in his speeches have given us a pretty clear idea. The President's cuts are aimed at working people and the poor through his vetoes of job-creating programs and his proposals for chopping down programs like food stamps among others.

Reagan said he'd whack $90 billion off the federal budget—and along with it such programs as school lunch, medicaid, aid to education, food stamps, mental health, housing and a batch of others. He also indicated he'd tamper with the social security plan.

Nobody argues the government can't be more efficient, or that taxpayers shouldn't get more mileage for what they kick in to Washington. But to take the candidates' talk about "big government" seriously is to ask some hard questions the candidates don't begin to answer clearly or fully, questions voters should think about before they swallow the line:

● One of "big government's" biggest programs is social security. It takes in and disburses vast sums of money. It employs thousands. But it serves millions.

It provides retirement benefits to 19 million Americans and their dependents, survivors benefits to more than 7 million widows and orphans, disability benefits to more than 3.6 million disabled workers and their dependents.

It pays out an average of $120 million a day, 365 days a year. It's the world's biggest people-helping program and you don't conduct anything of this scope with a PhD and a computer. It takes a lot of employes to give decent service.

Given a "mandate" next November, what would either Ford or Reagan do to social security in their zeal to cut back "big government?"

● How about medicare and federally-aided state medicaid programs? They, too, serve millions of people—and while no one considers they are perfect in their administration or their benefits, the programs do a lot of good that wasn't being done before.

Does anyone really want to dispense with the "big medicare" part of "big government?" Improve it, yes. But dump it, no.

● There are scores of federal agencies, departments and commissions that came into being over a period of time as need for them became evident. Some of them have outlived their usefulness and should be dismantled, and the AFL-CIO supports proposals for regular review with an eye to decommissioning whatever no longer serves a purpose.

But most agencies serve a need and, though not perfectly, overall perform to the public's benefit.

● "Big government" is food stamps to help feed poor and hungry families. This whole program is now under attack by the Ford Administration with alarming support in Congress. Is this country really ready to reduce aid to those so desperately in need?

● "Big government" is the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, an effort, too long-delayed, to reduce death and injury on the job. Do many Americans really believe this is too great an intrusion on the rights of business? Are they ready to weaken it?

The "big government" argument really is aimed at programs that help people. Ford and Reagan seem determined to create and exploit an issue they sense is a winner. Playing on genuine legitimate concerns about the role and cost of government, they threaten to inflate these concerns and turn the 1976 campaign into a windy exchange over a phony issue.

The danger is a lot of citizens might be so swept up by it that the crucial issues of jobs, prices, taxes, health care, housing, education and others will be obscured—and these, after all, are not so much a matter of "big government" as of "good government," which is the real issue in 1976.

Prospects for Passage Good:

Full Employment Bill Draws Strong Support from Coalition

LEGISLATION spelling out the right of every adult American to a job and the machinery to reach that goal may clear Congress and go to the White House as early as August, Howard D. Samuel, vice president of the Clothing Workers, predicted on Labor News Conference.

Samuel said the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill has drawn strong support from a broad coalition of organized labor, civil rights and business leaders, academics and liberals of both political parties. He stressed that key principles of the bill make full employment a primary item on the national agenda and a "major criterion of anything that we do in the field of economics in this country."

Samuel acknowledged that President Ford's "low regard for full employment" is a major obstacle to the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, and that if Congress does approve the measure this year, there is a good chance that the President would veto it. Since key Democratic presidential candidates support the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, a Ford veto would make it a major issue in the '76 elections, he noted.

If the full employment legislation is cut off by a veto, Samuel said, "our hope will be that a new President will be elected, partly on the basis of an immense outpouring of votes in behalf of full employment, that the bill will be passed again and signed in 1977."

Samuel scored the Administration position—based on a theory held by conservative economists—that full employment would trigger another inflation push and result in another recession and higher unemployment. The fact is, he said, high inflation almost always goes hand-in-hand with high unemployment, while "every time we've had low unemployment we've also had very low inflation and low interest rates."

High unemployment has an extremely adverse impact on the nation's economy, Samuel stressed.

"The budget deficit, which the Ford Administration claims is a major source of inflation, goes up approximately $16 billion for every 1 million unemployed—that's $14 billion in lost taxes and $2 billion in direct expenses, like unemployment unsurance and food stamps," he said.

"If we get 3 or 4 million back to work," Samuel noted, "we could reduce the deficit by $60 or 70 billion. That could turn the deficit into a plus."

Wide support for passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill is being generated by two key coalition groups—the Full Employment Action Council, a legislative lobbying body, and the National Committee for Full Employment, which works to educate the public on the issue.

Both groups are headed by Coretta Scott King, widow of Dr. Martin Luther King, and ACWA President Murray H. Finley.

Reporters questioning Samuel on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Michael Posner of the Reuter News Agency and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRESIDENT FORD has thrown down the gauntlet. Addressing the annual meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce the President attacked the Humphrey-Hawkins bill as "dangerous, deceptive" and a "vast election-year boondoggle."

The President drew a sharp line between his approach of basically relying on private industry for economic recovery and the Democrats' approach as embodied in the proposed Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act of 1976.

"The difference between my approach and that of the Congress couldn't be more clear-cut and I am delighted, I am glad, to join the issue with them," Ford declared.

"This is," the President told his business audience, "perhaps the decisive issue of our bicentennial year."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) counterattacked within hours, pointing out that Ford's opposition was no surprise since the President has vetoed virtually every job-creation bill passed by Congress.

"Frankly," Humphrey said, "while I always solicit and welcome comments, I do not rely on President Ford's economic brain trust for wise and creative counsel on economic issues.

"After all, these are the very people who have caused America to suffer its highest levels of unemployment since the Great Depression, the most severe inflation since World War II, the most onerous high interest rates since the Civil War and the worst recession in 40 years.

"Anyone who believes in WIN buttons as the cure for inflation, and tax increases as the solution to recession, will not be relied on for economic leadership by the American people," Humphrey said.

What the President is counting on this election year is an uptrend in which he thinks he can persuade people that prosperity is "just around the corner."

The President is betting that some 86 million employed people will be content with their lot. He is betting that most people don't care about the more than 10 million unemployed, about the 3.7 million unemployed under 25 who are losing faith with America, about great cities rotting at the core, about a nation whose leadership of the world's democracies is now in question.

THE INFLUENTIAL Joint Economic Committee of Congress has provided a good basis for debate in its newly issued analysis of the Economic Report which Ford sent to Congress in January.

Referring to the "Great Recession of 1973-1975," the committee said "its severity is a direct result of economic misunderstanding and mismanagement by the Administration and the Federal Reserve. The nation is a victim of misguided policies."

The committee criticized Administration officials for perpetuating the myth that the recession was caused by reckless government spending. "The truth is," the committee said, "that the inflation of 1973-1974 derived not from government profligacy but largely from factors such as grain, oil and dollar devaluations. . . ."

The committee, which has a staff of able economists, called on the Administration to stop peddling "ignorance and misinformation" to the public.

Each percentage point of unemployment increases the federal deficit by about $17 billion, the committee observed. If unemployment in fiscal 1976 had been at 4 percent instead of its projected level of about 8 percent, there would be almost no deficit. "Yet the Administration spreads the erroneous notion that the deficit is caused by 'wasteful spending.' "

So the issue has been drawn. The important vote will come in November, when the people of the United States will decide whether to reward knownothingism with another term or retire Mr. Ford.

JOBS LEGISLATION geared to full employment by the end of the decade and coupled with a mandate on the Administration to meet that goal may clear Congress as early as August, Clothing Workers Vice President Howard D. Samuel, center, predicted on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Michael Posner of the Reuter News Agency. The AFL-CIO public affairs program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcalls on Job Funds, Hatch Act Veto

Two key House votes on Apr. 29 are shown here.

Column I is the 206-177 vote that kept start-up funds for the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill in the budget resolution adopted by the House. Voting right (R) were 191 Democrats and 15 Republicans. Wrong votes (W) to delete the funds were cast by 114 Republicans and 63 Democrats. PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Column II is the 243-160 vote that fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to override President Ford's veto of Hatch Act amendments that would have given federal and postal workers the right to be politically active. Voting to override (R) were 221 Democrats and 22 Republicans. Supporting the veto (W) were 113 Republicans and 47 Democrats.

Economic Danger Signs:

U.S. Overseas Investments No Substitute for Lost Jobs

The United States could well be on its way toward becoming an investor or "rentier" economy, unless a reversal occurs in the alarming rate at which American industry is transferring its operations abroad.

This is the thrust of an article in the current issue of the American Federationist by Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers. The Federationist is the AFL-CIO's official monthly publication.

Tyler takes issue with devotees of the rentier system who reckon all is well with the world as long as the United States can live off its overseas investments.

What happens to the 20 million manufacturing workers now employed in American factories in a rentier system, Tyler wants to know. "Under the rentier system, workers lose and rentiers gain," he says. "Income is redistributed upward to those at the top."

Both the word and the concept of a "rentier" are foreign, Tyler notes. "It is drawn from the kind of leisure society described in British novels where the central character somehow manages to go through life without putting in a single day of work," he explains. "He makes it on his 'rentes,' on his investments."

Thus a rentier economy is one that lives on its investments. It does not depend primarily on making and selling things. U.S. direct investment abroad, mounting steadily since the end of World War II, is now yielding large dividend and interest returns to American corporations, Tyler observes.

By 1973, he notes, U.S. investments overseas amounted to more than $100 billion.

"Our net inflow of earnings on investments was $7.4 billion. Apparently, America is learning to live in the rentier fashion of the gentleman in the British novel," Tyler comments.

American multinational firms go overseas solely for one reason: to maximize their profits. Often a host country will entice U.S. investment by offering remission of income and other taxes; remission of import duties on materials and machinery used in producing goods for export; subsidies to new plant construction through low interest rates or government financing, and other goodies, Tyler observes.

In addition, American tax laws encourage overseas investments. Profits made overseas are not taxed unless and until they are repatriated to the U.S. The result, Tyler notes, is an outflow of capital to other lands—the financial basis for a rentier economy.

Loss of manufacturing and factory jobs is inherent in the rentier scheme of things, Tyler adds. Since the primary operation in a rentier economy is placing money abroad and then reaping returns from the investment, few workers are needed and the threat of a United States without factories becomes real.

Proponents of the rentier economy argue that the 20 million workers employed in manufacturing are only about one-quarter of the country's total labor force. If the other three-quarters expand, the argument runs, they will be able to absorb those who fall out of manufacturing jobs.

What these calculations omit, however, is the key and decisive role of manufacturing in making it possible for the other sectors of the economy to grow, Tyler points out.

A rentier economy would make the United States two nations: one living in gentlemanly leisure on its income from foreign investments and the other wallowing in unemployment and poverty, Tyler declares.

Like others, Tyler sees a parallel between this ruinous trend and economic developments in Great Britain.

Just a few months ago, Britain's then Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, told his ailing nation that the country's prime need today is manufacturing. Without industry, he said, the British economy can only go from bad to worse.

A great free trade advocate in the 19th Century, Britain was investing about half her national savings abroad by the end of the century.

Instead of putting more money into British manufacturing the movers of money began to pour funds into foreign industry. By World War I, Britain was investing 80 to 90 percent of her total capital formation abroad, and had turned from a manufacturing to a rentier economy.

The British economy felt the impact almost immediately, Tyler observes. Real wages declined slightly at first, then steeply. The downturn in trade became a tumble, so that "today the once bustling Britain is a dying economy.

"America has much to learn from the British tragedy," the author concludes.

Food Costs Boost Wholesale Prices

Rising prices in the agricultural sector of the economy lifted the government's wholesale price index by eight-tenths of 1 percent in April, the sharpest increase in six months.

Farm prices jumped 4.2 percent while the index for processed foods rose by 1.9 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Prices of agricultural-related items had declined during the first three months of the year.

Wholesale price changes eventually show up at the retail level, some within a few weeks.

Prices of non-food commodities advanced three-tenths of 1 percent over the month.

TRAINING INSTITUTE sponsored by Frontlash and the League for Industrial Democracy brings together 60 young trade unionists and political activists for six days of seminars and workshops in the West Virginia mountains. Jack Curran, legislative and political director of the Laborers, addresses one of the sessions. Seated near him is Chris Gersten, executive director of Frontlash.

Young Unionists Focus On Election Year Goals

High View, W. Va.—Voter education and registration efforts keyed to labor's election year goals and the Ford Administration's anti-worker economic policies were the focus of a six-day institute here sponsored by Frontlash and the League for Industrial Democracy.

Sixty young trade unionists and political activists heard several major speakers outline the labor movement's political aims and economic proposals in seminars and workshops.

The speakers included Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; Vice President William Winpisinger of the Machinists; Jack Curran, legislative and political director of the Laborers, and economist Leon Keyserling, President Truman's chief economic adviser.

Stressing the vital role of young political organizers, Slaiman predicted that 1976 "will see the maximum mobilization of our own political apparatus, with help from Frontlash and other groups."

Keyserling assailed the Nixon-Ford economic policies in fostering inflation and recession, calling for passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill as a key element for the nation's recovery.

Winpisinger pointed out that Ford's record of being "on the wrong side of all people issues" extends through his 25 years in Congress. He cited Ford's opposition to the Fair Employment Practices Act of 1950, the Civil Rights Act of 1965, Medicare and the Voting Rights Act of 1969.

Institute participants were briefed on the consumer boycott of Russel Stover candies by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the struggle of the Textile Workers Union of America to help organize J. P. Stevens & Co. workers throughout the South.

Frontlash was organized in 1968 to increase political participation of young workers and underrepresented segments of society. LID was founded in 1905 as an educational force for trade union, civil rights, student and cooperative groups.

Fight for GOP Nomination Heightens As Reagan Takes Lead in Delegates

Republicans were suddenly the ones facing the prospect of a convention fight in the wake of conservative challenger Ronald Reagan's four presidential primary victories in as many days.

Reagan's victories in Texas, Alabama, Georgia and—most distinctly—Indiana left President Ford in the unique position as an incumbent of actually trailing in the race for convention delegates.

Former California Gov. Reagan passed Ford in total delegates for the first time, 359 to 318. It will take 1,130 to win the GOP nominaiton in Kansas City in August.

Meanwhile, the Democratic primaries became as patterned as the Republican races were earlier, with former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter tacking on four more victories in five primaries to pass the 500 mark in delegates, roughly one-third of the 1,503 needed for the nomination. Carter won handily in Texas, Indiana, Georgia and the District of Columbia as Sen. Henry M. Jackson dropped active campaigning in the wake of Carter's victory in Pennsylvania and Rep. Morris Udall failed to qualify for the Indiana ballot.

Reagan, who lost the first three primaries he contested against Ford in February and March, triggered the reversal with a 98-0 sweep in the race for Texas delegates. Previously, Reagan had lost in New Hampshire, Florida, Illinois and Wisconsin, while not challenging in Vermont, Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania.

But in between, Reagan won one in North Carolina, giving birth to the "southern and western" strategy that prompted him to bow out of the final days of Wisconsin campaigning in favor of a national TV fund-raising appeal to gird for Texas, Georgia and Alabama.

He won the delegate races by 48-0 in Georgia and 31-0 in Alabama, adding to the Texas whitewash, but none was more important than his 45-9 domination of Ford in Indiana. Indiana is northern and industrial enough to give Reagan the kind of victory he couldn't get in Illinois and Wisconsin.

In both Texas and Indiana, a "crossover" vote from Democrats and independents was credited with aiding Reagan's victories. A CBS/New York Times survey in Indiana showed as much as one-third of the vote may have been from crossovers, with Reagan getting virtually all of the Democrats' votes and 60 percent of the independents.

Also in Indiana, Democratic Sen. Vance Hartke won a tight race for renomination, and the House lost its Rules Committee chairman as 84-year-old Ray Madden was defeated by State Sen. Adam Benjamin. Both Hartke and Madden were endorsed by COPE. Hartke defeated Rep. Philip H. Hayes in the primary and will face Republican Richard G. Lugar in November.

Lugar, the mayor of Indianapolis, ran unsuccessfully in 1974 against Indiana's other Democratic senator, Birch Bayh.

In Reagan's Indiana victory he garnered 51 percent of the presidential vote to 49 percent for Ford. There was no presidential preference voting in Texas or Alabama, and Reagan won 68 percent of the vote in Georgia.

The Republicans had no contest in D.C., where Carter won about six delegates to four for Udall. Carter was a runaway victor in his native Georgia, with 84 percent of the preferential vote and all 50 delegates. In Indiana Carter won 68 percent of the preferential vote and 48 delegates.

In Texas, Carter captured 89 delegates to just nine for the Texas favorite son, Sen. Lloyd Bentsen.

Only a homestate victory by Gov. George Wallace in Alabama kept Carter from a sweep. Wallace delegates appeared to have won 12 Alabama seats, but some of the other 15 were close enough to go into a runoff May 25. Eight at-large delegates will be selected later for a total of 35.

Carter's next tests among the Democrats will come from a variety of opponents—Udall and Idaho Sen. Frank Church in Nebraska May 11, Udall in Michigan May 18, and California Gov. Jerry Brown in Maryland, also May 18.

In Texas, Bentsen won renomination for his Senate seat and will face Rep. Alan Steelman in November. Texas COPE endorsed Bentsen and nine candidates for House seats, six of whom won.

Incumbent Democrats Charles Wilson, Bob Eckhardt, J. J. Pickle and Robert Kreuger all won, as did COPE-endorsed Jim Mattox for the seat left vacant by Steelman and Bob Gammage for the seat vacated earlier by Bob Casey. Mattox and Gammage are both Democrats.

In Indiana, Madden was the only COPE-endorsed congressional candidate to lose.

In Alabama, two COPE-endorsed House candidates won and one lost. Incumbent Tom Bevill won renomination and Bill Davenport won the right to oppose Republican Rep. Jack Edwards in November. Former Ironworker Ronnie Flippo will have the COPE endorsement in a runoff for the seat being vacated by the retirement of Robert E. Jones.

IUE Signs New Pact For On-Job Training

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers signed a new 15-month Labor Dept. contract for $610,271 to provide on-the-job training for 600 unemployed and underemployed persons.

At a contract signing ceremony, Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., congratulated IUE President Paul Jennings for the union's outstanding record in government-funded training programs.

Under several previous Labor Dept. contracts over a ten-year period the IUE has helped train about 6,000 workers. The IUE training program gives special emphasis to women, minority groups, the handicapped and Vietnam veterans.

Challenge Planned:

Food Stamp Slash To Hit 5 Million

The Agriculture Dept. announced that it will go ahead with proposed rules changes that would deprive more than 5 million persons of food stamps and force nearly 6 million others to pay more for their monthly allotment.

An immediate court challenge is being brought by a coalition that includes 56 international unions and is likely to at least delay the Administration's attempt to make most of its cutbacks effective June 1.

The AFL-CIO had filed detailed objections to the rules changes, but the Agriculture Dept. went ahead with its plans. AFL-CIO President George Meany, protesting the cutback threat when it was proposed in March, termed food stamps "the only alternatives to hunger" for millions of Americans.

Meany termed the attempt to gut the program through a change in regulations "particularly untimely" because Congress is in the midst of legislative action that is almost certain to take a different form than the Agriculture Dept. rules.

The Senate last month adopted a labor-endorsed bill that tightens eligibility requirements through income ceilings that would drop up to 1 million of the 18.7 million persons on the benefit rolls. But most of the savings would be plowed into improved benefits for the most needy households.

In direct rejection of the Administration approach, the Senate defeated by big margins all attempts to make meat-axe slashes in the program.

The House Agriculture Committee has held hearings, and is scheduled to start marking up a bill on May 10.

Apart from holding income ceilings close to the poverty level, the Agriculture Dept. proposals would require applicants to pay 30 percent of their income for their monthly allotment of stamps. Present requirements vary with income, but average about 24 percent.

Another of the department's new regulations is aimed at denying food stamps to the recently unemployed or those on strike. It would do this by computing an applicant's eligibility on his income for the preceding 90 days.

The Administration also wants to repeal portions of an existing rule that interprets a requirement that persons able to work must take any suitable job that is available. It backed down on some of its proposed changes in response to protests. But it still deletes a section allowing a recipient to turn down a job that would require him to quit a union or agree not to become a union member.

Jobless Rates Exceed 6% in 130 Key Areas substantial unemployment list in April while 21 were deleted.

There are now 1,252 areas—130 major and 1,122 smaller job centers—classified as areas of substantial or persistent unemployment, the Labor Dept. said.

Ten of the 130 major labor centers with 6 percent or more unemployment in April were classified as areas of persistent joblessness while 280 of the 1,122 smaller labor markets were so listed.

The highest jobless rates were concentrated in, but not confined, to the industrial states. Kenosha, Wis., for example, had a 17.7 percent rate while Stockton, Calif., had a rate of 13.3 percent.

The rate for Atlantic City, N.J., was 14.8 percent. Nearby Jersey City had a rate of 13.2 percent. In New Bedford, Mass., the rate was 13.5 percent; in Ponce, Puerto, Rico, 20.2 percent, and in Utica-Rome, N.Y., 12.2 percent.

Full Employment Bill Gains on 2 Fronts

ployment programs. Then it voted down by the 206-177 margin a motion by Rep. Ronald A. Sarasin (R-Conn.) to delete only the Humphrey-Hawkins bill funding. (Roll-call, Page 6.)

The Senate budget resolution was a less specific document, with funds for various jobs and economic stimulus programs lumped together. It will be up to a House-Senate conference committee whether to incorporate the more specific House version into the preliminary congressional budget target.

From labor's standpoint, both the House and Senate budget resolutions were too restrictive to generate the jobs needed to put America back to work—and generate revenue that would balance the budget without starving the nation's needs.

The House version projected spending totaling $415.4 billion, compared with $412.6 billion in the Senate version and President Ford's proposed $395.8 billion.

Although short of labor's goals, it included more funds than the Senate version for job programs, economic stimulus and health, education and social service programs.

In acting on the budget resolution, the House defeated motions to cut $2.2 billion in spending for jobs programs and to reduce food stamp outlays by $1.1 billion. It also refused to reduce defense spending targets, which were close to the Administration figures.

Apart from the House budget action, there were other indications of congressional willingness to move ahead with the full employment bill, despite the certainty of a presidential veto if Ford is President at the time it is passed.

The Senate Labor Committee's subcommittee on employment scheduled hearings for mid-May, with Humphrey as the leadoff witness. Parallel hearings will be held by the full Senate Banking Committee on portions of the bill dealing with the Federal Reserve.

The legislation would mandate the President, Congress and the Federal Reserve Board to develop a coordinated economic policy to bring unemployment down to 3 percent within four years of enactment. It would establish a national policy that the government would be the employer of last resort if the private sector can't produce jobs for people able and wanting to work.

During the House Labor Committee's consideration of the bill, a Republican opponent—Rep. Martin Esch of Michigan—said the bill wouldn't become law under "this President."

He suggested that "perhaps the real answer will come the first week in November," when the nation will elect a President and Congress.

The bill carries the same numerical designation in both the House and Senate—H.R. 50 in the House and S. 50 in the Senate. It is in the form of an amendment to the Employment Act of 1946, which established the Council of Economic Advisers and endorsed the concept of maximum employment, but without mandating procedures to achieve it.

Boycott Opens In Support of Rubber Union

"Our members at Ford, as in other sectors of our union, will stand in solidarity with rubber workers, and we extend to all Rubber Workers union members our complete backing," the resolution declared.

Negotiations with the Big Four concentrated on Firestone, the target company in the current round of talks with the industry, with little progress reported. Subjects for discussion in the Firestone talks in Cleveland included pension benefits and health care coverage.

Bommarito indicated that positions haven't changed. Among the union's major objectives are catch-up wage increases and an uncapped cost-of-living escalator provision.

Discussions also are taking place with Goodyear in Dayton, Goodrich in Columbus, Ohio, and Uniroyal in New York City, but attention is focused on the Cleveland talks. The strike has closed 47 plants operated by the Big Four. Some 65,000 production and maintenance workers are involved in the walkout.

The union severely criticized the companies for cutting off supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) to workers who had been laid off before the strike began on Apr. 1. SUB payments are now a strike issue, Bommarito said, adding that URW members will not return to work until Goodyear, Goodrich and Firestone agree to pay the benefits retroactively to the laid-off workers.

"I think it's ridiculous the way the companies are acting by cutting off the SUB payments to the poor guys who are laid off," Bommarito declared. In Akron alone, 600 Goodyear workers were affected, another 350 at Firestone and 335 at Goodrich.

Bommarito announced that a special convention of the union will take place on May 27 in Chicago for action on an additional dues assessment to beef up the URW strike benefit fund.

The meeting is the first special convention the union has called in its 40-year history.

Michael Moskow Named Labor Under Secretary

President Ford has nominated Michael H. Moskow, currently director of the Council on Wage & Price Stability, to serve as Under Secretary of Labor.

Moskow has served as an assistant secretary of two Cabinet departments—the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare before moving to the wage-price council, and the Dept. of Labor in 1972-73. He taught economics at Temple University before entering government service.

The under secretary post has been vacant since the resignation of Robert Aders in March.

In other Labor Dept. appointments:

John C. Read, who has been executive assistant to the Secretary of Labor since March 1975, has been appointed an Assistant Secretary of Labor. Read, a close associate of former Sec. John T. Dunlop, will head the department's Employment Standards Administration.

Assistant Sec. Bernard E. DeLury, who had held that spot, has been shifted to the post of Assistant Secretary for Labor-Management Relations, which was vacated by the recent resignation of Paul Fasser, Jr. DeLury, a former deputy state labor commissioner in New York, is a member of the Lathers.

A vacant post of deputy under secretary for international affairs was filled by the appointment of Herbert N. Blackman, an economist previously dealing with trade policies. He succeeds Edward B. Persons, who retired.

Honorary Degree Given Wurf by Southeastern

President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees was awarded an honorary doctor of humane letters degree by Southeastern University.

Southeastern President, Dr. Barkev Kibarian, bestowed the degree on Wurf at the university's 60th commencement in Washington.

States Found Lagging On Job-Injury Benefits

Some states have made limited progress in upgrading their workers' compensation laws, but not enough to warrant a further delay in adoption of federal standards, the former chairman of the defunct National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws told Congress.

John F. Burton, Jr., said that no improvement in state compliance with the commission's 19 "essential recommendations" has occurred between last July and January of this year.

"The lesson of the period since last July is that progress in state workers' compensation programs is not inevitable," Burton told a hearing of a House Labor subcommittee.

The commission's recommendations are used as a benchmark on how well the states are improving their workers' compensation laws. It disbanded after submitting its report to the President and Congress on July 31, 1972.

Opponents of a federal workers' compensation bill setting minimum benefit standards often point to efforts by the states to improve their laws as evidence that federal action in this field is unnecessary.

Burton said that an ad hoc committee, formed early last year to gauge states' progress in living up to the commission's 19 recommendations, showed the average state had fully complied with only 11 of them as of July 1, 1975. The average compliance score on Jan. 1, 1976 also was 11.

"Congress should now guarantee compliance with the essential recommendations of the national commission," Burton declared. However, he expressed opposition to the present form of a bill introduced by the subcommittee chairman, Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.), and submitted a plan of his own to establish minimum federal standards.

Burton's objections to the Daniels bill were similar to those of the AFL-CIO, which basically supports the measure but with some amendments.

Burton said he found particularly objectionable in the Daniels bill an enforcement provision directing states to treat the federal entitlements set by the bill as if they were provisions of the state workers' compensation law.

Budget Goal Set Above Ford Total

Congress set a tentative budget target that would result in higher spending, more revenue, lower unemployment and greater economic growth than called for in President Ford's economic prescription.

The congressional budget is programmed to generate about 1 million more jobs than the Administration formula for the fiscal year starting next October. But even that degree of progress would leave the nation still far from labor's full employment goal.

A House-Senate conference committee estimated that the unemployment rate would average 6.5 percent during the 1977 calendar year, even if Congress carried through with full funding. That would be a modest improvement over the 6.9 average percent jobless rate projected for 1977 in Ford's budget.

The congressional budget resolution, which cannot be vetoed, is not binding at this early stage in the budget-setting procedure. But by mid-September, before the start of the new October-to-October fiscal year, Congress must adopt a binding spending ceiling and revenue floor. Thereafter it could not consider any unbudgeted program or exceed the budget figures without a special resolution.

The first congressional budget resolution targets $413.3 billion in federal spending — including payouts from the social security trust fund and $100.8 billion in military outlays. It anticipates taking in $362.5 billion in revenue, of which $2 billion would come from a still unenacted tax reform package. The estimated deficit for the fiscal year is $50.8 billion.

By contrast, Ford has proposed spending $395.8 billion and estimated $351.3 billion in revenues, for a deficit of $44.5 billion.

In the job-creating area, public service employment would be increased to 600,000, nearly double the present level. By contrast, the Administration wants to phase out as no longer necessary a major public jobs program.

The congressional budget assumes about $1 billion for direct grants to local governments as part of a countercyclical program to overcome recession. It also funds an assortment of public works programs, including labor-intensive city and state projects that could be gotten quickly under way as soon as the money is appropriated.

The original House budget resolution specifically earmarked $50 million for start-up funds for full

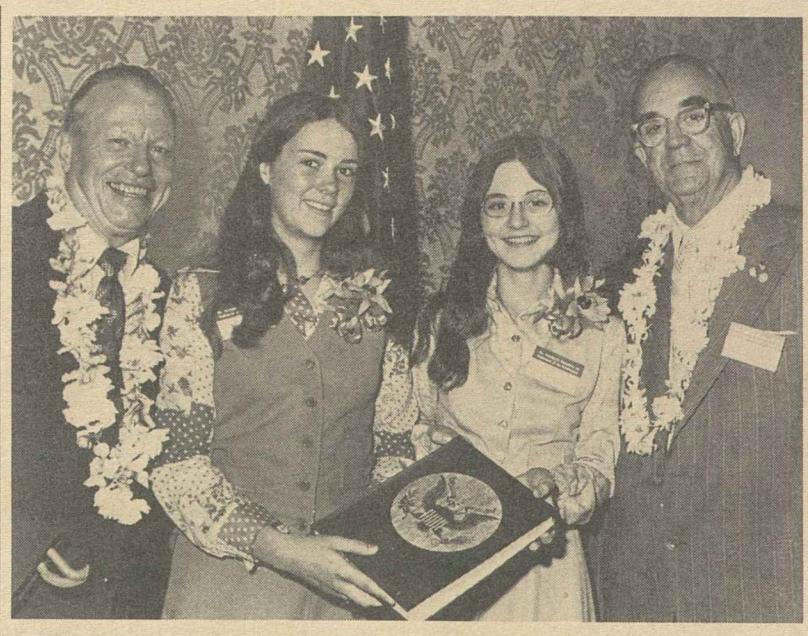
Nation's Job Toll Persists At High Recession Levels

Works Bill Approved By House

The House passed a job-creating $2.5 billion public works bill that was taken almost intact from the anti-recession measure that President Ford vetoed last February.

Other portions of the vetoed bill were incorporated in legislation the Senate passed last month, and a House-Senate conference committee will seek to reconcile the two measures.

While the total price tag of the anti-recession package is likely to be less than the $6 billion authorization in the vetoed bill, Administration opposition to both the Senate and House measures makes a new veto likely. The first time around, the House overrode the veto but the Senate failed by three votes to muster the needed two-thirds majority.



In the new attempt to enact job-creating legislation, the Senate passed its bill by a 54-28 margin and the House approved the public works measure, 339-57.

The House Public Works Committee estimated that its bill would create, directly and indirectly, 250,000 jobs through grants to state and local governments for construction and renovation projects that can put workers on the job site within 90 days of approval of the project.

During periods when the national unemployment rate is at least 6.5 percent, 70 percent of the funds would be earmarked for areas where the local unemployment rate exceeds the national average.

The Senate-passed bill would pro-

Meany Hits President's Optimism

By James M. Shevis

Joblessness throughout the nation continued at recession levels in April and, despite a pickup in employment, offered President Ford no basis for "election-year optimism" about the American economy, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned.

"America still has double-digit unemployment," Meany declared. "Our realistic analysis of the unemployment situation shows that more than 9.7 million people—one out of every 10 Americans—are out of work."

The nation's official jobless rate last month, as determined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, was 7.5 percent, the same as the month before. But the figure does not account for the number of persons who were too discouraged to look for work, or those who were forced to work part-time because full-time jobs were not available.

When these groups are counted in, the true unemployment rate last month was 10.2 percent, the AFL-CIO calculates.

"We are still wasting irreplaceable human resources and productive capacity," Meany said. "The economy is operating far below its full potential, with 28 percent of industrial capacity still lying idle."

Meany noted that employment in manufacturing and construction, the country's two key industries, is still 2 million below the pre-recession peak.

In addition, he observed, unemployment of black and Spanish-speaking workers is still much too high — 13 percent — while joblessness among teenage blacks is almost 40 percent.

Ford Signs Reluctantly:

New Election Law Ends Fund Freeze

By David L. Perlman

Presidential candidates will be able to collect long overdue federal matching funds, and employers won't have a free hand to dun their workers for political contributions.

After pondering for a week, President Ford finally signed into law the bill restructuring the Federal Election Commission and establishing campaign ground rules. But he ordered the Justice Dept. to challenge in the Supreme Court the constitutionality of a provision allowing the House or Senate to disapprove any general regulation issued by the election commission.

The new legislation imposes some new reporting burdens and restrictions on unions as well as other organizations that support candidates for federal office. But the AFL-CIO backed the measure, and conservative business groups sought a veto because of its parallel restrictions on corporation political funds.

Ford had wanted Congress merely to reform the commission as an Executive Branch agency, with its members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate as required by a Supreme Court decision. That would allow it to resume passing out matching funds in the primary campaigns — of which Ford has been the largest single beneficiary.

Instead, Congress adopted by big majorities a number of additional changes, including the following:

- Repeal of the controversial SUNPAC advisory opinion by the Federal Election Commission. That would have allowed a corporation to solicit political contributions from its rank-and-file workers and even set up a checkoff to collect the money.

Under the new law, a corporation can directly solicit only stockholders, salaried executives, higher-level supervisors and any professional employes who are not represented by a union.

Unions can as at present, seek voluntary political contributions

Senate Panel Scraps House Tax Reforms

The Senate Finance Committee is in the process of gutting a House-passed tax reform bill that the AFL-CIO had urged it to strengthen.

Unless its decisions are reversed when the bill reaches the Senate floor, the legislation will raise less than half of the $2 billion in revenue the budget resolution just adopted by Congress assumes will be raised through tax reform.

In decisions taken to date, the committee followed the lead of Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) and scrapped most of the sections of the House bill intended to curb the use of tax shelters. The House had sought to prevent investors—often doctors or other high-income professionals—from claiming large artificial losses from ventures into such fields as oil drilling, real estate and farming. These paper losses then wipe out most of the tax due on income from other sources.

The only meaningful tax reform thus far retained by the Senate panel, although in different form, is an increase in the minimum tax. The committee voted 10-0 to tighten the present law requiring persons with large amounts of tax-exempt income to pay a token tax on that amount. But its impact on the very wealthy would be less than the House bill.

Major Cities Scarred By High Unemployment

The high levels of unemployment that plagued the nation at the depths of the recession last year took a particularly heavy toll in the industrial cities and states, and only little improvement has since occurred, a Bureau of Labor Statistics report shows.

Newly published figures on labor forces and unemployment levels last year in 27 large states, 30 metropolitan areas and 11 large central cities reveal that Michigan and Detroit were hardest hit, with unemployment averaging 12.5 percent statewide and 13.1 percent for the city. In Detroit's central city area, it was even higher, 17.4 percent.

Among the states, BLS reported, joblessness last year exceeded 10 percent in Florida, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York and Oregon.

A month ago, BLS began publishing for the first time the jobless rates for all 50 states and some 200 metropolitan areas. Those figures showed little improvement over the 1975 average rates for states

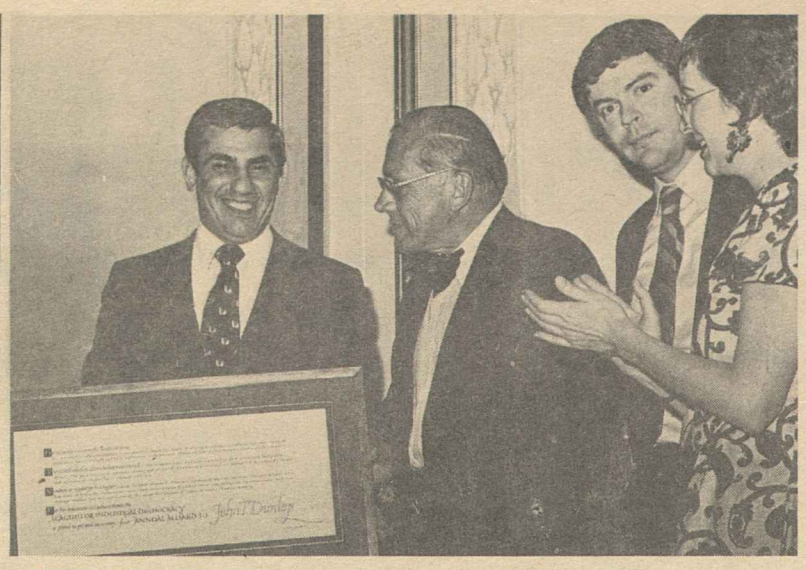
Income Taxes Confuse Even BLS Experts

You're not the only one who has trouble figuring your income taxes.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, calculating hypothetical family budgets for different lifestyles last fall, left out a personal tax exemption that was allowed by the federal government in 1975.



As a result, BLS's estimates—issued last month—were about $200 higher than they should have been.

Revised figures show the budget for maintaining an intermediate standard of living in the fall of 1975 was $15,318 rather than $15,479 as originally reported by the government.

The budget for maintaining a "higher" standard of living was revised downward from $22,476 to $22,294 while the cost of maintaining a "lower" living standard was placed at $9,588, compared with $9,838 reported initially.

BLS noted that the change in the federal income tax estimation procedure directly affected state income tax estimates in its budget compilations.

The revision resulted from discussions among those who prepared the figures over what taxes should be considered in compiling the family budgets. After the original estimates were released, it was decided that the 1975 personal tax exemption should have been included in last year's calculations.

ANNUAL AWARD of the League for Industrial Democracy is presented to former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop by President Robert A. Georgine, left, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Joining in the tribute are LID Board Chairman Tom Kahn and Executive Director Judy Bardacke.

LID Presents Awards To Dunlop and Keenan

New York—Former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop was honored with the League for Industrial Democracy's annual award and a special award was presented by the LID to Joseph D. Keenan, secretary-emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Robert Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., in presenting the league's annual award to Dunlop, said it was particularly important for the LID to honor an outstanding scholar and public servant who has done much to increase public understanding of the labor movement.

Bayard Rustin, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, presented Keenan with the special award recognizing his more than 50 years service to democratic trade unionism. Dunlop was cited for "the standard of excellence he has maintained in the academic field and as a public official." The award characterized him as "one of the great secretaries of labor in recent American history."

Dunlop, who has returned to the Harvard University faculty, responded with the declaration that "the labor movement with its flexibility in collective bargaining is the best mechanism to achieve industrial democracy and social justice."

He called for economic policies to reach "high, full, continuous, and stable employment" and stressed that job creation in the next twenty years would require more than fiscal and monetary manipulation.

The awards luncheon followed a morning conference session on "Big Government: How well does it serve the people?" Speakers for the conference were Ted VanDyk, director of issues and research in the 1972 McGovern campaign, and Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

VanDyk contended that the first priority of a Democratic administration should be the reorganization and re-examination of federal government social programs.

Slaiman argued that attacks on "big government" raise a false issue and, when made by liberals, make it difficult to mobilize support to turn the economy around. He stressed that vigorous government action is needed to meet the needs of minorities, the poor and working people.

The LID which marked its 71st anniversary at the award luncheon, conducts an extensive education program to acquaint young people with the values, history, and tradition of the labor movement.

2 Organizers Attacked At Furniture Factory

Dayton, Tenn.—Two organizers for the Furniture Workers were beaten by a company-led gang as they greeted workers at the La-Z-Boy Chair Co. plant here, UFWA President Carl Scarbrough charged.

The beatings occurred May 10 as the two organizers, Kenneth Thrash and Charles Campbell, waited outside the plant gate for workers on the first shift to emerge. The violence occurred just days before a representation election was scheduled to be held among the company's employes.

Dayton is largely dominated by the firm, the world's largest manufacturer of reclining chairs. When the two organizers sought help at the local hospital, they were met by the company's official doctor, and warrants for their arrest on assault and battery charges were served on them in the hospital's emergency room.

The UFWA said company representatives stationed near the plant gate were handing out anti-union leaflets to workers, some of whom gave them to Thrash and Campbell with comments such as, "Here's some more company bull."

A dispute arose when company leaders, including personnel manager Alan Kelley, ordered the workers not to turn over the leaflets to Thrash. A group of men, Kelley among them, jumped Thrash and, when Campbell tried to intervene, he too was knocked to the ground and beaten, the union said.

Suffering from fractured fingers, sore backs and stomachs, Campbell and Thrash have taken out warrants for the arrest of Kelley and Gary Keylon, a La-Z-Boy employe, the two men they said led the attack on them. Keylon is also chief of police in the nearby town of Graysville.

"This is a desperate effort by La-Z-Boy to stop union activity among its workers in this plant—and all its other unorganized plants," Scarbrough charged.

"La-Z-Boy treats its workers as though this were the 19th Century," he said, "and with this attack, they're trying to go back to the days before workers had any rights."

The company has been found guilty of numerous unfair practices by the National Labor Relations Board. The UFWA has been engaged in an organizing campaign at the Dayton plant for several months. Close to 500 workers are employed there.

Three La-Z-Boy plants—two in Monroe, Mich., and one in Florence, S.C.—are organized already, and UFWA is guiding campaigns at the rest of the chain's plants.

Coast Energy Battle Termed Critical to Jobs

All members of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters in California are being urged by their union to get involved in labor's campaign to defeat a state referendum that would prohibit the construction of nuclear plants in California.

Proposition 15, which will be put before California voters in the state's primary election June 8, would also bar the operation of existing nuclear plants at more than 60 percent of their licensed core level.

In a bulletin sent to the union's members throughout the state, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters President Martin J. Ward warned that approval of the proposition would have a direct bearing on their jobs, and even their children's job opportunities because of its impact on energy development.

Organized labor in California is in the forefront of the drive to defeat the proposition.

Plumbers Elect St. Eloi As Sixth Vice President

J. Russell St. Eloi has been elected to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters executive board as the sixth vice president.

St. Eloi, who will continue as director of Canadian affairs, fills a vacancy on the board created by the retirement of First Vice President G. C. Archambault.

Catch-Up Wage Boost Sought:

IUE Opens Talks With Westinghouse

Pittsburgh—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers opened national contract talks here with the Westinghouse Corp., emphasizing the need for catch-up wage hikes and full cost-of-living protection for its 21,000 members employed by the company.

"Maintaining a decent standard of living for Westinghouse workers and retirees is what these negotiations will be about," the IUE said in a statement at the outset of the talks.

"Inflation has robbed" Westinghouse workers and retirees of "any significant gains which the 1973 settlement brought them," the union declared. In fact, the IUE statement noted, inflation has "forced them to lower their living standards in many areas."

The union listed other areas in which it will be seeking improvements, cited the giant corporation's business recovery, and cautioned against hectic, last-minute negotiations.

The union's bargaining committee includes representatives of several other unions having contracts with Westinghouse. All are part of the 13-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee of General Electric and Westinghouse Unions.

IUE's contract with Westinghouse expires on July 11, as do many other pacts involving CBC unions. Other issues in the negotiations, besides wages and cost-of-living protection, include improved pensions for present and future retirees, union security, job security and layoff protection, a comprehensive dental program and other health insurance improvements, more paid time off, elimination of area wage differentials, contract language changes eliminating race and sex discrimination and job health and safety protections.

Leading the negotiating committee are IUE President Paul Jennings, Sec.-Treas. David J. Fitzmaurice, and Bob Nellis, chairman of the IUE-Westinghouse Conference Board. Jennings will be leaving his post on June 1, and will be succeeded by Fitzmaurice.

Negotiating committee members are elected by the conference board, which is made up of delegates from about 35 IUE local unions at Westinghouse.

IUE and other CBC unions also are negotiating contract renewals with General Electric in New York. AFL-CIO unions participating in the coordinated bargaining effort with GE and Westinghouse are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Firemen & Oilers, Carpenters, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the IUE. Unaffiliated unions taking part are the United Electrical Workers, Teamsters and Auto Workers.

with 10 percent or more unemployment.

Michigan's 1975 rate of 12.5 percent, for example, had dropped only to 11.7 percent by February. In Massachusetts, where the rate averaged 11.2 percent last year, the level in February was 10.6 percent.

In metropolitan labor market areas, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, Miami, New York City, Newark, N.J., San Diego and the San Francisco-Oakland area all had rates averaging 10 percent or more in 1975.

Joblessness among the 11 large central cities in the BLS survey ranged from a low of 4.9 percent in Dallas to Detroit's 17.4 percent.

Houston had the second lowest jobless rate, 5.3 percent. Dallas and Houston are in the heart of oil fields where employment has been steady in an energy-short economy despite the recession.

Cleveland's central city had a jobless rate of 11.5 percent in 1975. New York's central area had a rate of 10.6 percent and Baltimore and Milwaukee had rates of 10 percent in their central cities.

Meany Urges Pressure On Syria to Free Jews

AFL-CIO President George Meany has urged President Ford to exert U.S. influence on the government of Syria to end the persecution of 4,500 Syrian Jews and permit them to leave the country.

In a letter to the President, Meany cited the plight of the Jewish residents of Damascus, Aleppo and Kamishili, who constitute the last remaining Jewish community held as "hostages" in an Arab land. They are "kept in terror and isolated from open contact," he said.

Escapees report that the Jews are subject to discrimination in education and employment, are denied the right to travel inside Syria without police permission, face limitations on how they may sell or dispose of their property, and are treated as hostile, suspect and potentially disloyal.

The Syrian Jewish community has shrunk from 40,000 in 1948 to 4,500 today, fewer than a quarter of them of military age. While the vast majority seek only to be reunited with their families and friends in Syrian Jewish communities in Central, South and North America, Meany said Syria denies them the right to emigrate, contending that they may become part of an Israeli military strike force against Syria.

Syria has offered to consider permitting its Jews to leave provided the United States undertakes to restrict their movements, substituting American constraints for its own, Meany noted.

"It is our hope and strong desire," he wrote the President, "that the government of the United States will not join with that of any dictatorship to restrict the human rights of the citizens of any nation.

"I suggest diplomatic persuasion, coupled with the known material needs of the Syrian government, be fully used to impress upon the Chief of State and his factionalized ruling party the requirement of lifting this stigma from the Syrian nation," Meany said.

Crafts Return to Jobs:

Study Panel Weighs San Francisco Issues

San Francisco—Eighteen hundred city workers returned to their jobs this week as an 11-member joint study committee prepared to tackle the hotly-disputed issues in their 39-day strike.

The strike settlement gave the joint committee the task of recommending wages, hours, and other job conditions for striking city crafts for inclusion in the 1976-77 budget.

And, as a condition of returning to work, the strikers won the supervisors' agreement to withdraw two inimical propositions, submitted for reference by the board during the strike, from the June 8 primary election ballot.

Almost at the moment the strikers were returning to work, though, a taxpayer action temporarily halted withdrawal of the ballot propositions pending a midweek hearing. The action was said to be brought on behalf of several neighborhood organizations.

What gave the order a strange twist was that two members of the Board of Supervisors, including Board President Quentin Kopp, are strongly suspected of inspiring if not actually instigating the legal action against the board of which they are members.

Kopp had been the board spokesman throughout the strike and had taken an active part in whatever negotiations had taken place. He had been no less active in the negotiations leading to the settlement. The final proposals, in fact, were submitted to the striking unions over Kopp's signature and he signed the final settlement.

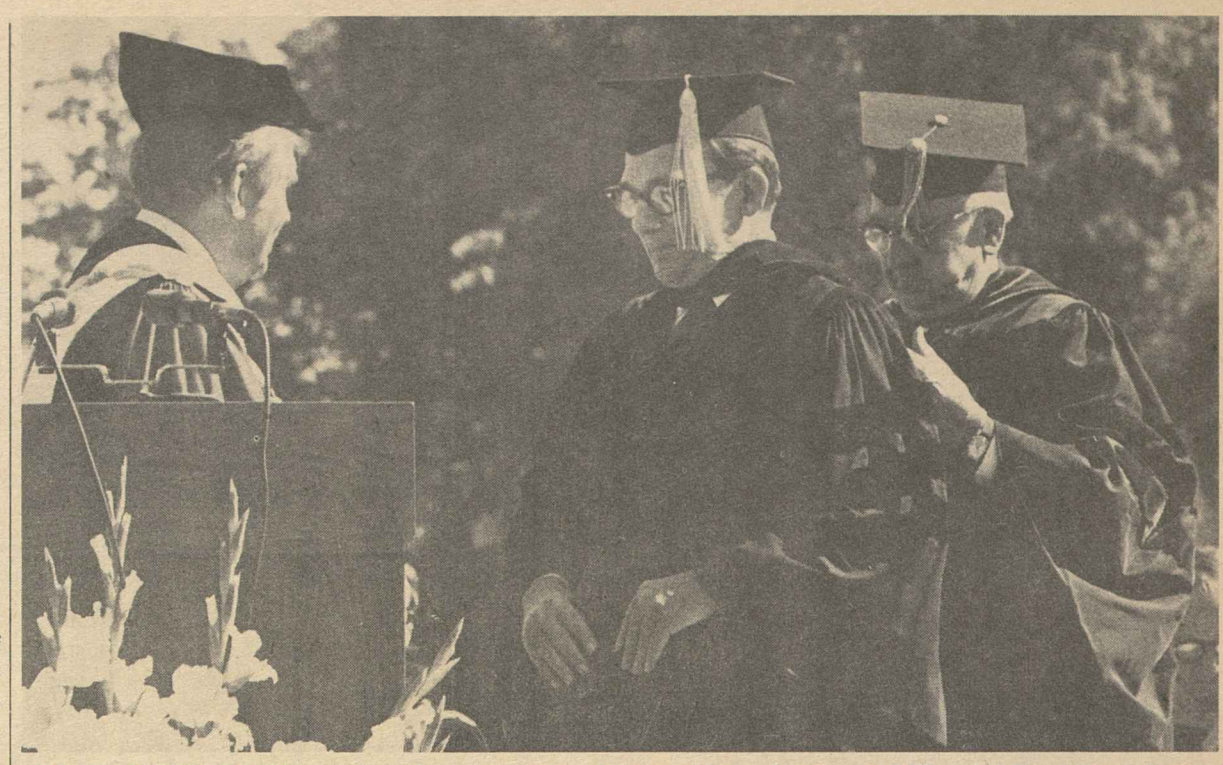
Then it developed that he had opposed withdrawing the propositions in the board's meeting. He had reportedly conferred with the lawyer who filed the suit, even while he was still negotiating the final strike settlement. His was one of two votes against the board's action taking the two measures off the ballot.

Labor Council Sec.-Treas. John F. Crowley described Kopp's action as "unconscionable." He said he had never encountered "a more reprehensible action in his experience."

One of the ballot propositions called for firing any city employe who went on strike. The other proposed to stretch the proposed pay cuts for the craft workers over a two-year period.

The strike settlement created a joint study committee composed of five members of the Board of Supervisors, five union representatives, and Mayor George Moscone. It sets up a tight calendar by which committee recommendations would be acted on in order to bring them into effect with the July 1 start of the new fiscal year.

The craft workers walked out Mar. 29 after the board had ignored a proposed settlement worked out by the unions with the board's negotiator and enacted its own pay proposals into a salary ordinance.



The ordinance, intended to become effective July 1, called for pay cuts ranging from $2,700 to $5,000 a year and more. The cuts averaged nearly $3,000 a year per worker.

The salary ordinance was used by the supervisors in an effort to foreclose discussions on economic issues. Subsequent spasmodic negotiations were carried out at arms-length, usually with the board negotiator while the board itself met in lonely caucus.

Crowley and other union leaders managed to spark renewed talks and the pattern of a fact finding or study committee emerged.

The bus drivers who operate the city's transit system and who have been respecting the craft workers picket lines voted to return to work if the two ballot propositions were withdrawn.

In addition to the bus drivers, a large but still untallied number of employes—auto mechanics, janitors, engineers, social workers, hospital workers and others—returned to their jobs once the picket lines were pulled down.

DUKE UNIVERSITY conferred an honorary doctor of laws degree on AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland as "one of the ablest leaders" of organized labor and for his "considerable service" in social, economic, cultural and academic causes. The citation noted that his efforts have "benefitted directly" millions of Americans. Reading the citation at left is Duke University President Terry Sanford while Dr. Frank T. Devyver of Duke adjusts the mantle.

Automakers Feel Pinch Of Rubber Union Strike

Akron, O.—Negotiations between the Rubber Workers and the Big Four tiremakers proceeded at a snail's pace but the union's four-week-old strike was beginning to have an effect on the auto industry.

Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. announced that to keep their production lines running at the current rate, they are leaving out the spare tire on many cars. General Motors said it had begun to substitute spares "of different brand name and slightly different tread design" than those on the wheels of some new cars.

Ford's vice president for manufacturing, Donald Bastian, said the URW strike, coupled with substantial increases in first-quarter schedules, had reduced the company's stockpile of tires for certain car and truck lines.

Meanwhile, talks with Firestone—the focal point of the union's bargaining with the industry—centered chiefly on cost-of-living protection and pension improvements. Some agreement was reported on contract language for supplemental worker's compensation and supplemental unemployment benefits.

Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito said he was pleased with the week-old consumer boycott of Firestone products, adding that support for the action was increasing.

Bommarito noted that the boycott has been limited to 16 brand-name tires produced by Firestone "to concentrate the boycott effort against the most easily recognizable brands as well as to increase boycott activity in high-volume areas."

The brands now under boycott are Firestone, Atlas, Caravelle, CBI, Coast-to-Coast, Cordovan, Falcon, Fruehauf, Getty, Lancer, Multi-Mile, O.K. Tires, Shell, Triumph, Union 76 and Montgomery Ward.

The Rubber Workers struck Firestone, Goodyear, Goodrich and Uniroyal on Apr. 21 after contract renewal talks broke down.

The union's master contract with General Tire & Rubber Co. covering some 2,800 workers in Akron and Waco, Tex., was scheduled to expire on May 15.

Crafts Defend Performance On Minorities

Construction unions are "proud" of their record in opening up job opportunities for blacks and other minorities, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said.

Georgine took sharp exception to a report by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights alleging that minority workers and women still face discrimination in "referral unions," that help place members in jobs, and specifically in building construction and over-the-road trucking.

The BCTD will respond to the 291-page report in greater detail at a later date, Georgine said. But he termed its assertions "totally inaccurate."

Blacks make up 19 percent of all apprentices in the building trades unions, Georgine said, a ratio that exceeds both the percentage of blacks in the United States population and the record of any other industry with apprenticeship programs.

Because of 23 months of double-digit unemployment in the construction industry, Georgine noted, there are both "black and white apprentices who have served their full apprenticeship but have yet to put in time on a job."

But "under the circumstances," he said, "we are proud of our record and defy any industry in the nation, union or non-union to match it."

The Civil Rights Commission, which has no enforcement mission under the Civil Rights Act, was critical of the construction industry affirmative action programs developed under Labor Dept. supervision and said the progress made by Apprenticeship Outreach programs in qualifying minorities for apprenticeship was marred by high dropout rates.

Its claims of discrimination rested largely on statistics that it said showed that "minorities and women are underrepresented in the highest-paying job categories in the building trades and trucking industries."

The commission said it is "aware of the commitment of prominent union leaders to the principle of equal opportunity for all Americans" and the AFL-CIO's support for legislation and programs to eradicate discrimination. But it claimed that "institutional practices" of local unions have limited progress.

New Public Works Bill Wins House Approval

vide only $1.1 billion for accelerated public works at present unemployment levels, less than half the amount of the House bill. But the price tag of the Senate bill would rise to nearly $4 billion through additional programs, including "countercyclical" grants to help cities and states maintain services during recession-level unemployment, and expanded funds for water pollution control programs.

At issue in the congressional-Administration confrontation is whether the slow pace of economic recovery is satisfactory to the nation.

The White House has made clear its view that the recession is over. The House committee report on the public works bill said bluntly: "It is obvious that the crisis is far from over."

In other congressional developments:

- The House Labor Committee approved a bill to transfer all federal regulation of mine safety and health from the Interior Dept. to the Labor Dept. The measure is opposed by the Administration but supported by the Mine Workers and the Steelworkers, the principal unions whose members would be affected.

- The Senate Labor Committee approved a bill that would extend the emergency public service program through the 1977 fiscal year—until Sept. 30, 1977. The program is authorized by Title 6 of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.

The House on Apr. 30 had passed a stop-gap measure that would have assured the program's continuance through Sept. 30, 1976. President Ford wants to phase out the program, which now funds jobs for about 265,000 people, but Congress is considered certain to insist on its continuance.

- The House approved a pair of widely supported bills extending vocational education and higher education programs. Funding will have to be dealt with in separate appropriations legislation.

- A bill initiating a series of experimental programs by government agencies in flexible work schedules for employes won House approval. Where the test programs are undertaken, workers would be able to choose to work longer or shorter hours within a specified range. Where a union holds bargaining rights, a flexible schedule could be adopted only by agreement with the union. However, the House bill would suspend the requirement of overtime pay after eight hours in a day for establishments on a flexible workweek and the House rejected an amendment that would have authorized negotiated overtime pay provisions in such cases.

Steelworkers Chosen At New Copper Plant

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers have been certified by the National Labor Relations Board as bargaining agent for workers at a new copper-refining plant of ASARCO, Inc., in Amarillo, Tex.

The vote at the Amarillo plant was 367 to 5 in favor of Steelworkers representation. The plant is expected eventually to employ 800 workers.

CWA Leader George E. Gill Dies at 62

George E. Gill, an executive vice president of the Communications Workers since 1967, died May 6 in Arlington, Va., Hospital. Gill, 62, suffered a heart attack a week earlier.

The CWA executive board elected Richard W. Hackler, assistant to the union's president for the past five years, to succeed Gill.

Gill had been active in the CWA and its predecessor, the National Federation of Telephone Workers, since the early 1930s. He served as the union's chief negotiator with Southern Bell and was a vigorous union organizer for many years.

Gill also served as director of the CWA's nine-state southern district and as a union vice president for 12 years before being elevated to executive vice president.

In a message to his wife, Marjorie, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland praised him for serving "his union and the entire labor movement with honor and distinction."

Besides his wife, survivors include a son, a daughter and two grandchildren. Services and burial were in Gill's native Montgomery, Ala.

Hackler, 50, has been active in the CWA since 1946 and served as a vice president of the union before his appointment as assistant to the president in 1970.

Labor and the Handicapped

LABOR'S LONG-TERM, historical goal is to create a society in which nobody is left out or forgotten, in which everybody has the right and opportunity and the encouragement he needs to develop his full potential in every direction.

We believe that everybody has a right to complete and total health care, a right to the very best possible preventative, diagnostic, therapeutic and rehabilitative services that can be provided, and we are fighting for a National Health Security program that will deliver just that.

We believe that everybody has a right to make a contribution to his society, a right to do a job worth doing and to earn a wage that makes it possible for him to pay his own way and to take care of his family in decent comfort.

In our view, these are not just a matter of individual rights and needs; we believe they are essential to America's survival and growth as a nation. If this country is going to live up to her promise of liberty and justice for all, if she is going to become the healthy, productive, creative society she was meant to be, America cannot afford to have second-class citizens. And right now she has far too many.

There are other handicaps besides physical and mental ones. Discrimination because of sex or race or color or ethnic origin is just as disabling. Poverty is disabling. Lack of education and training is disabling.

WE IN LABOR are pledged to fight against discrimination wherever we find it and to support every program that is needed to give every human being a fair chance to share equally in all aspects of life.

So we are fighting in Congress right now to increase appropriations for training and rehabilitating handicapped workers. Through our national, state and local organizations we are working closely with both public and voluntary organizations to develop the resources needed to do a good job of rehabilitation and job placement. We are informing union leaders and members about programs to train and employ the handicapped workers. We are working with our employers to encourage them to accept and support such programs, and we are working to overcome what prejudice remains in the workshop and to secure acceptance of handicapped people among their fellow workers.

But if these programs are to succeed in bringing handicapped workers into the mainstream of the nation's economic life, where they belong, America has to overcome what is in many ways the most crippling handicap of all: unemployment.

Unless there are jobs for everyone who is able and willing to work, the problems of rehabilitation will never be fully solved and there will be only partial solutions to the problems of the handicapped.

But until that goal is achieved, the AFL-CIO is convinced that no group has a greater claim to support and sympathy than the disabled.

That is why we will continue to work with all the allies we can find to bring dignity, self respect, opportunity and hope to the disabled.

—From an address by AFL-CIO Vice President Hunter P. Wharton during the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Television Gets a Failing Grade For Distorted History Lessons

By John P. Roche

A YEAR OR SO AGO I criticized the networks for not employing the superb educational potential of television to tell the current history-less generation something of the American past. This is a special concern of mine; having taught history to undergraduates and graduates for over a quarter of a century, I have many times contemplated suicide. (The most recent trauma occurred when the Public Broadcasting System launched the last "Upstairs, Downstairs" series, set during World War I, and a student in all innocence asked me if that was the war I was in.)

I suppose I have to blame myself for anything I said that may have contributed to television's consequent foray into historical programming. Admittedly, PBS did a splendid job with "The Adams Chronicles," and ABC produced the engrossing "Missiles of October," a meticulously accurate account of the 1962 Cuban missile crisis.

But then NBC picked up the ball, and it has since been rolling downhill. I was never a fan of General of the Armies Douglas MacArthur, but NBC's narrative of the "Truman-MacArthur Controversy" distorted the record in a number of unforgiveable ways.

For one thing, Truman fired his Far Eastern viceroy for the wrong reason. MacArthur should have been cashiered for military incompetence in Korea: After the coup at the Inchon landing, he went on an ego trip, divided his forces, and sent them north into a winter war. (Gen. Walton Walker of the 8th Army protested that his equipment was not winterized and his men lacked winter clothing. MacArthur ignored him.)

Moreover, because he was sure the Chinese Communists would not enter the war, MacArthur refused to hear any evidence to the contrary. (When a friend of mine brought in some Chinese prisoners, he was informed they couldn't be Chinese because the Chinese would not dare come in!) The result? Some 350,000 Chinese troops infiltrated between the two wings of MacArthur's forces.

Conversely, the program did not point out that MacArthur, as UN commander, was getting different instructions from Washington and Turtle Bay. While the Joint Chiefs were urging caution, the UN General Assembly, in the flush of victory after Inchon, called on MacArthur (Oct. 7, 1950) to take "all appropriate steps" to liberate North Korea. MacArthur, in short, was not without justification in heading for the Yalu River.

Finally, he did not keep Truman waiting in a hot plane at Wake Island for two hours before greeting him—and the President pulled a fast one by "accidentally" having a hidden stenographer taking down their private discussion.

BUT THE ERRORS of the Truman-MacArthur documentary fade into insignificance when compared with NBC's more recent "Truman at Potsdam." Within 20 minutes I was convinced it was a made-in-Moscow TV special on the origins of the Cold War. I simply could not believe what I saw and heard.

Indeed, except for my wife's corroboration, it could have been a dream. Not having tape-recorded it, and still wondering if after almost 30 years of marriage we were sharing dreams, I finally extracted a copy of the script from NBC. In a phrase it was a despicable historical distortion.

President Truman, we are to believe, went to the Potsdam meeting in July 1945, comrades, with two objectives in mind. The first was to prevent the Soviets from entering the war with Japan because we were convinced we could win it alone and we did not want the Russians picking up any strategic real estate. The second was to terrify Stalin with the existence of the atom bomb (which he knew about from espionage) and make it clear to him that we were going to run the world.

Churchill's intention was simple and malevolent: He wanted to destroy the amity that previously existed between Stalin and FDR.

Space prohibits a detailed flensing of this script. Suffice it to say that it is the reductio ad absurdum of the revisionist thesis that we started the Cold War by being mean to innocent, barefoot Joseph Stalin. As the Duke of Wellington observed to someone who addressed him as "Mr. Smith," "If you can believe that sir, you can believe anything."

OK, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa: Networks —stick to soap operas.

Bayard Rustin Says:

Struggle for Social Justice Key to R-T-W Repeal Fight

SOME STRUGGLES for social justice take place in the glare of national publicity and widespread public concern. Others of no less significance are seemingly shrouded in silence. One of the most important and most promising campaigns for social justice is currently under way in Arkansas. Although it is not the kind of struggle that is well geared to headlines, it is important because of its potentially large impact on American society and because the issues involved are often misunderstood.

The Arkansas AFL-CIO and other concerned citizens of that state have mounted a campaign to repeal the state's "right-to-work" law. While it might seem surprising that the labor movement is fighting right-to-work laws, it is not strange at all for the laws are one of history's worst violators of truth-in-labeling.

These laws, despite the propaganda of business groups, don't guarantee anybody jobs. The only rights they provide are the rights of employers to pay lower wages, provide poorer working conditions, and to exploit workers. Defended as protecting the right of individuals to work without being compelled to join a union, what the right-to-work laws in fact do is institute a compulsory open shop. They are designed to weaken strong unions, destroy weak unions, and prevent unorganized workers from forming a union.

A union that wins certification as the bargaining agent of the majority of workers must, under U.S. law, represent all the workers in the bargaining unit. Thus, in a right-to-work state, unions must represent all workers without receiving dues from all the employes they represent. Some workers receive the benefits of the union without paying their fair share.

There is nothing undemocratic about the union shop when a majority votes to be represented by a union and the union negotiates with management a contract that requires all workers to join the union. Repeal of the right-to-work law in Arkansas and the other 18 states which have it on their statute books would allow freedom of choice for employer and union to agree on the most sensible rules for the plant in which they have a common working interest.

It has been argued that right-to-work laws aid the economic development of poorer states like Arkansas. But when the facts are examined there doesn't seem to be much of a case. In 1947, hourly wages in Arkansas were 57 cents below the national average. Today they are over $1 below the national average. The same is true for income. In 1948 per capita income in Arkansas was $555 below the national average, by 1973 it had fallen $1,238 behind the national average. A former counsel to the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board explained this regression by pointing out that " 'right-to-work' law states have not received more than their proportionate share of new industry."

Rather than stimulating economic growth, the right-to-work laws are used as inducements for companies that can make money off a large defenseless pool of unskilled labor and that can profit from the perpetuation of this backwardness.

Thirty years of right-to-work laws have done little for states like Arkansas except keep them among the poor states in the nation in wages, per capita income, social legislation, and economic advancement.

THE RIGHT-TO-WORK LAWS also have been an instrument to perpetuate the informal system of racism in the United States. Dr. Vivian Henderson found that between 1950 and 1960 in only one of the southern "right-to-work" states did the earnings of Negro male workers gain in relation to those of white male workers. In the other 10 states, not only did the dollar gap increase, but blacks also lost percentage ground.

The reactionary character of the right-to-work laws is apparent from the fact that most of the right-to-work states are in the South. The strongest supporters of these laws, moreover, have, by and large, been opposed to every social and economic reform that would benefit blacks.

If the right-to-work provision is removed Arkansas workers will win a greater degree of equality in dealing with management. They will have a more effective voice in determining wages and working conditions. Moreover, in the process of gaining 100,000 petition signatures and fighting the election battle, a strong and durable coalition between labor and blacks will be forged in Arkansas that will have long range political impact. Finally, if the campaign to repeal right-to-work is successful in Arkansas it will set an example for the other 18 states that still retain this backward and regressive measure.

The effort to remove the right-to-work limitation of free collective bargaining in Arkansas is a little noticed struggle for social justice that could reshape American society in a more decent and humane fashion.

Revised Legislation in Works To Clear Obstacles for HMOs

PREPAID GROUP PRACTICE health maintenance organizations will get a badly needed boost from legislation expected to clear Congress soon, Director Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said.

Amendments to make the HMO Act of 1973 more realistic have already cleared the House and are expected to go to the Senate floor within the next few weeks, Seidman said. He said that while the original legislation was well-intentioned, some of the requirements have proved impractical, made it difficult for new HMOs to organize and slowed the expansion of existing groups.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman said one of the major problems created by the law is requiring HMOs to admit any applicant for membership during a 30-day open period every year, "no matter how sick they are at the time." He pointed out that since private insurance companies have no such mandate for their fee-for-service type health plans, HMOs are put into a very non-competitive position.

Seidman said that giving the HMOs more flexibility in spelling out the services offered and defining admission-to-membership policies will remove the biggest obstacles to the growth and development of HMOs, which are geared to the kind of preventive care and diagnostic services that make earlier treatment of disease or disorder more likely than in the fee-for-service care.

Comprehensive HMO programs result in a higher quality of care at lower cost, and avoid "unnecessary services, unnecessary hospitalization, unnecessary surgery," Seidman said. He pointed out that "the rate of hospitalization in HMOs is only half or less of what it is in the traditional fee-for-service" medical plans offered by the insurance industry.

Encouragement of HMOs, he said, is a logical and solid prelude to national health insurance. "HMOs are just the kind of medical care which will help to keep down the cost of care, which will provide the services that the Health Security bill calls for," he added.

Seidman was questioned by Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Dale McFeatters, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

FORTY YEARS AGO, when the National Labor Relations Act became law, Mine Workers President John L. Lewis sent his organizers into the coalfields to tell the nation's miners: "The President wants you to join the union!"

Lewis was stretching the truth a bit—FDR was making no such demand—but the fact that Lewis's highly successful organizing gambit went unchallenged underscored the acceptance of the NLRA as an equalizer between labor and management.

Times have changed, however, and the present attitude toward union organizing could well justify the president of the National Association of Manufacturers today barnstorming through the country yelling: "The government wants you to stay out of the union!"

The once highly touted NLRA has been amended to meet employer objections. These changes and the administration of the law by the National Labor Relations Board have created a situation where the law no longer serves as an equalizer between labor and management. In fact, the law is now often relied on to prevent or hinder union organization.

The Labor-Management subcommittee of the House Labor Committee recently wound up nearly a year of oversight hearings on the NLRA. The subcommittee took testimony from more than 50 witnesses in Washington, D.C., and in California from July 1975 to May 1976. The panel came away with the view, in the words of Chairman Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), that "the machinery is not working."

Thompson said the subcommittee heard "horror stories" and his description seems apt. In one case, a J. P. Stevens employe broke down in tears as he described how he had been fired for union activity and then blacklisted in his home town. He appeared before the subcommittee in a borrowed suit.

A new name also has been added to the roster of infamous anti-union firms. The Steelworkers described their battle with the Florida Steel Corp., in which the NLRB has issued 15 separate unfair labor practice complaints against the company since 1973. Nine of the cases have reached the board in Washington and in each case the board has found the company guilty of violating the act. But, despite the board's findings, the illegal activities go unremedied.

THE THOMPSON SUBCOMMITTEE is hoping to put some teeth into the law. Among the proposals it is considering:

- Discharge cases would be acted on immediately. The losing party could request a board review, but the board would have the right to refuse the review.
- If a losing party in a case is unhappy with a board order, it must file a court appeal within 30 days. If it does not do this, the board would file its order with the court and the court would approve it unless objections were filed within 15 days.
- Under the NLRA, employers now can seek injunctions against unions on charges of unfair labor practices, but the unions cannot do the same. The changes being considered by the Thompson subcommittee would eliminate this inequity.
- The law would call for triple damages, plus the cost of the suit and attorney fees, against an employer found to have illegally discharged a worker for union activities.
- The law would give the board power to impose a fair bargaining package on an employer who is found to have bargained in bad faith.
- Flagrant and repeated transgressors of the law would be denied the privilege of bidding for government contracts for a period of three years.
- The employer's right to veto a checkoff would be eliminated.

Staff members say the subcommittee will take the best, most feasible of these points and merge them into a single piece of legislation.

VITALLY NEEDED boost for group practice health maintenance organizations is expected to clear Congress shortly, correcting shortcomings of the HMO Act passed three years ago, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Vote on Override of Child Care Veto

The House on May 4 voted 301-101 to override President Ford's veto of funds to help child care centers for low-income working mothers meet federal standards of staffing and safety. The override attempt succeeded in the House, but failed in the Senate.

Right votes (R) to override were cast by 243 Democrats and 58 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 77 Republicans and 24 Democrats.

Ford's Optimism Scored:

Jobless Rate Hangs At Recession Level

Meany also noted that the Labor Dept. still lists 130 of 150 major labor centers and 1,252 smaller ones as areas of substantial or persistent unemployment. A sharp rise in wholesale prices in April also gave evidence that inflation has not been licked, he said.

"With all these disturbing factors, how can the President pretend in his political speeches that he has solved America's economic problems?" Meany asked.

BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin, in an appearance before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, noted that, while industrial production and retail sales have picked up over the past year, unemployment has recovered only 30 percent of its recession decline.

While the number of jobholders rose by 707,000 in April to a new high of 87,399,000, the labor force increased by 720,000 to 94,439,000, BLS reported. As a result, the jobless rate remained at 7.5 percent, with 7,040,000 jobseekers without work.

Besides the 7 million persons officially unemployed, there were 3.2 million workers in nonfarm jobs who were employed part-time involuntarily because they could not find full-time jobs, BLS said. Close to a million persons are classified as "discouraged" workers.

Nonfarm payroll employment, as measured by the government's monthly survey of business establishments, rose by 340,000 to 78.9 million in April, also a new high, BLS said. As in most earlier months of the recovery, the bulk of the over-the-month increase occurred in the service-producing sector.

An increase of 30,000 jobs in the contract-construction industry was reported. But, at 3,385,000, the level of employment was still 56,000 below what it was a year earlier. The official jobless rate among construction workers last month was more than twice the national average: 15.3 percent.

As the country entered into its prime growing season, agricultural employment increased sharply — 238,000 to 3,417,000 in April, BLS said. Employment in manufacturing rose by 100,000, primarily in durable goods.

The jobless rates for various groups of workers showed little change over the month, except for blacks whose rate jumped from 12.5 to 13 percent. The rate for teenagers increased from 19.1 to 19.2 percent. For adult men, the rate fell from 5.6 to 5.4 percent while the rate for adult women remained unchanged at 7.3 percent.

White workers had a jobless rate of 6.7 percent, down from 6.8 percent in March. The rates for household heads and married men each fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 4.8 and 3.9 percent, respectively.

Senate Override Vote On Child Care Bill Veto

The Senate on May 5 voted 60-34 in favor of overriding President Ford's veto of funds to help child day care centers meet federal standards. The labor-supported effort to override the veto fell short of the required two-thirds majority.

Candidates in Key Tests After Splitting Victories

Mixed results from three states enhanced the importance of the remaining presidential primaries of May as both Democrats and Republicans were left with "uncommitted" holding firm to second place.

President Gerald Ford lost another key test when former California Gov. Ronald Reagan won in Nebraska. But Ford won handily in West Virginia, breaking Reagan's string of five straight victories since May 1.

Democratic leader Jimmy Carter of Georgia also lost in Nebraska, finishing 1 percentage point behind newcomer Sen. Frank Church of Idaho. But Carter, too, had a victory, edging Rep. Morris Udall in Connecticut.

The three-state balloting carried the primaries past the halfway mark, with 17 completed and 14 to come in the final four weeks.

In the Ford-Reagan contest, Michigan is next. As Ford's home state and an industrial area, it offers Ford his next chance to break the momentum built by Reagan in Texas, Alabama, Georgia, Indiana and Nebraska.

For the Democrats, Michigan also increased in importance, as did the contest in Maryland the same day. Carter will face primarily Udall in Michigan, but another newcomer, Gov. Jerry Brown of California, in Maryland, both on May 18.

Michigan will mark Carter's first primary with endorsement by the top leadership of the Auto Workers. Brown has gathered several labor endorsements in his Maryland effort.

After Reagan took 55 percent of the votes in Nebraska, Ford's campaign manager said a loss to Reagan in Michigan would probably mean the end of Ford's chances at a first ballot victory at the Kansas City convention.

Michigan will also permit "crossovers" by Democrats to vote in the Republican primary if they choose, a practice credited with helping Reagan's victories in Texas and Indiana but not allowed in Nebraska.

Carter, the only Democrat who has had the kind of momentum needed to sew up the nomination before the July convention in New York City, got 38 percent of the vote to Church's 39 percent in Nebraska.

The voting in Connecticut was run by the Democratic party, not the state election authority, and consisted of "town meeting" voting for delegates to a later state convention. Carter's delegates won 33 percent of the vote to Udall's 31 percent, with 18 percent going to those pledged to Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington.

In West Virginia, favorite son Sen. Robert Byrd won 89 percent of the presidential preference voting in the Democratic primary to 11 percent for Wallace. On the GOP side, Ford got 57 percent of the vote to 43 percent for Reagan. Neither campaigned in the state. Wallace was the only Democrat to contest Byrd, making it the first of the 17 primaries thus far in which Carter was not on the ballot in some fashion. Carter's split left him with victories in 12 of the 16 primaries he has entered.

By winning eight delegates to Church's 15 in Nebraska and 18 in Connecticut to Udall's 16, Carter ran his delegate total to about 600. When projections are made off early steps in the caucus states, Jackson and Udall each have just over 200 delegates and Wallace about 150.

But 500 Democratic delegates are still classified as "uncommitted" and another 178 are pledged to such candidates as Byrd of West Virginia or Sen. Adlai Stevenson of Illinois. It takes 1,053 to nominate.

Reagan still holds the lead in delegates over Ford, 427 to 362, with 395 GOP delegates listed as uncommitted. Reagan picked up 18 votes to 7 for Ford in Nebraska while West Virginia's 28 delegates ran as uncommitted.

Officially, West Virginia's 33 delegates are also uncommitted rather than pledged to Byrd, since state law forbids binding for even one convention ballot.

In West Virginia, Democrats also nominated John D. Rockefeller IV for governor. He beat labor-endorsed James M. Sprouse and Rep. Ken Hechler in the primary and will oppose Republican Cecil Underwood, a former governor, in November.

Byrd was renominated for the Senate without opposition. Three House members, Democrats Robert H. Mollohan, Harley O. Staggers and John Slack were renominated with labor backing, but COPE-endorsed Dan Burleson lost the Democratic nomination to Nick Joe Rahall for the seat being vacated by Hechler.

State COPE made no endorsements in Nebraska.

Tax Reforms Scuttled by Senate Panel

"It's about the best we could hope to achieve at this time," Long said. "I don't think you are going to get to heaven in just one leap."

The minimum tax issue was spotlighted early this month by an Internal Revenue Service report that 244 persons with incomes over $200,000 paid no federal tax last year. In the group were five tax avoiders with incomes over $1 million.

Those who escaped taxes presumably had discovered loopholes in a 1969 law that first established a minimum income tax.

In testimony before the Senate committee last month, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller had termed the measure the House passed last winter "a modest step in the right direction." He urged the Senate to strengthen it and thus "make a significant contribution to tax justice."

The House-passed bill included an extension through 1976 of the tax cut enacted last year which helped halt the economy's downslide. The AFL-CIO has urged that it be extended through the 1977 calendar year to avoid precipitating a new recession through a sharp cut in take-home pay.

Congress last December enacted a compromise six-month extension of the tax cut, which will expire June 30 unless new legislation is passed.

Any action taken by the Senate—not likely before June—will then have to be reconciled with the House version in a conference committee and passed in final form by both bodies.

Congress Sets Spending Goal Above Ford's

employment legislation and an equal amount for national health insurance.

The final version shaped by a House-Senate conference was less specific. But it included substantial amounts of both economic stimulus funds and health outlays to be used for such programs as Congress may enact.

Congress in its budget assumptions rejected Ford's proposal to increase the social security tax rate, but went along with his budgeting of only a 5 percent pay raise for federal workers.

It assumed continuation of the supplemental unemployment insurance program the Administration wants to phase out, but ducked an immediate decision on the extent of postal subsidies pending completion of a study.

The budget resolution funds veterans benefits the Administration wanted to reduce and moderates the steep cuts requested by Ford in Medicaid and Medicare.

It contemplates a 5.5 percent rise in the consumer price index during the 1977 calendar year, which would be below the 6 percent rise that had been estimated by the Administration.

And it estimates that the economic stimulus of the budget would help raise the nation's gross national product by 6 percent in constant dollars during 1977 instead of the 4 percent rise estimated in Ford's budget proposals.

Donahue Hits Extremism:

Jobs, Conservation Seen as Compatible

Onaway, Mich.—The needs of workers and the goals of environmentalists must be blended together for the good of all concerned, Thomas R. Donahue told a conference of 300 union, conservation and community representatives here.

Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, stressed that organized labor's immediate priority on full employment does not clash with its continuing concern for the protection of the nation's natural resources.

"Both of these goals must be achieved," he said in an address during the week-long conference sponsored by the Auto Workers at the UAW education center on Black Lake.

He noted, however, that "to move toward a clean environment and full employment, there will inevitably be some trade-offs. If the labor movement and the environmental community are to travel the road together, this must be recognized. Extremism by either element is only self-defeating."

"There must be mutual recognition that the environment is also people, and the circumstances under which they live and work," Donahue said. "Equally vital is the recognition that this magnificent, but fragile, planet must from now on be treated with respect and care."

In keynoting the conference, UAW President Leonard Woodcock called for the formation of a strong alliance of environmental, labor and community groups to help achieve needed economic, environmental and political changes.

Woodcock said that among key objectives around which the coalition can be forged are the need for full employment and a healthy economy, along with the fight against in-plant pollution and other workplace hazards.

"A strong and healthy economy cannot exist within an unhealthy environment, just as only a strong economy can enable us to achieve that healthy environment," he declared.

Woodcock also suggested it was the responsibility of environmentalists to become more involved in the environment of the workplace, calling on their political support for stronger occupational safety and health legislation and standards.

Both Woodcock and Donahue warned on the tactics of "environmental blackmail" used by a number of large corporations that threaten to shut down plants and wipe out jobs if workers press for the clean-up of polluting workplaces.

Donahue also told the conference participants that as socially concerned persons they must consider the importance of balanced economic growth as a tool to make manpower programs work and to reduce poverty among the poor.

Without effective economic expansion, job opportunities for the disadvantaged would not materialize, he stressed.

He suggested that labor and the environmentalists may not agree totally on issues such as nuclear power plant development or the use of disposable containers, but do have common positions on such issues as the control of strip mining and legislation for land use.

Organized labor has long been an advocate of national programs to protect natural resources, Donahue said. He cited convention resolutions on that topic adopted by the AFL in 1908 and 1929, and subsequent actions taken by the CIO and later the merged federation, including the environmental resolution adopted at the AFL-CIO convention last year.

LATIN AMERICAN trade unionists who completed courses in organizing techniques at the American Institute for Free Labor Development hear an address by Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services at federation headquarters. The specialized training was conducted by AFL-CIO organizers at the AIFLD center in Front Royal, Va., over a seven-week period. The 42 AIFLD graduates came from 11 Latin American countries.

Unemployment Termed Worst of All Handicaps

America must overcome "the most crippling handicap of all"—unemployment—if it is to succeed in bringing physically handicapped workers into the mainstream of the nation's economic life, AFL-CIO Vice President Hunter P. Wharton told student essay contest winners from 40 states at an annual luncheon in Washington.

"Unless there are jobs for everyone who is able and willing to work," Wharton said, "the problems of rehabilitation will never be fully solved and there will be only partial solutions to the problems of the handicapped.

"But until that goal is achieved, the AFL-CIO is convinced that no group has a greater claim to support and sympathy than the disabled. That is why we will continue to work with all the allies we can find to bring dignity, self respect, opportunity and hope to the disabled."

Wharton, who is chairman of the labor committee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, spoke at an AFL-CIO-sponsored luncheon for the national and state winners of the 1976 "Ability Counts" essay competition conducted annually by the committee.

Three high school juniors and two seniors shared $3,750 in prize money provided by the Disabled American Veterans. Transportation and expenses for the state winners, and those chosen for national honors, were contributed by AFL-CIO state federations and city central bodies.

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers sponsored a tour of the Washington monument areas for the students.

The essay contestants were asked to undertake first-hand research on the theme, "A Profile of Achievement: How a Handicapped Person Approaches Life."

First prize in the competition — $1,500 — went to Rebecca Hage of St. Cloud, Minn., who wrote about a teacher injured in an accident whose life today is an example of what can happen when handicapped people do not lower their sights because of their disabilities.

Other winners were Susanne Davenport of Smoot, W. Va., $900; Lynn Bibb, Dundee, Miss., $600; Barabara M. Horan, Delanco, N.J., $450, and Rodney L. Branch, Oklahoma City, $300.

Harold Russell, chairman of the President's Committee, welcomed the students at the luncheon and congratulated them for the high caliber of their investigative reporting that shows "how deeply young people can involve themselves in the lives and problems of their handicapped neighbors."

AIFLD Class Hits Slaying In Colombia

Front Royal, Va.—A group of 35 Latin American labor leaders attending an organizing seminar here has condemned as "senseless" the murder of Jose Raquel Mercado by urban guerrillas in Bogota, Colombia.

Mercado, president of the Confederation of Colombian Workers (CTC), was abducted Feb. 15 by a band of extremists. The kidnappers were presumed to be members of M-19 (Movimiento 19 de Abril), a leftwing terrorist movement.

As a "prisoner," Mercado was permitted to write two letters, one to his mother and one to the CTC. He told the CTC he was being held by a group "not interested in ransom, but in obtaining political objectives."

M-19 had urged workers to boycott the national elections Apr. 18. The Communist lists received less than 7 percent of the votes cast in a moderate turnout.

The next day, Mercado's body was found in a park near Bogota with two bullet wounds in the heart.

Mercado, 61, was an alternating member of the Board of Trustees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which runs a training school here.

In a message to Gustavo Diaz Raga, acting president of the CTC, which has some 330,000 members the labor leaders attending the institute expressed their condolences over the assassination.

"To our brothers," the message added, "we express our sympathies and strongly condemn this senseless murder that not only brings mourning to the democratic working classes of Latin America but also signifies an irreparable loss for the Colombian workers."

Ford Signs New Election Law, Orders Test of Congress Veto

from the workers they represent. If management utilizes a checkoff for its program, the same right has to be given to a union.

Each group can solicit the other's constituency twice a year by mail, but only under safeguards to prevent the soliciting group from knowing who contributed.

● All membership organizations, including unions, will have to report the cost of any "internal communication" such as a letter to members or a political leaflet or newsletter calling for the election or defeat of a "clearly identified" candidate in a federal election if the amount spent on the communication exceeded $2,000 per election. Expenditures over that amount aren't barred. They merely have to be reported to the Federal Election Commission, which presumably will set up forms and procedures to do so. Regular issues of union publications, not devoted principally to an election, would not be affected.

● Limits on political contributions can't be circumvented by establishing multiple fund-giving outlets. Thus, a company can't set up separate political funds at each of its plants to funnel more than the $5,000 limit to a favored candidate. Nor could a candidate receive $5,000 from a voluntary political fund of an international union and additional money from the political arm of one of its locals. But a contribution from the AFL-CIO Committee on Poltical Education would not preclude contributions from the autonomous unions that are affiliated with the AFL-CIO. The same option, of course, would allow separate contributions from voluntary political funds set up by the Chamber of Commerce and its affiliated business firms.

● Candidates who hereafter poll less than 10 percent of the vote in two successive primaries, unless they have filed disclaimers asserting they did not wish to compete in that state's primary, will lose their right to matching funds.

● Members of Congress could not receive more than $2,000 for any one speech or appearance, or more than $25,000 a year in such fees. The previous honorarium limit had been $15,000.

A provision of the new bill barring a member of the Federal Election Commission from any other employment reportedly contributed to the decision of Chairman Thomas B. Curtis not to seek reappointment. Curtis, a former Republican Congressman, has an active law practice.

President Ford is expected to submit the names of the other five members of the old commission and propose a new chairman. The commission cannot act until at least a majority of its members are confirmed by the Senate.

Under the previous law, two members had been chosen directly by the Senate, two members by the House, and two appointed by the President.

Bakers Win at Stover Supplier

Marion, S.C. — The Bakery & Confectionery Workers won an election at the Ward Paper Box Co. —a major supplier of Russell Stover Candies—and was certified by the National Labor Relations Board as bargaining agent for the 15 eligible workers. The vote was 13 to 1 for the B&C.

The box company is owned by Louis L. Ward and four other directors of Russell Stover, against whom the union is waging a nationwide boycott. Ward is board chairman and president of Russell Stover and board chairman and treasurer of the paper box manufacturing company in South Carolina.

The boycott is being waged against Russell Stover with the full support of the AFL-CIO for the company's failure to engage in meaningful bargaining at its Lincoln, Neb., plant, where workers voted overwhelmingly for the union in 1974, and for illegal conduct and anti-union activity at its Montrose, Colo., plant.

An organizing campaign is being conducted by the B&C at Russell Stover's production plant here as well as at plants and warehouse operations in other parts of the country.

Full Employment Target Leads Platform Proposals

Positive Program Urged:

Council Cites Signs Of Lag in Recovery

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO warned that the "nation must not be lulled into believing that the economy is in good shape," and called on the Administration and Congress for active policies and programs that will produce a prosperous and balanced economy.

The warning came at the spring meeting of the federation's Executive Council in a series of statements that called for improving and strengthening the minimum wage, enactment of badly needed housing legislation, better statistics on state and local joblessness and quick passage of the full employment bill, currently under fire from the Administration and conservative groups.

In a statement on the state of the national economy, the council stressed that despite the Administration's rosy words, unemployment currently is at a higher level than at any time between 1950 and 1975 and inflation is heading up again. The council declared that there is no basis for a trade-off between unemployment and inflation, that both are serious problems and should be attacked simultaneously.

There has been no real improvement in the unemployment picture during the past three months, the council said, and in the coming months 4 million students will graduate and enter the labor force. There must be jobs for them as well as the nearly 10 million now unemployed, the statement declared.

The council pointed out that the latest figures on wholesale prices "are also cause for concern" and that these increases "will be showing up in months to come in higher food prices at the supermarket, higher heating costs and higher housing costs."

Attacks On Jobs Bill Challenged

America's unions affirmed support for the Humphrey-Hawkins bill and charged critics of the full employment legislation with distorting its provisions.

An Executive Council statement called on the House and Senate to bring the bill to the floor as soon as possible for "full public debate" and vote. The House Labor Committee has already endorsed the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller pressed at Senate hearings for early action.

The Executive Council stressed that "planning for economic growth," as the Humphrey-Hawkins bill would require, is entirely different than the "planned economy" scare-phrase used by some of the conservative critics.

The bill sets up procedures to coordinate existing government functions to achieve full employment, the council said.

Making that same point, Bie-

President George Meany noted it was the first such award ever voted by the Executive Council. Community Service Parley:

Nursing Home Mess Spurs Labor Probe

By James M. Shevis

A new, federally sponsored ombudsman program to handle the complaints of residents of nursing homes and their relatives came in for wide discussion at the 18th national AFL-CIO Conference on Community Services.

The program, in which the AFL-CIO is cooperating through its Dept. of Community Services, is aimed at correcting the "indefensible" conditions that exist in many of today's nursing and intermediate-care facilities for the elderly, Commissioner on Aging Arthur S. Flemming told some 500 delegates to the five-day meeting.

Now under way in all but three states, the program dovetails with the position on nursing homes adopted last February by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. In a statement, the council decried those unscrupulous nursing home operators, medical laboratories, clinics, doctors, medical appliance salesmen and insurance company executives who are "skimming their share off the top of the Medicare and Medicaid programs, reducing care for the elderly, and subverting public support for these important programs."

The AFL-CIO called for a national effort to clean up the nursing-home industry, and asked each state and local central body to work with the National Council of Senior Citizens and other like-minded organizations to investigate conditions in their communities.

Flemming told the delegates — union community services staff members and representatives of voluntary and government social agencies from around the country—that the goal of the government-sponsored program is to develop an ombudsman process at the area or community level.

Meany Asks Clear Stand By Parties

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President George Meany asked America's political parties for a firm commitment to full employment at home and support of freedom throughout the world.

He submitted to the Democratic Platform Committee the AFL-CIO's roadmap for America—a 62-page policy statement that also will be presented to the Republican Platform Committee. Meany termed it labor's answer to the question, "Which way, America?"

He insisted that the "only way" is one "that puts people first, that rejects arbitrary and artificial limits on what a government can and must do to help its citizens, that places the freedom of people above the politics of government."

He asked both parties to come into the election campaign with platforms that clearly define the nation's problems and offer specific solutions.

Americans are "rightly suspicious of parties and candidates who try to be all things to all people or attempt to disguise a lack of substance with political slogans," Meany said.

He had been scheduled as the first of more than 100 public witnesses to be heard by the Democratic Platform Committee during four days of hearings in Washington, D.C. Meany refused, however, to cross a picket line that had been set up by the Broadcast Employees & Technicians, the union that was striking the NBC network.

The hearings were subsequently

Right to Quality Education Termed Key Issue in School Desegregation

AFL-CIO President George Meany, attacking "opportunists and demagogues who flourish on disorder," declared that a child's right to equal access to quality education—not busing—is the real issue in cities faced with court-ordered school desegregation.

"There is discrimination in the North. And the courts have ordered it be abolished in the schools because it violates the Constitution," Meany said in a filmed message at a conference cosponsored by the Justice Dept.'s Community Relations Service and the National Center for Quality Integrated Education, a project funded by the Ford Foundation.

"And so there has been civil disorder and hate in Boston and Louisville that is almost identical to that in Little Rock nearly 20 years ago," Meany observed.

"Some politicians and candidates have ignored the issue of equal justice and quality education. Demagogues have vented their spleen on busing, as if busing were the real issue."

But, he said, the facts prove otherwise. More than 40 percent of the nation's children ride buses to school each day, and only 3 percent do so because of court orders, he noted.

"The issue is quality education," Meany said. "The big yellow buses have improved the quality of education for millions, and there isn't the slightest reason to pretend, suddenly, that school busing is somehow, in itself, harmful or undemocratic."

Meany's statement was presented at a national conference on "De-

Relief Fund Voted For Quake Victims

The AFL-CIO established a fund to help victims of Italy's disastrous earthquakes and has urged its affiliates to contribute.

An Executive Council statement cited the "fearful loss of life" and the plight of survivors left homeless amid widespread destruction.

The council voted $50,000 to start the fund, with union donations coming to the AFL-CIO to be distributed through trade union channels so as "to aid our brothers in their time of urgent need."

R-T-W Repeal Drive Builds In Arkansas

Little Rock, Ark.—Labor's petition campaign to repeal Arkansas's so-called right-to-work law through a statewide referendum has amassed 68,000 signatures.

Although only 55,000 signatures are needed by July 2 to place the constitutional proposal on the November ballot, a goal of 106,000 signatures has been set by the broad-based coalition, Arkansans for Progress. That would be 1,000 more than the total votes cast 32 years ago for the constitutional amendment banning the union shop in Arkansas.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its May meeting in Washington, pledged complete support to the Arkansas campaign. Individual vice presidents, speaking on behalf of their unions, promised full cooperation, President George Meany reported.

The coalition supporting a revision of the "Rights of Labor Amendment" is headed by leaders from church, farm, labor, business and university organizations.

In passing the half-way mark in the coalition's goal in the signature drive, President J. Bill Becker of the Arkansas AFL-CIO said, "We are on schedule."

But Becker warned that the campaign still has a long way to go to meet the 106,000 goal.

Representatives of the Teamsters and the Auto Workers, who are working with AFL-CIO unions in the repeal campaign, said they were heartened by the response of Arkansas citizens and expressed confidence that the coalition's goal could be reached.

The proposal to revise the "right-to-work" amendment would allow negotiation of a union shop if a majority of the bargaining unit approves and the employer agrees.

Airport Controllers Press for Upgrading

San Diego, Calif.—The nation's air traffic controllers, whose morale is "extremely low" because they have been "locked into a totally inappropriate salary system" are counting on the U.S. Civil Service Commission to bring about a long-needed upward reclassification of their jobs, President John F. Leyden declared at the 9th annual convention of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization here.

A key source of the discontentment was cited by Sen. John F. Tunney (D-Calif.) in a speech to the 800 delegates: disparity in pay between controllers and airline pilots.

Leyden said the controllers have no criticism of pilot salaries, which on the average are double those of the 16,000 men and women in the air traffic centers and towers.

PATCO has notified every airline president and other leaders in the air traffic industry of what Leyden calls the "crisis in classification." He said the controllers union is not looking for a "confrontation" over the classification report of the federal government's personnel agency.

But the issue, Leyden told the delegates, is whether controllers "are to be paid a portion of what their professionalism and responsibility would command in the private sector—or are we to allow ourselves to be whipped into accepting far less?"

PATCO is an autonomous affiliate of the Marine Engineers, which in recent years has brought into its ranks a number of professional groups committed to collective bargaining.

The PATCO delegates ratified an agreement of affiliation by the National Association of Air Traffic Specialists. NAATS, which will have an autonomous relationship to PATCO, comprises some 3,500 airport ground personnel who advise general aviation pilots of weather situations, navigational aids and similar technical information. The group is headed by Lawrence Cushing of Washington, D.C.

Dr. John McLucas, head of the Federal Aviation Administration, which employs the controllers, told the delegates the time had come for improvements "in the way the FAA deals with PATCO." Admitting that under previous administrators FAA had dealt with the controllers union "at arm's length," McLucas said "your dedication to the air traffic system is recognized and your skills are essential."

The union continues to push a long-range plan to divorce the air traffic system from what it describes as "red tape bureaucracy" in the upper echelons of the FAA and the Dept. of Transportation. It seeks creation of a private corporation, or a mixed public-private unit like the Communications Satellite Corp. (COMSAT), to control traffic on the nation's airlines.

The delegates spent much of the convention in discussion and ratification of most parts of a constitution proposed after a year's study of the group's structural needs.

Panel's Proposals End N.Y. Apartment Strike

New York—Apartment-house owners here reversed themselves and accepted a contract proposal recommended by a special panel appointed by Mayor Abraham Beame, thereby ending a 17-day strike by more than 20,000 building service workers.

The terms of the agreement earlier had been accepted by negotiators for Local 32B of the Service Employees but rejected by the Realty Advisory Board which represents the owners.

The break in the bitter strike followed a pledge of full support for the union by the AFL-CIO. In a telegram to Michael Mann, director of the federation's Region 7, President George Meany praised the mobilization of New York trade unionists in support of 32B's struggle for " a fair and equitable contract."

Meany's message was read by Mann at an overflow press conference, along with a statement unanimously adopted by the leaders of more than 60 local unions.

Under the new agreement, which was approved 8 to 4 by members of the realty board, workers will receive a total of $39 a week in wage and fringe-benefit increases over a three-year period. The pact is retroactive to Apr. 21 when the strike began.

Of the $39, all but $4 represent wage increases. The $4 will go toward improvement of health, welfare and pension programs.

The agreement was unanimously approved by the union's joint executive board, and workers returned to their jobs starting May 19.

The strike involved superintendents, maintenance men, elevator operators, doormen and security personnel.

The Beame panel, appointed after five days of stalemated negotiations, included Vincent D. McDonnell, chairman of the New York State Board of Mediation; Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York City Central Labor Council, and Rexford Tompkins, president of the Drydock Savings Bank and a former realty board member.

When 32B accepted the panel's recommendations, it served notice that it would sign contracts on an individual basis with all apartment owners who were willing to do so.

Soaring Health Costs Hit Elderly Hardest

The average health care bill for a person 65 or older was $1,360 in fiscal 1975, almost six and one-half times the average health care expense of persons under age 19, and almost three times that of people age 19 to 64.

The Social Security Administration's Office of Research & Statistics also reported that health care expenditures for the aged rose 18 percent in fiscal 1975, after an 11.4 percent increase the previous year. For the young and intermediate age groups, expenditures increased 12 and 13.5 percent respectively.

Entire Measure Opposed:

Criminal Code Bill Seen Periling Rights

A controversial bill that would rewrite the federal criminal code is a threat to individual rights and civil liberties, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council called on the Senate Judiciary Committee to reject the bill, "in whole or in part," declaring that its deficiencies are too pervasive to be corrected through amendments. The legislation is often referred to by its Senate bill number, S. 1.

The bill's "essence," the council said, is extension of federal criminal law "to the farthest limit" and granting to federal law enforcement officials broad power to choose which individuals or organizations will be subjected to criminal prosecution.

Undue concentration of power in the Executive Branch has a "potential for abuse" that is "too recent a lesson to forget," the Executive Council said.

Among the objectionable provisions listed by the council are expansion of government authority to withhold information, sanctioning of wiretapping and eavesdropping, and broadened authority to prosecute individuals who picket or otherwise demonstrate against a federal agency or function.

Sponsors of the bill have indicated a willingness to drop several of the most controversial provisions in order to increase the chances of passage. But the council stressed that "even without these sections, the bill is objectionable."

It saw the likelihood that the increased power given to prosecutors would result in criminal cases being brought "not on the judgment that the conduct alleged should be punished but because the defendant is out of favor with those in power."

The Executive Council cited "anti-labor bias reflected in numerous provisions" of S. 1.

It acknowledged "strong arguments" for modifying the criminal code to remedy inequities and "to meet changing times."

But it stressed that "these purposes should not be accomplished at the expense of the existing careful limitations upon the governmental power of prosecution, which have traditionally safeguarded civil liberties in this society."

The U.S. Constitution takes the position that it is necessary to limit the use of arbitrary power "by officials elected and appointed to enforce the law as well as by those who break the law," the council noted.

It said the AFL-CIO can't support the legislation because it is too one-sided.

Full Representation Supported for D.C.

The AFL-CIO will support a proposed constitutional amendment to give the District of Columbia full voting rights in Congress. Residents of the nation's capital now have only a non-voting delegate in the House.

A resolution backing a proposal for voting representation in both the Senate and House was introduced at the AFL-CIO convention last October. It was referred by the delegates to the federation's Executive Council for fuller consideration.

The council, at its May 19 meeting, announced approval of the resolution.

Agency Hit for Putting 'Dollar Value on Lives'

The Steelworkers have accused a presidential advisory council of callous disregard for the lives of nearly 30,000 workers in labeling a proposed coke oven health standard as inflationary.

The USWA charged that the Council on Wage & Price Stability flagrantly abused its authority "by delving into health hazard questions which it is neither qualified nor equipped to evaluate."

The charges were made in response to the council's testimony at Occupational Safety & Health Administration hearings on cancer-causing effects of coke oven emissions in the steel industry.

Under a presidential order, the council is directed to present its views on inflation impact, the USWA said, "not to place dollar values on human lives."

Noting that the council accepted OSHA's finding that the health standard would add only one one-hundredth of 1 percent to the consumer price index, the union observed. "Yet, it argues, this cost is still too great in relation to lives involved."

"This outrageous statement," the union said, "is based on statistical trickery performed by the council's personnel who are not biostatisticians nor health professionals of any kind, and have no business injecting themselves in this health area."

In its statement, the council compared the annual number of cancer deaths among coke oven workers to OSHA's estimated cost of the clean-up program and came up with a figure of $4.5 million per life.

"We obviously cannot spend that sum," it declared, in calling on OSHA to consider other alternatives to the standard.

But the council's economic analysis also failed to disclose the lower impact cost on the economy by dividing the total number of workers exposed to coke oven emissions into the overall cost of the program.

The USWA pointed out that the same inflationary argument based on faulty analysis could be made against all OSHA standards.

"The argument is, in fact, an attack on the fundamental concepts of safety and health legislation," the union warned.

Environmentalists in steel towns have been trying to halt coke oven pollution for years and the proposed OSHA standard would meet that goal, the USWA said.

"According to OSHA's calculations," the USWA warned, "1,200 of our members will ultimately die of cancers contracted during the five-year period in which this matter has been debated."

The union said that a further delay, as urged by the president's council, would result in the deaths of hundreds more coke oven workers.

Council Cites Economic Danger Signs

Ford Administration Hit on 'Rosy' Claims

Noting that the President advises Americans to look to employment figures, the council said that jobs in the goods producing industries are still 2 million below pre-recession levels and construction is particularly depressed with unemployment running between 16 and 20 percent.

The council also took note of charges being leveled against the full employment bill, answering the arguments and distortions and calling for speedy congressional action on the measure at the current session.

On housing, the council strongly endorsed the Senate-passed housing and community development bill and a similar measure reported out by the House Banking Committee. "There is a great need for such legislation," the council said, with housing production far below the "basic requirements to accommodate national growth in households and replacement of units lost from the supply."

The statement called on the President to sign the measure when it clears Congress, adding that if he turned to the veto again Congress should make every effort to override.

On jobless figures, the council urged a "greatly expanded" monthly survey "to get more complete and accurate information on state and local as well as national unemployment." There is a current failure to present a "full and accurate picture of the geographic distribution of unemployment . . . a vital bread and butter issue."

In other actions the council:

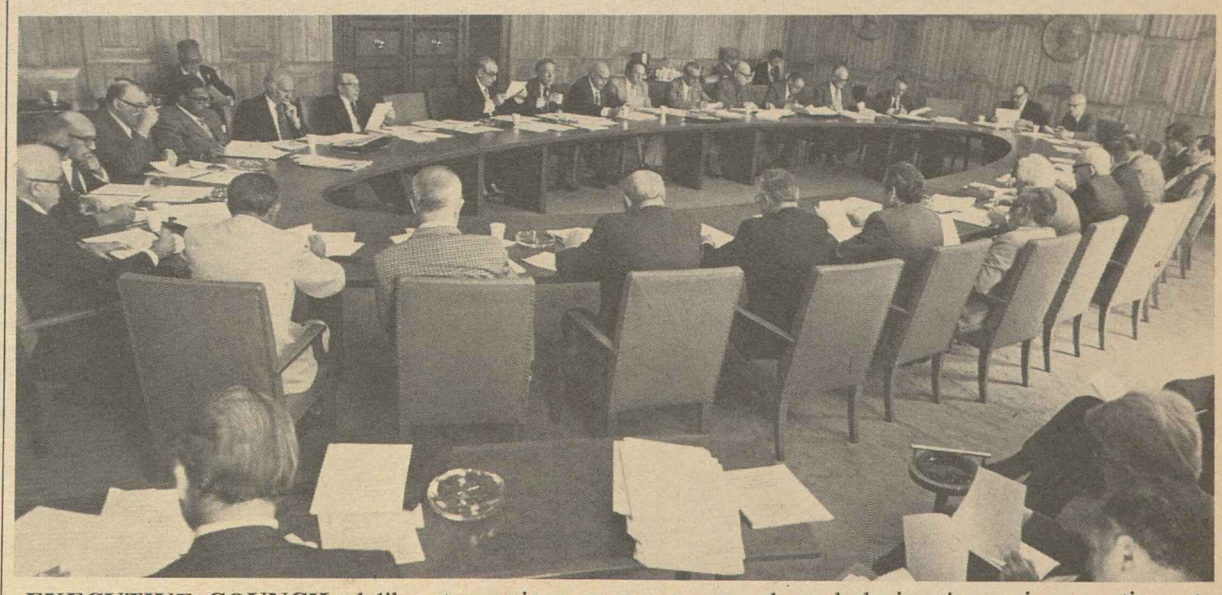
Voted to name the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center after Federation President George Meany with the exact formulation to be decided later. Meany said he was "highly flattered" by the action and spoke of the increasingly important role of the center to the labor movement and the community.

Approved an annual budget for the center of $1,441,975 and heard a report on the scheduled completion of the second dormitory in November.

Set up a five-member committee to conduct a feasibility study on creation of a labor archive at the center. The committee is made up of AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Al H. Chesser, Paul Hall, Glenn E. Watts, William Sidell and Sol C. Chaikin. The study was recommended by the center's Board of Trustees which approved the objective but urged fuller exploration.

Heard a detailed report from Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller on the situation in Congress in which he noted that presidential vetoes have cast a cloud over the adoption of liberal legislation.

Adopted a statement updating an earlier council expression of AFL-CIO concern on the use of chiropractic services in governmental programs. Noting that Congress included chiropractic services under Medicaid, Medicare and federal employe health programs, the council urged that the services be subject to limitation of conditions falling within the competency of chiropractors.



Received a report from a council subcommittee headed by Vice President Murray H. Finley on the campaign to organize J. P. Stevens.

Acted on six referred resolutions, adopting one for full representation for the District of Columbia, a substitute statement on criminal code revision and noting that others required no action or nonconcurrence.

Accepted assignments in cooperation with COPE to work in various states for the November elections, a procedure used effectively over the past 10 years.

Approved contributions to the African American Labor Center, Asian American Free Labor Institute, Joint Council for Economic Education, Histadrut Afro-Asian Institute, United Italian American Labor Council, Jewish Labor Committee, Consumer Federation of America.

The next meeting of the council was set for July 19 in Washington.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL deliberates action on statements adopted during its spring meeting at the federation headquarters in Washington. It outlined labor's goals of full employment, housing construction and minimum wage improvements to restore economic growth to the nation.

Pact Ratified, Strike Ends At Trailways

Members of three Amalgamated Transit locals overwhelmingly ratified a three-year agreement with Continental Trailways to end an 18-day bus strike in nine southern states.

The new contracts provide for wage increases, improved mileage rates and benefits for about 1,000 drivers, mechanics and terminal personnel. The combined vote approving the agreement by ATU Locals 1531, 1534 and 1491 was 628 to 159.

The contracts also provide for adjustments to correct a disparity in wage and mileage rates for the ATU members throughout the nine-state Trailways system, the union reported.

For drivers, an increase in mileage rates will range from $1.50 to $2.30 per 100 miles. Wage increases ranging from 60 cents an hour to $1.22 will bring hourly paid workers to the same income level after three years.

New features of the contract also provide for six days of paid sick leave per year, two days of funeral leave per year, and supplemental income for jury duty.

$3 Wage Floor Pushed With Automatic Raises

The federal minimum wage should be raised "promptly" to $3 an hour and future adjustments should be made automatically through a variation of the standard escalator clause, the AFL-CIO said.

Under the plan endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the minimum wage would be permanently pegged at 60 percent of the average hourly pay in non-farm, non-supervisory jobs.

When average wages rise, the federal wage floor would move up also to maintain the 60 percent ratio.

The council statement stressed the inadequacy of the present $2.30 an hour minimum, which some workers still have not reached because their jobs were just brought under the wage-hour law in recent years.

Just to reach the family poverty level, the council noted, a full-time year-around worker would have to be paid $2.75 an hour.

The AFL-CIO testified last October for a $3 minimum wage bill sponsored by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Labor subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The original Dent bill would have raised the wage floor in steps to the $3 level and kept up its value by a cost-of-living provision. It also would have imposed stiffer premium pay penalties for overtime work as a prod to employers to hire more workers when the workload expands.

Dent is now seeking to enlist bipartisan support for linking the minimum wage to the average hourly wage, the concept the Executive Council endorsed.

The council resolution also reiterated the AFL-CIO's strong objection to a subminimum wage floor for young workers or any other group.

It called on Congress to "reject once again the notion that teenagers or women or blacks should be paid less than the minimum wage."

It warned that "to legislate subminimum rates for any of these categories would be to gut the basic principle of minimum wage legislation."

The Executive Council prodded the Labor Dept. to "vigorously enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act."

While improving the law would be "a significant achievement," the council stressed that employers must be brought into compliance in order for workers to benefit.

Quality Called 'Real Issue' In Education

segregation Without Turmoil: The Community's Role in Preparing for Smooth Transition."

Meany said that if a federal judge finds the Constitution is being violated and orders busing as the only way to obtain quality education, "then there must be busing."

In Boston and Louisville, he said, the judges had no other recourse under the law than to order busing. He blamed the communities for failing in their obligation to provide quality education for all and for failing to prepare parents and children adequately for the task of living up to the law.

"As a result, fear — and the anger and hatred that fear begets —swept those cities," Meany said. "Opportunists and demagogues who flourish on disorder rushed to the soap boxes and we all know the results."

In the future, Meany said, such tragedies can be avoided through community involvement in those cities where courts have ordered desegregation in the schools.

Churches, service clubs, civic organizations, civil rights groups—"and certainly the unions"—must be mobilized, he said.

"The AFL-CIO is fully committed to help build such bridges and create such forums in the cities where school desegregation is under way," Meany declared. "We intend to help, as well, in many other cities, including those in which the courts have not acted.

"In our view, ensuring justice for school children is a job that should be done willingly and promptly in every community, without waiting for orders."

New Government Policies Urged To Bolster Freedom Around World

The AFL-CIO called on the American government to initiate policies to reverse the decline and defeat of freedom and democracy around the world.

The federation's Executive Council said the U.S. should reexamine its participation in international organizations "which are failing to fulfill their stated objectives of advancing democracy's interests in the world."

The council's statement pointed out that the "free world has lost effective control of the international organizations which were established to defend and enhance the freedom of mankind and the human rights of all." These organizations are becoming more and more "the instruments of aggressors."

Despite these facts, the statement said, "we in the AFL-CIO do not believe the fight for freedom and democracy has been lost or should ever be abandoned. We believe that much can be done and should be done and that immediate action is vital."

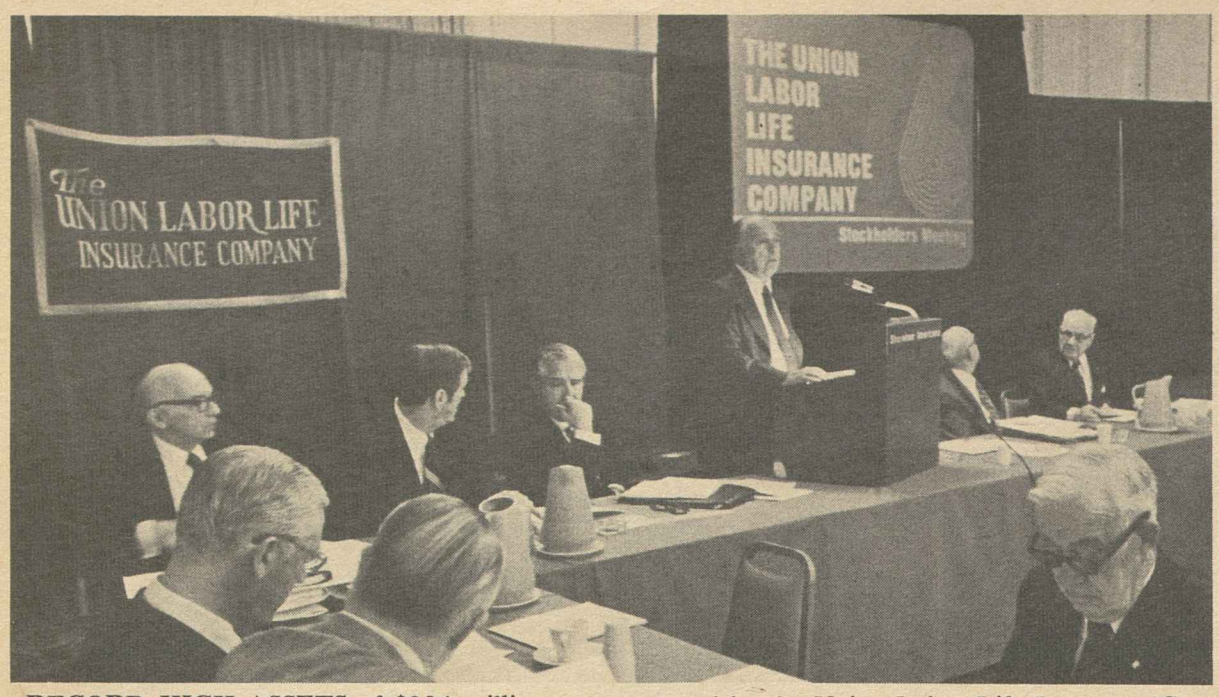
The statement traced the diminishing of democracy in the world and the weakening of free trade union movements, noting that "nowhere is this fact more evident than in some developing nations where coups and military takeovers have banished free institutions and destroyed trade union organizations."

It pointed out also that "large sectors within Western Europe may soon accept Communist participation in government," part of the erosion of democracy and freedom.

The Soviets have been "successful in splitting the unity of the West," the council said, which itself has been in "sad and declining circumstances for a number of years." It added that "democracy's need is for a real detente in the West, a matter overlooked while seeking an illusory detente with the East."

The statement charged that the Soviet Union and its allies "have simply outflanked the West," and using the military and economic forces of others "are at the backdoors of continents, nations and our economies virtually unopposed."

Calling on the U.S. to reverse "this slide into economic, political and military defeat," the statement said "we must bargain collectively with our friends and allies to recreate the objectives of a democratic world" if we are to avoid tyranny and dictatorship.



New Jobless Aid Claims Swing Up

New claims for unemployment insurance during the week ended May 8 exceeded 400,000 for the first time in four months, the Labor Dept. reported.

In its latest weekly report on jobless aid claims, the government said the May 8 total of first-time claims was 401,000, up from 383,000 a week earlier. The figures are adjusted for seasonal variation.

Retail Clerks' Counsel To Fill NLRB Post

Carl L. Taylor, who has served as general counsel of the Retail Clerks since 1969, has been named associate general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, in charge of the Division of Enforcement Litigation. The appointment was announced by NLRB General Counsel John S. Irving.

RECORD HIGH ASSETS of $234 million were reported by the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. at the end of 1975, ULLICO Board Chairman J. Albert Woll told the annual shareholders meeting in Washington. The union-sponsored company also recorded new highs in premium income, investments, deposits and payments to policyholders. Directors declared a dividend of $2.25 per share.

Health Security Budget Termed Best Method to Control Costs

A federal budgeting system envisioned by the National Health Security program would be the most effective approach to control of soaring medical care costs, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a Senate subcommittee on health.

Seidman noted in his testimony that "medical costs have continued to rise at a dizzying pace" even though the overall consumer price index has moderated in recent months.

For American workers, this means they now must pay about one month of their annual wages for health care for themselves and their families, he said.

Efforts by the federal government to curb the rise in medical rates have failed thus far, Seidman observed, and commerical insurance carriers have shown they have neither the capacity nor the interest to hold down costs.

"The main problem with leaving the financing of health care in the hands of the insurance industry and relying on regulation to contain costs and maintain quality is that economic incentives of providers are in the wrong direction," Seidman said.

During the past decade, the cost of an average stay in the hospital tripled—rising from $269 in 1965 to $995 in the first 10 months of 1975, he pointed out.

And while the CPI, excluding medical care, rose 6.8 percent last year, hospital service charges rose 13 percent. Seidman noted that first quarter figures reflected a worsening trend, as physicians' fees rose at an annual rate of 14.2 percent and hospital service charges increased 20.1 percent.

"By contrast," Seidman stressed, "the overall consumer price index —less medical care—rose at a 2.4 percent rate."

He said the escalating health care costs are having a substantial impact on the federal budget, with 42.2 percent of health expenditures coming from public funds.

Federal payments, including Medicare, Medicaid, Veterans Administration and Defense Dept. hospitals, totaled $33.8 billion. Additional payments from state and local governments during fiscal year 1975 brought the total annual subsidy for the medical industry to $55.5 billion, Seidman added.

He said a major drawback of the nation's voluntary health insurance system is that it's designed to reimburse patients for sickness, rather than paying for maintenance of health.

"It is casualty insurance and not a health program," Seidman said. "The emphasis is on covering expensive hospitalization and surgery, but not routine office and home visits by a doctor to prevent acute illness."

The best alternative to the current faulty health delivery system would be the budgeting of health expenditures at every level through the Health Security program without altering the present ownership of hospitals or the private practice of medicine, he said.

In outlining the proposal for national health budgeting, Seidman said allocation to health regions could be based on two primary factors:

- Expenditures for the prior year adjusted for inflation and productivity.
- The need for health services.

"For example, over-doctored health service areas would receive a somewhat lower budget on a per capita basis than under-doctored areas for physician services—clearly an incentive for better geographic distribution of physicians. Similar considerations would apply to facilities."

In the long run, Seidman said, Health Security would be the least expensive of all national health security proposals. He said the total health expenditure budget could be held to the present 8.3 percent of the gross national product.

Seidman warned that proposals by the Administration to place a ceiling on Medicare and Medicaid payments would not effectively control the escalation of medical costs. It could simply make the patient pay a larger portion of the overall costs.

He said it is essential for Congress to move for early enactment of National Health Security because the American people will not tolerate the continuing surge in medical prices.

"The budgetary system and other built-in controls of the Health Security program offer the most effective way of controlling health care costs and assuring high quality care for all Americans," Seidman declared.

Court Bars Disclosure Of Authorization Cards

Most information gathered by the National Labor Relations Board while investigating an unfair labor charge is not disclosable under the Freedom of Information Act, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York ruled.

Specifically protected by the act's personal privacy exemption are authorization cards signed by workers in selecting a union. District Court Judge Robert A. Ward ruled.

"The interest in confidentiality which attaches to a union authorization card approaches that which surrounds the secret ballot in an election," the court held.

The court followed the reasoning of an earlier April decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit which established the principle that the Freedom of Information Act may not be used as a back-door means of securing broad disclosure rights in NLRB proceedings.

In the district court case, Biophysics Systems, Inc., of Mahopac, N.Y., had sought affidavits, signed statements and copies of all authorization cards signed by its employes in choosing a union, Local 1783 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Disclosure of the cards, Ward held, "could reveal something of the board's case prematurely, and it would definitely tend to 'chill' employes in the exercise of their protected rights to seek a representation election and later to press unfair labor charges related to that election.

The judge's opinion concluded: "As observed by the Second Circuit, there exists a 'delicate relationship between employer and employe.' The NLRB's recognition of this explains its reluctance to release information which might tend to strain that relationship and unduly hamper the board's efforts to enforce federal labor legislation.

"Obviously the cooperation of employes involved in this unfair labor practice proceeding might well diminish if they learned the NLRB had turned over their authorization cards."

'No Help Wanted':

Kirkland Cites Peril To Minorities, Gains

Miami—"No Help Wanted" signs, the outgrowth of Nixon-Ford Administration policies, are jeopardizing the progress made by the labor and civil rights movements in promoting employment opportunities for job-hunting minority workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the National Urban League's Labor Affairs Conference here.

Kirkland noted that among President Ford's 48 vetoes over the last 20 months were three major job-creating measures that could have put nearly 2.5 million unemployed persons back to work.

These vetoed bills would have helped people who need and want jobs, but can't find them to get off welfare rolls and onto payrolls, he said.

But these people, Kirkland stressed, "get no sympathy and no mercy from Mr. Ford. He has told us that if he is elected in November, 6 to 8.5 million American workers will be jobless every year while he is in office."

"In effect, Mr. Ford is announcing the creation of a new class in American society—an underclass of permanently unemployed people who have no hope of sharing in the independence and self-respect that only a good job at a decent wage can give."

Such a program, contrived by the Nixon economic advisers and still held in place by the Ford Administration, is certain to shatter American society into warring camps of haves and have-nots, Kirkland warned.

"We in the labor movement are absolutely convinced that America cannot survive such a program," he stressed. "We are convinced that full employment is the only policy that can keep us on the course that was set 200 years ago."

Kirkland said full employment is the best and fastest way to balance the budget, end the drain on resources and to get the nation moving forward again.

The fight for passage of the labor-backed full employment bill demands the broad support of all groups that brought about passage of the landmark Civil Rights Act, Kirkland observed.

He said full employment is an extension of the struggle for civil rights and stressed: "It is important that the sign at the hiring gate applies equally to all—male and female, white and black and brown."

"But when the sign says 'No Help Wanted,' what has been gained?" he asked. "What is the value of an equal employment law, if there are not enough jobs for everyone?"

Kirkland praised the achievements of the Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP) in placing 17,000 minority workers in meaningful jobs during its eight years of operations.

"What makes this record remarkable is the fact that ways were found to launch these 17,000 youngsters in new careers during a period when America has been suffering its highest unemployment rates since the depression of the 1930s," he observed.

He said numerous training slots were made in the construction trades even as the industry was suffering from a double-digit jobless rate.

The gains are a tribute to LEAP Director Napoleon Johnson, Kirkland said, and also to the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades unions that "have not only kept the door open to these new members in a difficult period, but reached out to help them walk in."

Kirkland noted that similar achievements are being made in assisting minority workers by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and the R-T-P program initiated by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Workers Defense League.

The nation has benefited greatly from the government's investment in the training efforts because of the money pumped into the economy by the trainees' wages and the taxes they have paid to the Treasury, Kirkland said.

In its recent annual report, the LEAP Trade Union Advisory Council said trainees placed by LEAP have earned $390 million and paid $91 million in taxes—a return of $4 for each dollar spent on the program.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard was presented a special award at the conference for helping coordinate LEAP training and placement efforts.

Strikers' Rights Upheld On Welfare Assistance

A federal judge in New Jersey ruled that a state may provide welfare assistance to otherwise eligible strikers without violating any federal law or policy.

The decision, by District Court Judge John F. Gerry, may mark the end of a five-year-old lawsuit—or signal a new round of appeals.

It started with a six-week strike by a Teamsters local. As the strike progressed, several workers sought and received on the basis of need benefits under a state welfare program and the federal-state Aid to Families with Dependent Children program (AFDC).

The employer, Super Tire Engineering Co., sued to halt the benefits, claiming that availability of welfare assistance put the state's economic power on the side of the union, thus somehow frustrating the federal policy of encouraging collective bargaining.

For various procedural reasons, the district court and an appellate court rejected the complaint. The Supreme Court by a 5-4 ruling rejected the appellate court's finding that the case was moot, or no longer pertinent, because the strike had long since ended. It was sent back eventually to the district court for a decision on the merits.

Judge Gerry said that Congress has had plenty of time to consider the issue and take action if it considered welfare benefits to needy strikers a contradiction of national labor policy.

"It is difficult for this court to conclude that Congress, fully aware of the fact that strikers were receiving welfare benefits under the (Social Security) Act, intended by its silence on the issue to terminate that practice," he said in dismissing the case.

Meany Asks Clear Stand by Parties:

Full Employment Program Leads Platform Proposals

moved to the Senate Caucus Room, a tentative strike settlement was announced, and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller read the statement to the committee.

Meany's statement stressed the need to restore morality in government and repair public confidence shattered by an administration in which both the President and Vice President were forced to resign because of "unrelated criminal acts."

During the same four years, Meany noted, corporations confessed to "bribery and political payoffs at home and abroad. The people learned their government had deceived them about foreign affairs, allowed respected agencies to violate the civil rights of citizens, and misled them about the nation's economic health."

Restoration of morality to government policies "is the bedrock of the AFL-CIO program for America," Meany said.

The AFL-CIO statement emphasized that full employment must be the keystone of economic policy. It declared:

"We seek a flat rejection of policies that utilize unemployment as an instrument of national economic policy. . . . Instead of planned unemployment, America needs planned employment. There is nothing wrong with the American economy that more jobs wouldn't cure, and we believe that government must play a key role in that planning, along with industry and labor."

Specifically, it called for:

- Legislation spelling out procedures and programs to achieve and maintain full employment.
- An immediate reduction in mortgage interest rates to no more than 6 percent to revive housing construction.
- Strengthening of the unemployment insurance system.
- Continuation of the emergency income tax cut through 1977 to maintain consumer purchasing power, coupled with tax reform measures.
- An energy policy designed to reduce dependence on foreign oil.
- Trade and investment policies that will halt the loss of U.S. production, capital and jobs.

The statement stressed that the recession will not be over until full employment is achieved, and changing the definition of full employment will not change the need for jobs.

On foreign policy, the AFL-CIO asserted the "moral obligation" of the United States "to defend freedom and to lead the free world."

It declared unyielding opposition to governments that suppress freedom, whether they be "dictatorships of the right or the left."

Urging negotiation from strength, not weakness, the AFL-CIO declared: "We do not ask both parties to ban the word 'detente' from the political vocabulary; we ask them to ban the current policy of appeasement that word now represents."

In the domestic policy arena, the federation asserted the government's obligation "to break down discrimination, to provide opportunity, to feed the hungry, to educate the young."

Meany acknowledged that it is "politically fashionable" for politicians to attack "big government" and the social programs the phrase represents.

Labor unashamedly insists that what America needs is more and better social programs, not cutbacks, Meany declared.

Social security "can be better," he said. America needs "more" public education. Medicare and Medicaid have helped, but "it is time to extend that help to all people through comprehensive national health insurance."

The economy was saved from depression last year by the "old" social programs, Meany stressed—"unemployment insurance, social security, public service jobs, food stamps and welfare, combined with the tried-and-true policy of increasing consumer buying power through a tax cut for low and middle-income families."

Meany urged America's political parties to adopt "positive programs" and then "bind standard bearers and legislative leaders to keeping the party's word as put forth in the platform."

The American people are not afraid of the truth, Meany said. But they "have been lied to too often, for too long."

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM COMMITTEE, in foreground, listens to the AFL-CIO's proposals at hearings held in the Senate Caucus Room. Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller presents the federation's statement on behalf of President George Meany. The same proposals will be made to the Republican Party.

NBC Strikers Balloting On Contract Approval

Negotiators for 1,700 newswriters, engineers and technicians employed by the National Broadcasting Company have recommended acceptance of a tentative new agreement with the network.

If approved by the members of the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians, the contract settlement would end a strike that began on Apr. 1. NABET said the ratification vote was slated for completion by midnight May 21.

The union said its members could return to work on May 24 if the pact is ratified. Under the proposed settlement, the contract would provide annual pay increases over four years of 9.33 percent, 7.32 percent, 6.81 percent and 6.38 percent.

For the 1,200 engineers covered by the agreement, top scale of $375 a week under the old contract would jump to $410 immediately, $440 in the second year, $470 the third year, and $500 in the fourth year.

Newswriters' pay would rise from the present $400 a week to $500 in the fourth year. Improvements in life insurance coverage and in early retirement also were written into the pact.

A week earlier, the union's membership had rejected another proposed settlement by a substantial vote. The pact was not recommended by NABET negotiators.

The strike, which began on Apr. 1, centered mainly on NBC's facilities in New York, Washington, Cleveland, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco. The strike became a lockout on Apr. 7 when NBC refused to allow union members to return to work while negotiations continued.

Firm Guilty of Surface Bargaining Ordered to Pay Union's Expenses

Cadillac, Mich.—An administrative law judge of the National Labor Relations Board has ordered the Fetzer Broadcasting Co. to reimburse a union for expenses it incurred while the company engaged in bad-faith and surface bargaining.

The unusual remedy was part of the "affirmative action" recommended by Judge Robert E. Mullin to accord equitable relief to Local 410 of the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians.

Mullin found the company had bargained in bad faith over a six-month period while the NABET local tried to reach an agreement for employes of the broadcasting firm. Fetzer maintains an office and place of business here, as well as in three other Michigan cities where it is engaged in radio and television broadcasting.

NABET was certified as the bargaining agent for Fetzer's employes in Cadillac, Traverse City and Sault Ste. Marie in July 1974. The union still is trying to negotiate a first contract for the company's news announcers, radio announcers, TV production personnel and broadcast engineers.

The union filed unfair practice charges against Fetzer in 1974. In May 1975 Fetzer admitted to bargaining in bad faith, engaging in surface bargaining and other unfair practices.

Last October, NABET again charged the firm with bad-faith bargaining. After a four-day hearing in January, Mullin found that the company's defenses "have been largely 'meritless on their face' and clearly intended to burden the processes of the board and the courts."

Citing a 1974 NLRB ruling involving another employer, Mullin ordered Fetzer to stop bargaining in bad faith and discriminating against its employes for supporting the union or testfying before the NLRB, and to "reimburse the union for all ascertainable bargaining expenses which it incurred in its negotiations . . . from June 23, 1975, until Jan. 11, 1976."

In his decision, Mullin observed that the NLRB "has often reiterated the well settled proposition that 'the obligation to bargain collectively does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession.'

"Nevertheless, the Board may consider the totality of the employer's conduct in arriving at a determination as to his motive," he said.

"Here the respondent took bargaining positions . . . which plainly demonstrated its predetermination never to reach an agreement with the employe representative."

ILO Guidelines Adopted For Public Employes

Geneva—A master guide for guaranteeing "fair and equitable conditions of employment" for civil servants everywhere was drafted here by trade union and government delegates under the auspices of the International Labor Organization.

"No disciplinary procedures may be undertaken nor sanctions imposed on account of normal trade union activities," the ILO joint committee on public service ruled in its conclusions on disciplinary codes and procedures.

Working conditions and employment practices as they apply to public servants, whether employed by national, state or local administrations, constituted another major item before the 8-day committee session.

Because governments are the employers of public service workers the joint committee is an exception to the tripartite procedure that otherwise provides representation to workers, employers and governments throughout the ILO, a United Nations specialized agency.

Ray L. Perry of the Fire Fighters, the U.S. worker representative on the committee, said its conclusions will provide valuable ammunition for the AFL-CIO's new Public Employee Dept. in fighting for its legislative objectives.

Perry noted that Congress now has before it amendments to the National Labor Relations Act that would extend collective bargaining rights to all public workers.

"I believe," Perry said in reviewing the committee's results, "that the positions taken by government representatives and leaders of the labor movement from all over the world will certainly strengthen our chances of getting these amendments adopted."

Civil servants should participate through their union in the drafting of all disciplinary codes and procedures, the committee said in its report, which goes to the ILO Governing Body for action.

In no circumstances, the committee continued, is any breach of such codes to be charged on the "basis of race, color, sex or religion, nor on the basis of the exercise of civil and political rights."

"Every public servant must have the right to be defended by his trade union or by a person of his choice at all stages" of any disciplinary action taken against him, the committee said.

Another conclusion called for the appropriate authorities to "establish common standards of recruitment for local public employes and conditions free from all forms of discrimination."

Civil servants should be able to follow training programs aimed at enabling them to combine "serving the best interests of the public with the ambition to advance their careers," the report said.

The committee urged that security of employment be made a "fundamental principle" of public service and that pay rates be sufficiently high to "attract and retain suitably qualified personnel."

A 40-hour week, spread over five working days, should be the goal everywhere, the committee said, as should be a minimum of four weeks vacation a year at regular pay rates.

O. W. Jacobson Heads Carmen, Krause Retires

Kansas City—Orville W. Jacobson assumed the office of president of the Railway Carmen on May 22 here, succeeding Anthony L. Krause, who has retired.

Jacobson has served as the union's assistant president since his appointment to the post in 1971. He was elected to the position in 1973.

Krause, a member of the Carmen for 49 years, is 70 years old. At a pre-retirement dinner in his honor last month, the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. cited Krause for his "outstanding accomplishments" as the Carmen's leader.

Jacobson began his railroading career in 1939 as a carman apprentice on the Great Northern Railroad, now part of the Burlington Northern System. He held various posts with Carmen's Lodge 811 in Superior, Wis., and was subsequently elected chairman of the Local Protective Board in 1955.

In 1960, Jacobson was elected chairman of the Great Northern Joint Protective Board. At the Grand Lodge convention in 1963, he was elected to the executive board and served as its secretary and vice chairman until his appointment in 1967 as vice president.

In 1968, he was elected to the vice presidency, serving in that post until his appointment as assistant president.

The Real School Issue

FEW ISSUES IN OUR TIME have generated as much heat and confusion as this matter of simple justice: public acknowledgement that every American child, regardless of race, creed or color, has an equal right to the highest standard of education available. There should be no doubts, no resistance, no need for court orders to achieve this basic, democratic goal.

And in many cities where the justice of desegregation was recognized, there were good faith efforts, careful planning, fair and workable procedures—teachers, parents and children were kept informed every step of the way—and the forecasts of turmoil proved groundless.

The problems not only proved surmountable, most didn't even exist, except in the imaginations of the fearful. Fear caused the outbreaks of violence that have characterized every reactionary attack on desegregation from Little Rock to Louisville and Boston.

Fear of the unknown. Fear on the part of people that are somehow, in some way, being pushed around again. Fear that others are gaining an unfair advantage. Fear arising from ignorance and misunderstanding. Fear exploited and inflamed by those who seek power positions for themselves and who are willing to destroy communities as long as they end up controlling the wreckage.

Desegregation of schools is moving ahead. And the South is setting an example the rest of the country should follow. In the North and the border states too many considered racial discrimination exclusively a problem of the South. Many northern liberals flattered themselves that their part of the country was somehow more reasonable, more deeply committed to democratic values, that selfishness and exclusiveness and distrust of strangers ran less deep.

Well, they were wrong. No region has a corner on virtue or goodwill or common sense. There are saints and sinners and peacemakers and mischiefmakers everywhere. And there is discrimination in the North. And the courts have ordered it be abolished in the schools because it violates the Constitution.

THE ISSUE is quality education. The issue is the right of every child to have equal access to that quality education. Ideally that child ought to be able to get quality education in a neighborhood school. But if the community refuses, if a federal judge finds the Constitution is being violated and orders busing as the only way to obtain that quality education, then there must be busing.

Union members know, through their experience at the bargaining table, that there are no problems that can't be solved if there is good faith on all sides and if all parties are looking for solutions, not for conflict.

We in the labor movement are determined to find solutions that are just and fair, that meet the constitutional and moral requirements of equality.

How a Hairy Matter Cluttered The Federal Court Dockets

By John P. Roche

IF YOU HAVE EVER wondered why the course of justice in the United States is so slow and dockets are so packed with impending litigation, perhaps a recent Supreme Court decision—Kelley v. Johnson—will clarify the matter.

Before going into the substance of the opinion, let's examine the history of the case. It began with a decision by the U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (one of the busiest tribunals in the country) in favor of Kelley. The U.S. Court of Appeals, 2d Circuit (also overwhelmed with work) reversed the district judge and sent the case back for a rehearing.

Presumably getting the message, the district court tilted the other way, and (to no one's surprise) this time the court of appeals affirmed the lower court. An appeal was requested from the Supreme Court, granted, and the high court reversed the circuit and, in essence, sustained the district judge's first holding.

Obviously with all this judicial scrutiny the issue must have been world-shaking—the right of a community to bar anyone worth less than $50,000 from residence, the validity of cross-country busing for integration, or some criminal cause celebre. Well, maybe some will think it momentous, but the point at issue was the right of the Suffolk County, N.Y., police commissioner to enforce the following regulation:

"HAIR: Hair shall be neat, clean, trimmed, and present a groomed appearance. Hair will not touch the ears or the collar except the closely cut hair on the back of the neck. Hair in front will be groomed so that it does not fall below the band of properly worn headgear. In no case will the bulk or length of the hair interfere with the proper wear of any authorized headgear." There were other, similar instructions on sideburns, mustaches, wigs; beards were banned "except for medical reasons" and ponytails absolutely outlawed.

Johnson, a policeman affronted by these regulations, brought suit under the U.S. Civil Rights Act of 1871 on the ground that they violated his right to free expression under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Police Commissioner Kelley replied that uniformity of grooming was part of the department's "esprit de corps," and that—in essence—the good people of Suffolk County did not want their cops to look like hippies.

The issue here is not really hair-styling, a matter on which tastes vary from one subculture to another (and from one nation to another: the Swedish Army has hairnets as government issue, presumably to keep the curls out of the rifleman's eyes). It is the right of a democratic community to establish certain standards for public officials. Few, I think, would argue that building inspectors going over construction projects should not be required to wear hard-hats—even if they love to let their locks float in the breeze. Here the reply can be made that hard-hats are functional, are necessary for protection, while haircuts are of no practical utility.

THIS MAY HAVE some merit, but we should not forget that the role the police play in our society is largely symbolic. In a free society most of the policing is done by citizens who accept the laws and abide by them. (Doomsday Druids complain about the breakdown of law and order, but they omit the scale factor from consideration: if 1 percent of our population is criminally insane, the net amounts to 2.1 million people. If 2 percent are crooks, you're up to 4.2 million, and the police and armed forces are outnumbered.)

The role of the police, in short, is exemplary: They are the incarnation of public order. As such, it seems to me that certain reasonable rules are in order regarding dress, grooming, alcoholic intake on duty, and the like. Again, circumstances differ: Our friendly neighborhood policewoman on Martha's Vineyard can certainly guard the beach barefoot without offense, but a barefoot cop in Queens, N.Y., could understandably generate some uproar.

Above all, common sense should be applied. We hardly need the example of an Italian carabiniere dolled up like a peacock, but on the other hand we should avoid Abbie Hoffmans decked out in blue. Finally, why should it take trips to five federal courtrooms to confirm the obvious?

AFL-CIO Message:

Moral Direction for Nation Essential to Party Platforms

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO's presentation to the Democratic Platform Committee in Washington.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE have traditionally had confidence in the moral rightness of their system of government. They were certain it would conform, in Webster's terms, to the right ideals or principles of human conduct. Events of the four years since the major political parties last wrote their platforms have severely shaken that confidence, leading many Americans to question the direction their nation is taking.

In that period, a President and Vice President were forced to resign for unrelated criminal acts. Many leading U.S. corporations and business executives admitted widespread bribery and political payoffs at home and abroad.

The people learned their government had deceived them about foreign affairs, allowed respected agencies to violate the civil rights of citizens, and misled them about the nation's economic health, thus causing widespread hardship and suffering.

As we perceive it, morality, as it applies to government, goes far beyond the avoidance of simple criminality to a philosophy that places people, their welfare and their liberty above all else. It encompasses the manner in which a government conducts its relations with other countries and with its own citizens.

Our belief that morality must be restored to government policies at home and abroad is the bedrock of the AFL-CIO Program for America. We are presenting it, in identical language, to the platform committees of both major political parties, for we know morality is not divisible along party lines.

Governmental morality cannot be defined in dollar amounts, placed on a chart, or reduced to a political slogan. It can't be bought, sold, traded or negotiated away. We do not think morality is old-fashioned or naive, and we reject the notion that any "new realism" is equal to or higher than morality.

Therefore, we have prepared detailed suggestions on a great many issues. Taken individually, they are programs for a better America and a better world. In sum, they are a rededication to the philosophy so eloquently expressed in the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these Truths to be self-evident, that all Men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness—That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed."

As both parties seek the consent of the governed in this election, their platform proposals on economic, foreign and domestic policy must answer this question: "Which way, America?"

The AFL-CIO believes there is only one way—the way that puts people first, that rejects arbitrary and artificial limits on what a government can and must do to help its citizens, that places the freedom of people above the politics of governments.

THE MAJOR PROBLEMS confronting America are national in scope and can be resolved only by national solutions, national leadership and national commitment.

It is to these national issues that both parties should address their platforms. We believe that platforms must be above regional, petty self-interest, partisan bickering or the divisionary rhetoric of the demagogue. They must present positive programs—programs around which the people can unite—in order to restore public confidence in the political institutions of this country.

Above all else, platforms should provide moral, as well as economic and political, direction to the conduct of this nation's affairs for the next four years.

The candor we seek must be genuine—not cosmetic. The American people have been lied to too often, for too long. They are rightly suspicious of parties and candidates who try to be all things to all people or attempt to disguise a lack of substance with political slogans.

The lesson of Watergate is not one of human weakness or that the system ultimately worked to cleanse itself. It is that the American people are not afraid of the truth.

During the darkest days of Watergate, some who lacked confidence in the people, said that America could not stand the truth. The truth, they claimed—an impeachment inquiry and trial—would tear the nation apart. That was nonsense. When the truth finally did emerge, it had exactly the opposite effect as all who truly believed in this nation's character knew it would.

It is nonsense, too, to contend that the American people cannot properly determine the course their country should take in the future, to answer the question: "Which way, America?"

No problem is too tough or too sensitive for the people of this nation to solve if its dimensions are squarely laid out to them.

That is what both parties must do in their platforms: Present both the issues and the proposed solutions squarely; restore public confidence by honestly and factually presenting the party's proposals for the next four years; bind standard bearers and legislative leaders to keeping the party's word as put forth in the platform; end the duplicity that undermines public confidence in the candor, honesty and effectiveness of government.

Nothing else would be worthy of the spirit and true meaning of the Declaration of Independence. Nothing less will be acceptable to the American people.

Unions Negotiate Coverage:

Group Legal Services Plans Promote Cost, Quality Controls

PREPAID GROUP legal service plans now make it possible for a growing number of working families to get expert legal guidance they need in day-to-day transactions, but seldom could afford, Robert Connerton, general counsel of the Laborers, said on Labor News Conference.

Stressing that almost endless laws, rules and regulations in today's complex society make legal advice a needed central service, Connerton said several unions have won prepaid group legal service plans in labor contract negotiations. He said that the Laborers have achieved 14 such plans that cover some 250,000 union members and their dependents, and that a large number of church, consumer, student and other organizations also have established prepaid group legal service plans outside the employer-employe relationship.

Appearing with Connerton on the network radio interview was Charles Baron, executive director of the Resource Center for Consumers of Legal Services, who said a key aim of the movement is to establish tight consumer controls that will hold down the costs and boost the quality of legal services to group members.

Baron said that closed panel plans which encourage preventive services offer the most effective consumer controls, but that bar associations and legal societies are pushing hard for open panel or fee-for-service plans, which hold the potential for making millionaires of lawyers as they have for doctors in open panel health care plans.

Baron said the contention of some lawyers that closed panel group legal service plans will put small law firms out of business just doesn't stand up. "There will always be a market for that kind of legal service" and, he added, "there is no reason why a closed panel arrangement can't be made with a one-man law office—and frequently that is done."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

OVER THE PAST four years, the federal government has given $25 billion to the 50 states and some 39,000 local units of government. This is the program known as general revenue sharing.

This money—$7 billion already in 1976—goes to the governors and mayors and city councils with no strings attached. And that is the complaint of organized labor, civil rights leaders, congressional liberals and citizen groups.

The program expires Dec. 31, and there has been a little-publicized struggle under way in the nation's capital over the revenue sharing program.

President Ford's approach is simple enough. As the House GOP leader in 1972, he strongly supported then-President Nixon's revenue sharing plan, a building block in the so-called New Federalism. Ford has proposed a five-year, nine-month extension and wants the total boosted to nearly $40 billion.

Several grassroots organizations have monitored the use of revenue sharing funds over the past few years. One such group is the Southern Governmental Monitoring Project, created by the Southern Regional Council in 1973 and financed by several foundations. The project conducted investigations in 60 southern cities and towns and came up with examples like these:

- After the voters of Chatham County (Savannah), Ga., defeated a bond issue for a new $9 billion courthouse, the county commission voted to fund the courthouse with revenue sharing money.
- In Hinds County (Jackson), Miss., voters twice turned down bond issues to build a new jail. But the county commissioners decided to use revenue sharing money and earmarked almost all the county's $4 million in revenue sharing funds for the jail project.
- In Baton Rouge, La., voters twice defeated bond issues for a proposed civic center. Nevertheless, revenue sharing funds are being used on the project.

Carol Rose, author of the Monitoring Project's report, concluded that "the lack of citizen participation in revenue sharing is contrary to the justification for revenue sharing—that local governments are closer to the people than federal officials" and therefore better reflect people's needs.

INDEED, THE REPORT SAYS, revenue sharing as it now operates may increase the distance between citizen and local government. Local officials can do pretty much what they want while avoiding tax increases or bond issues.

Organized labor has been a longtime critic of no-strings revenue sharing. Labor believes the revenue sharing program should be abolished unless certain federal guidelines and standards are made an integral part of such funding.

Labor wants to see the allocation and entitlement formula revised to steer funds toward essential public facilities and services, particularly in urban areas desperately short of revenue.

Public employe unions have told Congress that there must be a strong federal role in setting standards for employe protection, civil rights and tax reform at the state and local levels. Labor feels revenue sharing should be used to reward those states that move toward fairer and more progressive methods of raising tax revenue.

As things now stand, legislation to extend revenue sharing is moving very slowly through Congress. The improvements in the program are so limited that they may inspire strong opposition to any extension by the end of the year.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights—a coalition of labor, civil rights and citizen groups—looked at the mild changes and the lack of incentives for tax reform and declared:

"The needs for full employment, housing, education, health care and welfare reform are too urgent to allow the squandering of $6.5 billion a year on a program which is basically anti-people and anti-cities."

EXPERT LEGAL GUIDANCE working families need for day-to-day transactions but seldom can afford is now available to growing numbers of union members through negotiated group plans, Robert Connerton, second from left, general counsel of the Laborers, and Charles Baron, third from left, executive director of the Resource Center for Consumers of Legal Services, reported on Labor News Conference. They were questioned by Sara Fritz of United Press International and John Grimes, freelance labor and economics writer.

How to Buy:

Tests of Advertising Claims Offer Useful Shopping Clues

By Sydney Margolius

RECENT CHALLENGES to various product advertising claims offer revealing clues to which claims may be reasonably accurate and which may be exaggerated.

The National Advertising Division (NAD) of the Council of Better Business Bureaus reviews the challenges. The review board represents an effort by the BBBs to voluntarily regulate and control inflated and even false ad claims.

By April 1976 NAD had reviewed about 1,030 challenges. Of these, about 36 percent were dismissed because the ads were considered to be sufficiently supported, 32 percent required modification or had been discontinued by the advertisers, and about 30 percent were closed for lack of jurisdiction or referred to other authorities such as the postal service.

We've analyzed the more recent decisions made by the review board and have selected a number that offer useful information to customers:

CLEANING PRODUCTS: Some of the most active advertisers are manufacturers of cleaning products, and their claims have been the subject of a number of challenges.

One involved Wisk detergent, often advertised this way: "Used as we say, Wisk gets out these stains better than pre-soaking, better than cleaning, better than washing with powders."

The review board found that Wisk did get stains out, but not necessarily better for all types of stains and fabrics.

The review board did find accurate claims that 20 Mule Power Bathroom Cleaner is "The industrial strength bathroom cleaner. It's more stubborn than scale . . . tougher than mold and mildew."

The substantiating data showed that 20 Mule Team is comparable to industrial cleaners and has an active ingredient level higher than regular cleaners. The data also confirmed that this product controls fungicide and mildew.

Less successful was the claim for New Formula Dow Bathroom Cleaner that it "scrubs away soap scum better than any other aerosol bathroom cleaner." The review board reported that tests showed some margin of superiority over a competitive product but not a significant advantage. The claim was discontinued.

Another interesting finding involved a claim for Dial soap that "now you get even more (deodorant protection) with Family Size Dial." But, the review board pointed out, that's only because the bar is larger.

The review board did consider substantiated the claim that "Biz out-cleans and out-whittens any color-safe bleach." Tests found that Biz was "significantly better" in whitening and cleaning fabrics than either of the color safe bleaches.

But the best money-saver still is to use the low-cost basic ingredients. These are: ammonia, chlorine bleach, borax, and baking soda.

DOG FOODS: These have become a big business and among the most advertised products with, inevitably, a number of challenges to the veracity of claims. For example, the Carnation Co. claimed that new Mighty Dog "tastes better than any other dog food."

The review board, however, wasn't satisfied with the tests supporting the taste claim, and also felt that a complete nourishment claim was not adequately verified. The advertiser agreed to revise the commercial.

MATTRESSES: Consumers often have wondered if mattresses sold as "hotel" type actually are superior to ordinary mattresses. In at least one case, the ad review board found some evidence of superiority. While the board pointed out that there are no industry standards to support this designation, one challenged advertiser, Sealy Inc., submitted evidence showing that its "motel" mattresses did have extra reinforcements, and more durable materials.

FURNITURE POLISH: One of the most prominent battles recently has been between Behold and Pledge. In the TV commercial a man shows a housewife that Behold removed a "waxy grease mark" more effectively than did Pledge.

But the review board felt it was improper to suggest overall superiority based on a demonstrated superiority in cleaning only one type of stain. The company agreed to discontinue the commercials in that form.

Another recent claim was for Favor furniture polish; that it "really cleans, cuts through dirt and old wax." When challenged, this advertiser offered no substantiation but merely said the commercial has been discontinued.

SIGNS TO PROMOTE greater awareness among union members and the public of the role union craftsmen have in community development are the focus of a joint effort by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Displaying a sample sign are from left BCTD President Robert A. Georgine, ULSTD Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid and Joseph F. Curtice, business representative of the Washington, D.C., Building & Construction Trades Council.

Poor Diets Among Well-Fed:

Undernourishment In a Land of Plenty

By Gus Tyler

AMERICA IS UNDERNOURISHED—not because we don't eat enough but because we don't eat enough of the right food.

Over the years, diets have been deteriorating—despite regulations of the Food & Drug Administration, labeling, and food awareness.

To nutritionists, this is an old story. But a recent survey ordered by Congress once more reveals the malevolently hidden hunger among the well-feds.

A 10-state study shows serious health problems because of inadequate nutrition: alarmingly low levels of vitamins A and C and iron deficiency anemia.

"It is now clear that the United States is by no means immune to the health hazards associated with poor diet," comments Dr. Charles C. Edwards, an assistant secretary of the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. "We spend billions of dollars every year to deal with health problems which could be prevented through better nutrition, prevention of accidents, and more effective health education."

The current report confirms the accumulated findings of the last 20 years. A 1955-65 survey showed that the number of families with poor diets had risen in that decade from 15 percent to 21 percent. ("Poor diets" are those with less than two-thirds of the recommended dietary allowance—RDA.)

A 1970s study by HANES (Health and Nutrition Examination Survey) found that more than half the country was suffering from malnutrition. Vitamin A intake was below level for 40 percent of children age 1 to 5 and 75 percent of females age 18 to 44. About 95 percent of the same categories had below-normal iron intake.

Congress has enacted many well-intentioned programs to make food available to the poorly fed through school lunches and breakfasts, the distribution of 1.5 billion pints of milk in 1974, food stamps, and WIC—a program to get high-protein to pregnant women, infants and children who are "nutritional risks."

While all this is commendable and necessary (low-income families show a much higher rate of diet deficiency than do better-income households), the fact remains that we have no sure way of knowing how effective they are.

A food stamp program, for instance, may be a reasonable approach to assisting a family with its food bill, but it does not deal with nutrition as a health goal.

NOR ARE THE food faddists the answer. While rising awareness of nutritional needs may serve a positive purpose when put to knowledgeable use, an uninformed public can be abused by quacks.

Thus Nutrition Review (July 1974) complains that "the most widespread and expensive type of quackery in the United States today is the promotion of vitamin products, special dietary foods and food supplements."

The National Academy of Science has set up a Committee on Nutritional Information to "combat unsubstantiated, inaccurate or misleading information" on foods. What America lacks right now, is a clear understanding of "nutrition objectives."

Sen. Hubert Humphrey recently told his congressional colleagues, "The severity of the problem comes as a harsh reality." Humphrey said he believes that the sums presently allocated to nutrition research are laughably ineffectual. He wants to get moving so we don't end up as a nation of overfed, undernourished people.

Soup to Nonsense:

This Jane Goodsell Column Is Written by Jane Goodsell

By Jane Goodsell

I USED TO GNASH my teeth over the manufacturers' name plates on my household appliances. Those chrome-plated letters, impossible to remove and next-to-impossible to keep clean, seemed to me an infringement of my property rights. My stove, refrigerator and dishwasher were mine, bought and paid for. If anybody's name was on them, it ought to be my name and not Frigidaire's or Westinghouse's. Why should I advertise their products for them, and for free, in my own kitchen? The nerve of them!

Just suppose, I used to suppose, that dress designers attached their labels permanently to the front of their dresses. Just imagine handbag manufacturers printing their names in big bold letters on the outside of their purses.

Well, I no longer have to imagine and just suppose because, like a number of other things I thought couldn't ever happen, it's happened. Only on a larger scale than I ever dreamed possible. Whereas I supposed small, in terms of visible labels, bolder imaginations dreamed up the concept of making the entire product an advertisement of itself. It's not called advertising but "the designer signature," which is a nicer way of putting it.

I first encountered it a number of years ago at a luncheon. The table was set with gaily printed place mats which had the name "Vera" printed on them in a dashing script. This puzzled me because the hostess's name was not Vera. It was Harriet.

Eventually (I catch on to these things more slowly than most people do) I got the picture. The place mats did not belong to Vera. She had designed them. Her name printed on them was not to be thought of as a commercial trademark, even though it is one, but as an artist's signature. Looked at like this (which is how you're supposed to look at it), a designer signature turns into a status symbol that elevates a piece of merchandise into a piece of art. Naturally, this makes it cost more. If it didn't, it wouldn't have any status.

IT MUST ALSO BE recognized for what it is to attract the attention it deserves. The purchaser of a signed Givenchy tee shirt need have no worries on that score Anyone who can read can identify it instantly. It's spelled out G I V E N C H Y, smack down the front, in bold black letters. And even the uninitiated who wonder "Givenchy who?" can't help but be impressed. Clearly, anything that proclaims its name that proudly must have a name to be proud of.

No doubt about it, the designer signature is a workable concept that eliminates a lot of guesswork for all concerned. Yet I can't help but remember, and rather wistfully, when I used to wear blouses that had my own name embroidered on their collars. And I can't help wondering what they'll think of next. I don't suppose they'd actually go so far as to print the price of a dress all over the fabric. I can't imagine their doing something as crass as that. But I'm not taking any bets that it won't happen.

At Biennial Convention:

CLC Maps Protest On Wage Controls

Quebec City—The Canadian Labor Congress has given its 30-member executive council a mandate "to organize and conduct a general work stoppage or stoppages if and when necessary" as a protest against federal wage controls in effect since last October.

The 2,500 delegates to the CLC's biennial convention also adopted a policy statement calling for a stronger role for labor in national policy making.

And it heard a warning from CLC President Joe Morris that organized labor may have to restructure itself drastically, "centralizing its power at the national level," if the country "decides to live with controls."

In his presidential address, Morris said the labor movement faces a twofold challenge: "to defeat wage controls and to mobilize our strength behind the task of creating a more equitable and just society in the wake of that defeat.

"The introduction of controls necessitates the development of decontrols, and by this the government means more direct powers of economic management by itself."

The policy statement said organized labor wants an equal share with government and business in economic and social decision-making on a national basis. And the price of labor's cooperation would be a program that recognizes:

- The right to employment for a living wage "as a cornerstone of a productive and equitable society."
- The need to create jobs "as a first economic priority."
- A commitment to redress Canada's "unacceptable record in distributing income."
- The need to restrain the power of corporations to set prices and require that private investment decisions should "serve the interests of the ordinary people."

But to take this stand the CLC needs more power, the statement said.

"There must be agreement between all affiliates that a full and cooperative and coordinated effort will be forthcoming to guarantee that the CLC is operating from a position of strength.

"The executive council as the responsible decision-making body between conventions must be assured that the policies and decisions it makes will be closely followed by all the affiliates."

In the opening sessions, the delegates also tackled the issue of representation at future conventions. The CLC remains the only national labor center in the world that gives each local of its affiliated unions the right to send a delegate to its biennial convention.

A proposal from the executive council to change the status quo, and have representation based on the number of Canadian members in each union, was defeated. Instead, the delegates adopted a motion calling for a study of convention methods in Europe where seating of delegates is often theater-style instead of at tables as is done in Canada.

There are a potential 8,500 eligible delegates to conventions and it is getting hard to find halls big enough to hold them, CLC officers noted. The 1978 convention will be in Winnipeg, Manitoba, which has a convention center that can seat 4,000 at tables.

About 75 percent of Canadian locals have fewer than 200 members and many of them can't afford to send delegates to the convention.

FUTURE COURSE of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is outlined by Assistant Labor Sec. Morton Corn at a briefing for labor editors at AFL-CIO headquarters. The question-and-answer session was arranged by the International Labor Press Association.

OSHA Seeks Improved Showing Under First Professional Chief

By John R. Oravec

Running the federal job safety agency can be a hazardous occupation that requires the adroitness of a high-rise girder-walker, Dr. Morton Corn suggested at a briefing for labor editors on what direction the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is headed.

Corn, who took over as Assistant Labor Secretary for OSHA five months ago, outlined his plans for the reorganization of the agency within the limitations of government regulations and in an Administration that labor views as closely aligned with employer interests.

While expressing concern for the problems of small businessmen in meeting OSHA's standards, Corn pledged to maintain an open-door policy with all interested parties involved in workplace safety and health regulations.

Corn is the first professional in the job safety and health field to head the five-year-old agency. He came from the University of Pittsburgh, where he was a professor in the Dept. of Occupational Health in the Graduate School of Public Health.

Speaking at a question-and-answer session arranged by the International Labor Press Association, Corn acknowledged that union safety experts would undoubtedly disagree in some courses of action OSHA would be taking in the future—as they have in the past. But he predicted that the differences "will be fewer in number."

An unresolved issue of prime concern to labor is the agency's emphasis on expanding on-site consultative services for employers, particularly in the small business area. The AFL-CIO has expressed fears that added government financing of the consultative programs would drain needed funds from OSHA's enforcement efforts and the staffing of compliance officers and occupational health personnel.

Corn pointed out that the agency's capacity is limited since each year only a small number of the nation's 5 million workplaces under OSHA jurisdiction can be inspected.

"We inspect 2 percent of the facilities. Maybe we will inspect 4 percent of the facilities in a few years, which means 96 percent of the facilities would not get a visit from OSHA."

He defended the on-site consultation program as a step toward bringing more employers into conformity with federal regulations. And he suggested that most employers are willing to comply with OSHA standards if given the proper encouragement and guidance.

Corn conceded that only a small percentage of employers currently are seeking consultative services, but he said wider use is being made of informational resources to encourage them to come to OSHA for help in meeting government standards.

Another area of concern on which Corn fielded questions dealt with the long delays in development of new safety and health standards because of Administration-required inflation impact statements.

Corn acknowledged that standard-setting is a "very long process" but pointed out that the inflation impact statements are required by a presidential executive order.

He said the agency has taken steps to speed up the standards process and assured the labor editors "you will see the products coming out the door."

He said one of the problems the agency faces is recruitment of qualified toxicologists and industrial hygienists for its staff.

He also pledged that the impact statement on a noise standard that organized labor has been seeking would be issued within weeks and that a proposed standard would follow shortly.

Corn said he remains opposed to labor's efforts to transfer mine safety enforcement from the Interior Dept. to the Labor Dept. at this time.

"We are struggling to get this agency on track," he said, "and the transfer of MESA at this time could be an overwhelming burden to the department and to the effort in progress."

Tonelli Cites Problems Common to Both Nations

Quebec City—The wage controls imposed by the Canadian government last October are a dramatic example of the common problems facing Canadian and American workers, President Joseph P. Tonelli of the Paperworkers declared here.

Tonelli said the Canadian controls are reminiscent of "our own disastrous forays into wage and price controls under the Nixon Administration."

Addressing the Canadian Labor Congress convention as the AFL-CIO fraternal delegate, he noted that in the United States as in Canada, while wages were controlled "the effort to put a lid on prices was a dismal failure, and excess profits were allowed to go right on being excessive."

Tonelli said both Canadian and American workers have suffered because of multinational corporations. At the end of 1975 unemployment in the two countries "was the highest in the developed world."

Both movements had asked for national legislation "to ensure the accountability" of multinationals and measure their impact on employment investment and productivity.

He also told the delegates the AFL-CIO has asked for an end to preferential tax treatment of multinational foreign operations, and for repeal of provisions of tax law that permit the establishment of Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISCs).

But the two labor movements must also defend themselves against a "new creature that has appeared on the scene" — state-controlled, transnational enterprises.

The Soviet Union, which has been involved in international campaigns against multinational corporations "has at least 40 enterprises doing business in the West," Tonelli pointed out.

He said the AFL-CIO has encouraged its affiliates to participate in international trade secretariats as one way of "strengthening the bonds between free labor movements."

While there are differences between the Canadian and American labor movements, Tonelli said, the two have a great deal in common: "The traditions, history and heritage that we share go beyond the bonds that we in the United States share with any other labor organization in the world."

Antioch School of Law Cites Wurf with Award

The Antioch School of Law presented one of its six Urban Justice Awards to President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees, at a dinner May 20. The law school is located in Washington, D.C., and is affiliated with Antioch College at Yellow Springs, Ohio. Wurf was cited for leadership in labor and civil rights.

National Union Formed By Provincial Employes

Quebec City—Five unions have merged to form the 107,000-member National Union of Provincial Government Employees—Canada's fifth largest union.

The founding convention was held here on the eve of the biennial convention of the 2-million member Canadian Labor Congress.

Provincial employes' unions in British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, which had been separate affiliates of the CLC, now have become components of NUPGE. But missing from NUPGE are employes of the five other provincial governments, including 56,000 in Ontario and 30,000 in Quebec.

CLC officials expressed confidence that the Quebec group will join NUPGE soon, and its senior officials attended the founding convention.

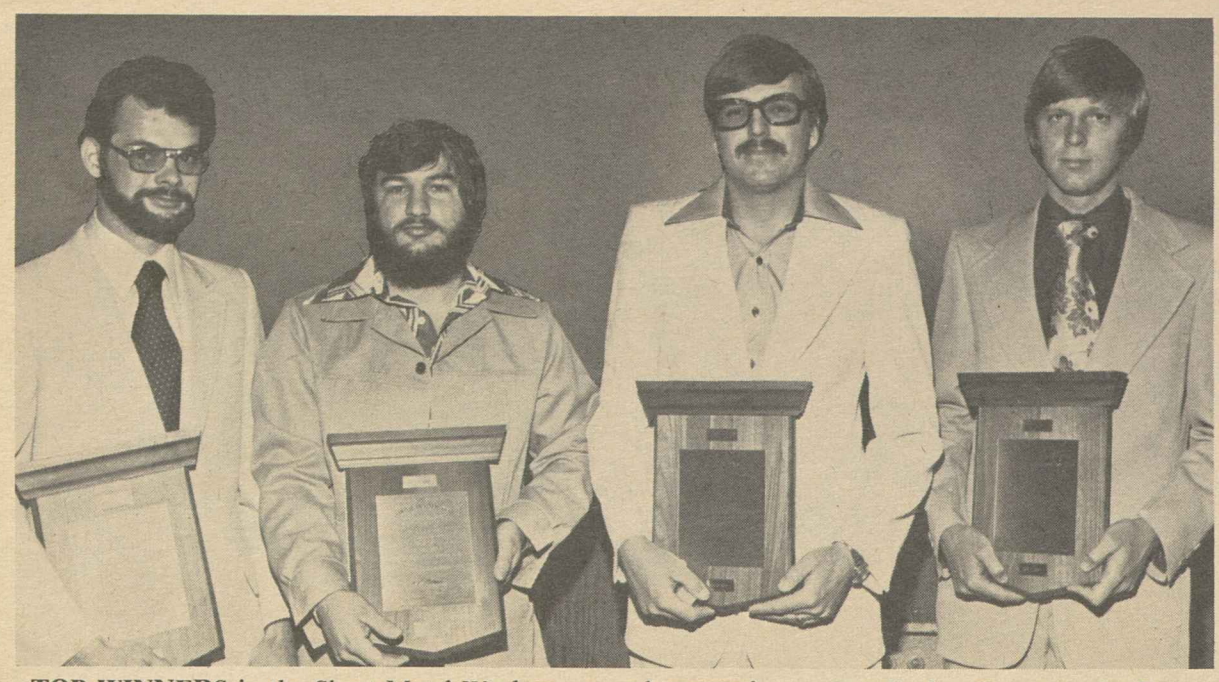
They also expect the Ontario Provincial Government Employees Union will join, but said that may take some time. The Ontario union had affiliated with the CLC as a first step towards joining NUPGE. But its leaders had second thoughts, and it withdrew from the CLC. Now the only way it can get back into the CLC is as a component of NUPGE.

William Ridgeway of Grosse Isle, Manitoba, who was elected NUPGE's president, said one of the new union's main jobs will be to fight the federal government's anti-inflation program with its stringent wage controls.

"Our members negotiate with provincial governments," he said. "But provincial governments are cooperating with the federal program and implementing spending cutbacks that hurt their own employes."

CLC Executive Vice President Shirley Carr said the new union "will bridge the gap for public service employes between the municipal and federal levels."

The 210,000-member Canadian Union of Public Employees represents most municipal workers and the 140,000-member Public Service Alliance of Canada represents most employes of the federal government.



NUPGE will open its national office in Ottawa July 1, the day Canada celebrates its country's birthday.

Booe Named Aide To CWA President

James B. Booe, a vice president of the Communications Workers and director of the Pacific-Northwest district since 1970, has been named assistant to CWA President Glenn E. Watts.

Booe succeeds Richard W. Hackler, who had been elevated to the post of executive vice president by the union's executive board.

The board also designated Avelino B. Montes, Booe's assistant in CWA District 9 for the past six years, as a vice president and head of the district.

Michigan Saves Ford, Brown Slows Carter

Abrupt turnarounds in presidential primary results from one week to the next continued as President Ford swept two states and another newcomer won another Democratic test.

Ford won in both his home state of Michigan and in Maryland, where former California Gov. Ronald Reagan did not campaign. The President's totals were large in both cases, 65 percent of the vote in Michigan and 58 percent in Maryland.

Ford had won only one of the six primaries held earlier in May.

Among Democrats, current California Gov. Jerry Brown swept a non-binding "beauty contest" in Maryland against former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, but Carter scored a narrow victory in Michigan over Arizona Rep. Morris Udall.

Brown started his month-old candidacy in Maryland and took 49 percent of the vote to Carter's 37, matching the feat turned in Nebraska the previous week by Idaho Sen. Frank Church, who beat Carter by a single percentage point.

Thus Carter, who lost only two of the first nine primaries between Feb. 24 and Apr. 27, has now lost three of the nine he has contested since May 1 for an overall record of 13 won, 5 lost and one bypassed out of the first 19.
